The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not that the Chair is determining what shall go in the RECORD, but it comes up under the question as to whether they are petitions or memorials, and when an objection is raised certainly there must be some decision as to whether it is a petition or memorial.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have not been an offender in this respect. I have had three telegrams placed in the RECORD. They were not technically petitions, and yet they dealt with great public questions. I propose in the future, if I have documents of that kind, to get them in the RECORD in some way, which I can do by reading them.

I think this controversy ought not to have been precipitated. Senators have a right, representing their constituents, to place the views of their constituents before the public, and we have a method by which we can do it notwithstanding all the objections which can be raised by a Senator who wishes to be technical or who wants to control the proceedings of this body.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish simply to say this——

Mr. GRONNA. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SMOOT. The RECORD shows——

Mr. GRONNA. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The presentation of further petitions and memorials is in order.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have since March 4 received several thousand letters and many scores of telegrams. I have been reflecting for some time as to what I ought to do with respect to the RECORD. I received a letter from a very prominent citizen of my State, who complains that other Senators have incorporated telegrams and letters in the RECORD and he had failed to see his own letter in the RECORD. I fear if I should attempt to put into the RECORD all the arguments pro and con that I receive on the important questions of to-day I would submerge and engulf debate in the Senate.

I want my constituents now to know that while I have incorporated no telegrams in the RECORD for a year they have been received and considered. It seems to me that the appropriate way to put telegrams and letters in the RECORD would be to deliver an address on the subject and then as an appendix to the speech the Senator delivers to put into the RECORD such telegrams and letters as the Senator may see fit.

When I first came to the Senate I was a very grave offender against the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, because I thought it my duty to put in the RECORD nearly everything that came to me. I have changed my mind on that subject.

However, I wish to ask the Senate this morning to grant me unanimous consent to have read an article from a newspaper on one of the important questions of the day. It is from the Chicago Tribune. I ask this because I have not offended in this particular for more than a year.

Mr. BORAH. What is the subject?

Mr. ASHURST. It relates to censorship. I should like to have it read.

Mr. BORAH. I think this entire discussion is illuminating on the pending bill.

Mr. ASHURST. If there be objection, I will not offer it at this time.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Could it not be offered when the bill is before the Senate?

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator from New York object?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think that would be the appropriate time.

Mr. ASHURST. I will withdraw it, Mr. President.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to ask the Senator from Arizona if he procured the copy of the Chicago Tribune in the cloakroom, or where did he get it? I have been unable to get the Chicago Tribune on our side.

Mr. ASHURST. I secured it in the Congressional Library. It is dated April 5 of this year.

Mr. NEW presented petitions of Typographical Union No. 35, of Evansville; of Cherokee Tribe, No. 96, Improved Order of Red Men, of Noblesville; of James R. Slack Post, No. 137, Grand Army of the Republic, of Huntington; and of sundry citizens of Elkhart, all in the State of Indiana, praying for compulsory military training, pledging support to the President and for national unity, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a petition of the Lion's Club of Texas, Texarkana, Ark., pledging support to the President, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Presbytery of Washington, D. C., praying for the interning of all saloons and other places where intoxicating liquors are sold, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. NELSON presented a telegram, in the nature of a petition, from the chairman of a mass meeting of citizens of Akeley, Minn., indorsing the action of Senator NELSON in voting for war with Germany, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of the economics faculty of Yale University, of New Haven, Conn., praying for a tax on special war profits, lowering of the present income tax exemptions, increases in the rates of the income tax, and for a high consumption tax on luxuries, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of Nonowantuc Tribe, No. 42, Improved Order of Red Men, of New London, and of the Farmers' Club of East Wallop, in the State of Connecticut, praying for compulsory military training and for the exemption of sober, reliable, and skillful farm laborers from the first call for military service, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a petition of the congregation of the University Baptist Church, of Seattle, Wash., praying for the enactment of certain legislation for the conduct of the war, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Washington State Association of Drugless Physicians, pledging support to the President, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from sundry citizens of Seattle, Wash., praying that all newly organized engineer units of the Army be under the control of the War Department, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions adopted by the Ashmont Social and Athletic Club, of Dorchester, Mass., and resolutions adopted by American citizens of Greek descent at a mass meeting at Faneuil Hall, Boston, Mass., pledging support to the President, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented telegrams from 49 citizens and business firms of Detroit and Jackson, in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against voluntary enlistment, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FLETCHER. There was referred to the Committee on Commerce a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, praying for the enactment of legislation extending the Federal law in regard to war-risk insurance. The committee handling that class of matter has been the Finance Committee, and I ask to have the Committee on Commerce discharged from the further consideration of this memorial and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 291) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the town of Murfreesboro, Tenn., two condemned bronze or brass cannon or field pieces and suitable outfit of cannon balls (Rept. No. 24);

A bill (S. 1420) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the State of Tennessee two brass cannon, with carriages (Rept. No. 25); and

A bill (S. 1767) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to Lewisburg, Marshall County, Tenn., three brass cannon, with carriages (Rept. No. 26).

REGULATION OF EXPORTS.

Mr. FERNALD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably the bill (S. 1867) to authorize the President in time of war to give direction to exports from the United States, so as to insure their wise, economical, and profitable distribution to other countries, and I submit a report (No. 23) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I rose to make objection. I should like to have the privilege of saying now that I do not think it is quite fair to the Senate that bills of such enormous consequence and involving so many intricate questions, many of them, like the bill that is before the Senate now, very lengthy, with different sections correlated to each other, many of them raising serious constitutional questions—I do not think that they should be reported from the committee and the Senate be asked to consider them without their being placed on the desks of Senators a reasonable time, so that we may fairly digest them.

I have just seen this measure, and there are tremendous questions involved in the bill, some legal, some affecting the policy of that character of legislation, and, as I am seeking to try to do my duty to my State and my country in this grave crisis, I shall insist upon having a reasonable opportunity to know what legislation is intended to accomplish.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I may be allowed to say to the Senator that the Judiciary Committee has already reported a bill which I think was included in the so-called espionage bill as one of the sections in relation to this same subject. Therefore I hope the Senator from Maine will not press this bill until we see how it compares with what the Judiciary Committee has already reported.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will say that the bill referred to by the Senator from Maine, and reported by him from the Commerce Committee, has the cordial indorsement of the Department of Commerce and the heads of the other departments, I believe, because it is regarded as a very important measure. It is limited to war time. It is not precisely what is contained in Chapter VII of the pending bill, but it is in that direction. It does not go quite as far, I think, and it has other provisions in it that make it quite a different proposition in many respects from what is contained in Chapter VII of the pending bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If it goes in the direction of Chapter VII, we certainly desire it to come up in its regular order, and to stop it when it comes up by substantial consideration.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, this is a measure of very great importance. I do not propose to press it, of course, but it is an emergency measure without a question. We appropriated $7,000,000,000 to be used by this Government, and yet we can not plant or eat those bonds. This measure has to do with the conservation of the food of the country, and something ought to be done and done immediately in that direction. More than 20,000,000 cans of canned products to-day are being withheld on account of lack of cans, and unless something is done immediately we shall have to pay much higher prices for food than we have to-day. I hoped that we might have immediate consideration of the bill; I would not take over 20 minutes in explaining it; but if there is objection, of course it will have to go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes to the calendar.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I should like to say just one more word in justification of the attitude that I have taken. I have taken just a mere glance at this bill, and I observe that the President is to be empowered to lay an embargo not only upon particular things or things going to a particular place, like to a neutral country, but there is an attempt here to give the President of the United States the power to say that as against one place in this country goods may be shipped whereas as to another they might not be shipped. In other words, he could authorize the shipment of cotton from Boston and deny the right to ship cotton from Savannah. The Constitution of the United States says that there shall be no discrimination between ports and places of the United States; and if the Constitution prevents such discrimination, how can we empower the President of the United States to make such discrimination?

I only cite that, which, as I say, caught my eye when I glanced at the bill here within a minute after it was laid upon my desk, to show Senators the character of the questions that are involved and the necessity for some time for their consideration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the fact that section 1 in Chapter VII of the so-called espionage bill proposes to do that very thing. That is the reason I want an opportunity to compare the provisions of the bill reported by the Senator from Maine with the bill that is now the regular order of business before the Senate.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, and I submit a report (No. 22) thereon.

Mr. REED. It is understood that there will be a minority report on the bill filed within a reasonable time. I simply desire to make that statement now in order that the record may be complete.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that, Mr. President, but I hope the Senator will not delay the consideration of the bill by postponing the presentation of the report.

Mr. REED. We shall not ask any delay on that account.

Mr. McKELLAR. That will be done at once.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer the following amendment, and as it is very brief I ask that it be read.

The amendment was read and ordered to lie on the table and be printed, as follows:

Amendment to the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States; insert in the proper place the following:

"Each State shall be required to furnish its proportionate number of men for the Army and Navy. The unit in each State shall be the ward in the cities and the voting precinct in the rural districts. There shall be prepared an eligible list in each of such wards and precincts, and notice shall be given of the number which such ward or precinct shall furnish for each call for service in either Army or Navy. A certain number of days, to be fixed by the President of the United States, shall be allowed in which volunteers may be accepted from such ward or precinct. In no case shall there be accepted for service a greater number than the number apportioned to such ward or precinct. In the event that such ward or precinct shall fail to furnish its quota of volunteers, there shall be selected therefrom, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed, the number necessary to fill the quota required."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2, resuming its consideration at Chapter VII.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that the next chapter of the bill has almost the same provisions as those of his bill, which has been reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator from Idaho desire to address the Senate?

Mr. BORAH. I should like to submit some remarks on a section of Chapter II of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator desire to go back to that chapter?

Mr. BORAH. I suppose we can clean up that matter now. I do not see any reason for delay. Still, I do not want to interfere with whatever program the Senator from North Carolina has in mind.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is usual to go through with a bill and then go back to any controverted matter which may be passed over; but I will accommodate the Senator from Idaho if he desires to speak now.

Mr. BORAH. I should like, if it is not inconvenient to the Senator from North Carolina, to submit my remarks now if we may, in the consideration of the bill, go back to that chapter of the bill to which I wish to speak.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then I ask that we go back to the chapter which we passed over, to which the Senator refers—Chapter II, subsection (c).

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the part of the bill to which I desire to address some remarks reads as follows:

(c) Whoever, in time of war, in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans, or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct—

Or supposed conduct, I presume it means—of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be, or which might be, useful to the enemy, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

Here I call particular attention to the suggestion made by the able Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] yesterday, that this first proviso does not cover the subject matter which it is presumed to cover. It is not as broad as the precedent part, to which it refers:

Provided, That no discussion, comment, or criticism shall convey information prohibited under the provisions of this section.

Mr. President, this is the second time, so far as I have been able to discover, in which any such legislation has ever been proposed in this country. The other instanee I may have occasion to refer to later—the "sedition law." A casual reading of this provision of the bill will show that it is omnipotently comprehensive, drastic, though nebulous in its terms, uncertain in its import; and no man can foresee what it might be in its consequences:

(c) Whoever, in time of war, in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President—

For that is the offense—the violation of regulations—

which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, * * * calculated to be, or which might be, useful to the enemy.

That would close investigation, reflection, consideration, and communication upon this entire comprehensive field, because no man could foresee what was calculated to be or what in human possibility might be beneficial to the enemy. Now, this bill includes the private citizen the liberty of speech as well as the press, and my argument, while dealing largely for the sake of clearness with the liberty of the press, should be understood as including the liberty of speech.

Mr. President, the first amendment of the Constitution reads as follows:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

What was the purpose of this amendment to the Constitution? Was it designed to regulate and control a power already presumed to be in the National Government, or was it merely declaratory concerning a power which it was believed the National Government did not have, and which it was never intended to give it? For instance, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." Can Congress legislate upon that subject at all? Has it any power to pass a law concerning the establishment of religion? Is it a subject matter within the legislative discretion or power of Congress at all? Would anybody contend that a bill here introduced for the purpose of establishing a form of religion, or a bill respecting the establishment of religion, would be a subject matter which would be within the power of Congress to deal? And yet that is found in the same sentence with and was introduced into the Constitution for the same purpose and with the same intent as the clause with which we are dealing at this time, to wit:

Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

When the Constitution was submitted for ratification two schools of thought took part in the controversy in reference to the question of amendments. One school of thought—and I may say that it was led by Mr. Hamilton—believed that the Constitution did not encompass, and did not include within it, the power, for instance, to abridge the freedom of the press or to legislate concerning the press at all; and it was not the desire nor the design of Mr. Hamilton and his school of advocates that the Congress should have any power concerning the press. He announced in the controversy that it was not the intent of those who framed the Constitution that that subject matter should be within the compass or control of the National Government.

The other school of thought, led by Mr. Jefferson, was to the same effect, that the Constitution did not include the subject matter, and that it should not include the subject matter; but, for fear that there might be a construction put upon the Constitution which would include this as one of the powers of the National Government, Mr. Jefferson and his friends insisted that there should be an amendment declaratory of the proposition that it should not be included among the powers of the National Government. Each school agreed that under the Constitution Congress could not legislate concerning the press; each school agreed that this should and ought to be true, but the school of Jefferson, anxious that no construction should ever be made which might lead to the exercise of this power, insisted on the first amendment as a positive declaratory amendment to that effect. And so when the Constitution went to the States for ratification, as you recall, a number of the States insisted that there should be no doubt left in regard to this matter, and ratified it upon condition that the 10 amendments—and I shall confine myself, of course, only to the subject matter under discussion to-day—should be adopted along with the Constitution, or rather they ratified it upon condition that it should be understood that these amendments should follow. Mr. Hamilton, in discussing this proposition in the Federalist, referring to the first amendment and the amendments following, said:

They would contain various exceptions to powers not granted, and on this very account would afford a colorable pretext to claim more than were granted. For why declare that things shall not be done which there is no power to do? Why, for instance, should it be said that the liberty of the press shall not be restrained when no power is given by which restrictions may be imposed? I will not contend that such a provision—would confer a regulating power; but it is evident that it would furnish, to men disposed to usurp, a plausible pretense for claiming that power. They might urge with a semblance of reason that the Constitution ought not to be charged with the absurdity of providing against the abuse of an authority which was not given, and that the provision against restraining the liberty of the press afforded a clear implication that a power to prescribe proper regulations concerning it was intended to be vested in the National Government.

Therefore—

as the power does not exist in the National Government to legislate concerning the press, to adopt an amendment with reference to the subject matter would be an implication that the power does exist, and it does not.

Very well, said Mr. Jefferson, I agree with you that the power is not legitimately here, and that it was not intended to be here, and that it is a subject matter which belongs to the States, the same as the common police power of the States. But there is in the Constitution a provision that Congress shall have power to pass all laws necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect the powers here granted, and it might be held and might be construed to include regulation and legislation concerning the press. Therefore, accepting your view that it is not among the powers of the General Government, and that it should not be among such powers, we ask for a declaratory amendment to the Constitution which shall put it beyond peradventure that it is not one of the powers granted to the National Government.

Thus for this reason, and this reason only, the first amendment to the Constitution providing that Congress shall pass no law abridging the freedom of the press was put into the Constitution, not to regulate a power already vested in the National Government, not to restrain or curtail that power or provide the means by which it shall be exercised, but a declaratory proposition that the power does not exist in Congress to pass any law concerning or respecting this subject matter.

Mr. Madison, often very properly referred to as the father of the Constitution, certainly a man who gave a vast amount of consideration to this particular subject, submitted a report to the Virginia Legislature, in which is found a discussion of this matter. I beg the privilege of the Senate to read a few paragraphs of it. I read from a volume entitled "The Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions of 1798 and 1799," published by Jonathan Elliot in 1832, page 36:

When the Constitution was under the discussions which preceded its ratification it is well known that great apprehensions were expressed by many lest the omission of some positive exception from the powers delegated of certain rights, and of the freedom of the press particularly, might expose them to danger of being drawn by construction within some of the powers vested in Congress, more especially of the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying their other powers into execution. In reply to this objection it was invariably urged to be a fundamental and characteristic principle of the Constitution that all powers not given by it were reserved; that no powers were given beyond those enumerated in the Constitution, and such as were fairly incident to them; that the power over the rights in question, and particularly over the press, was neither among the enumerated powers nor incident to any of them, and consequently that an exercise of any such power would be manifest usurpation. It is painful to remark how much the arguments now employed in behalf of the sedition act are at variance with the reasoning which then justified the Constitution and invited its ratification.

* * * * * * *

Without tracing further the evidence on this subject, it would seem scarcely possible to doubt that no power whatever over the press was supposed to be delegated by the Constitution as it originally stood and that the amendment was intended as a positive and absolute reservation of it.

But the evidence is still stronger. The proposition of amendments made by Congress is introduced in the following terms:

"The conventions of a number of the States having at the time of their adopting the Constitution expressed a desire, in order to prevent misconstructions or abuse of its powers, that further declaratory and restrictive clauses should be added; and as extending the ground of public confidence in the Government, will best insure the beneficent ends of its institutions."

Here is the most satisfactory and authentic proof that the several amendments proposed were to be considered as either declaratory or restrictive, and, whether the one or the other, as corresponding with the desire expressed by a number of the States and as extending the ground of public confidence in the Government.

Under any other construction of the amendment relating to the press than that it declared the press to be wholly exempt from the power of Congress the amendment could neither be said to correspond with the desire expressed by a number of the States nor be calculated to extend the ground of public confidence in the Government.

Nay, more; the construction employed to justify the "sedition act" would exhibit a phenomenon without parallel in the political world. It would exhibit a number of respectable States as denying, first, that any power over the press was delegated by the Constitution; as proposing next that an amendment to it should explicitly declare that no such power was delegated, and, finally, as concurring in an amendment actually recognizing or delegating such a power.

That is to say, a number of States insisted that the power did not exist, and a number of other States insisted that there should be an amendment so that it would be placed beyond peradventure that it did not exist; but the result was that they adopted an amendment which conveyed the power to the National Congress, if the reasoning that it now exists in the National Government is to stand.

Is, then, the Federal Government, it will be asked, destitute of every authority for restraining the licentiousness of the press and for shielding itself against the libelous attacks which may be made on those who administer it?

The Constitution alone can answer this question. If no such power be expressly delegated, and if it be not both necessary and proper to carry into execution an express power; above all, if it be expressly forbidden by a declaratory amendment to the Constitution, the answer must be that the Federal Government is destitute of all such authority.

And might it not be asked in turn whether it is not more probable, under all the circumstances which have been reviewed, that the authority should be withheld by the Constitution than that it should be left to a vague and violent construction, whilst so much pains were bestowed in enumerating other powers, and so many less important powers are included in the enumeration?

Might it not be likewise asked whether the anxious circumspection which dictated so many peculiar limitations on the general authority would be unlikely to exempt the press altogether from that authority? The peculiar magnitude of some of the powers necessarily committed to the Federal Government, the peculiar duration required for the functions of some of its department, the peculiar distance of the seat of its proceedings from the great body of its constituents, and the peculiar difficulty of circulating an adequate knowledge of them through any other channel—will not these considerations, some or other of which produced other exceptions from the powers of ordinary governments, altogether account for the policy of binding the hand of the Federal Government from touching the channel which alone can give efficacy to its responsibility to its constituents, and of leaving those who administer it to a remedy for their injured reputations under the same laws and in the same tribunals which protect their lives, their liberties, and their properties?

But the question does not turn either on the wisdom of the Constitution or on the policy which gave rise to its particular organization. It turns on the actual meaning of the instrument, by which it has appeared that a power over the press is clearly excluded from the number of powers delegated to the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I do not want to take too much of the time in recurring to these historic incidents; but I think it is well to know what was the actual view of those who wrote the Constitution, in order that we may more properly construe its terms. Without insisting that this historic interpretation is to be accepted as the true and final construction, it is exceedingly important in arriving at the true construction.

I have before me Jefferson's Works, volume 18; and in the forefront of that work is an article by the Hon. Josephus Daniels, present Secretary of the Navy, on the subject of "Jefferson's Contribution to a Free Press." It is a very interesting and illuminating article and has a direct bearing on the present question. He quotes at length from Jefferson's view. There can be no doubt as to what Jefferson understood to be the import and purpose of the first amendment, and with him Hamilton entirely agreed, and so did Madison.

Says Jefferson:

The people are the only censors of their governors; and even their errors will tend to keep them to the true principles of their institution.

In the days of the Civil War, when Mr. Lincoln was being criticized and assailed as no other man in public office ever was by some of the great journals of the country, which are still among our great journals, his reply was that the administrators and administration had better suffer some of the evils and some of the sorrows which accompany such work than that the people should lose control of or forfeit the great benefits flowing from the absolute freedom of the press.

Jefferson and Lincoln both always adhered to the principle that the evils of attempting to restrain the press or speech must be incalculably greater than the evils flowing from their freedom.

Again quoting Mr. Jefferson:

To punish these errors too severely would be to suppress the only safeguard of the public liberty.

* * * * * * *

Our liberty depends on the freedom of the press, and that can not be limited without being lost.

* * * * * * *

The liberty of speaking and writing guards our other liberties.

Says Mr. Daniels himself, in regard to the first amendment:

For this amendment and the healthy agitation that secured it, all men who believe in a free press will ever hold Jefferson in grateful esteem. It was contended that this amendment was wholly unnecessary—"useless surplusage," as one Federalist declared—but the prophetic eye of the liberty-loving sage of Monticello looked from Paris across the Atlantic and saw that the influences that distrusted the people would muzzle the press unless the Constitution forged chains that would deny power "abridging the freedom of speech or of the press."

Later I may have occasion to refer to this in reference to the sedition laws.

Mr. President, it is my judgment that whatever may be the construction placed upon this provision of the Constitution now, there can be no doubt that those who wrote this instrument thoroughly understood that they were excluding from the National Government all power with reference to the press; that it was a subject matter entirely withdrawn from the National Government. There was no difference of opinion upon that subject among those who were in the best position to know. The only reason for the first amendment was to prevent a possible construction which might include control of the press as one of the powers which the National Government could exercise. The only difference of opinion was as to whether it was necessary to put into the Constitution an inhibitory power which would prevent a misconstruction of the Constitution.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me suggest to the Senator that the prevision of Mr. Jefferson, his fear or apprehension that the clause giving general power to the Congress to carry into execution the enumerated powers might be made the basis of that attack upon the press which he wished to safeguard against, is vindicated by the existing situation, since the bill now before the Senate must find its basis in the Constitution, if at all, upon that identical clause.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely. In other words, the object and purpose of putting in the first amendment is clearly justified by the fact that without it the claim would undoubtedly be made that the power existed by reason of this general right to legislate to carry into effect all other powers of the Constitution.

But, Mr. President, it is not necessary, so far as this bill is concerned, to rely upon the general proposition which I have just now presented, and therefore I am not going to pursue it further. I do not insist that we can carry out the evident intent of the framers literally. We have put another construction on the Constitution, but in construing its terms it is wholesome to keep their purpose in mind. It is not necessary, so far as this bill is concerned, to take the position that the Congress has no power over the press. While I believe, as I say, that that was the clear intent of the framers of the Constitution, it is not necessary to rely upon it. There have been, as suggested by the able Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] yesterday, three decisions by the inferior or subordinate courts of the Federal jurisdiction taking a different view from that which I have been advocating. Two of those opinions, in my judgment, do not stand very high in the jurisprudence of the country, for reasons which it is not necessary here to discuss. The other is apparently a well-considered opinion.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. That I may understand what construction the Senator would place upon that inhibition in the Constitution, let me call his attention to the fact that at least a large number of the States also have the same inhibition in their constitutions; and, if we were to give to those phrases that strict construction, to what extent could the States themselves pass any laws upon the question of the liberty of the press?

Mr. BORAH. There is a wide distinction between the construction of the National Constitution, which is one of delegated powers, and the construction of a State constitution. The National Government has no power at all except that which is delegated to it, while the State has all the powers which it is not inhibited from exercising.

Mr. McCUMBER. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the States recognize all power as coming from the people, and the people put the inhibition in the constitutions upon the legislatures of the States, and they copy the very words of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but that does not change the rule of construction with reference to the two frameworks of government. The Senator will concede with me that the National Government, of course, has no power except that which is delegated.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think that the two constructions are similar when a power vested only in the United States by the Constitution is under consideration—in other words, the war power?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, where a power is clearly delegated, then everything necessary to the exercise of that particular power goes with it.

Mr. FALL. Exactly. I simply wanted to call the attention of the Senator to that proposition, and that an answer might be made to some of the points which he is making now upon the ground that this is a war measure.

Mr. BORAH. That the particular bill here under consideration is a war measure?

Mr. FALL. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I do not go so far as to hold that a war measure suspends the other provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. FALL. No; but if the Senator will permit me another suggestion, the Senator, of course, understands that treason against the United States means the levying of war, and also means adhering to the enemies of the country, and also means the giving of aid and comfort to the enemies of the country. Now, suppose that in this country in time of war a great newspaper proceeds to give aid and comfort to the enemy by publishing the plans of the United States to the public, as a result of which the enemies of the country may avail themselves of that knowledge. Does the Senator hold that that would not be contrary to the provisions of the Constitution, and that no power would rest in the Government or in any branch of the Government to defend itself or protect itself in any way against that?

Mr. BORAH. No; I make no such contention, and, with all due respect to the Senator, I think that comes under another principle entirely. Undoubtedly because a man owns a newspaper he is not exempt from treason against the Government, and if he commits an act of treason and uses a newspaper to do it he can be punished for it. But that is by reason of another provision of the Constitution.

Mr. FALL. Certainly; it comes under the general law.

Mr. BORAH. That would not be a limitation upon the freedom of the press in the sense in which we use that term. It would not be necessary to touch the subject of the press in order to punish the man for treason. To make myself plain, you could not set up a censor who would say in advance that this or that is treason. The man may publish and take his chance, as in libel.

Mr. FALL. It is treason because of the publication in the press.

Mr. BORAH. Undoubtedly. But it is a subsequent act which is punished. You can not make a law like this creating a censor to pass upon the question in advance of publication.

Mr. FALL. Then the Congress of the United States can prohibit such publications.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Congress of the United States can provide for the punishment of treason, and whoever does anything under that provision, whether by the press or otherwise, would be subject to it; but it can not provide in advance of the act of publishing it that some one shall look over it and decide it should not be published, as this bill does.

Mr. FALL. Suppose a newspaper undertakes to make public a plan of the Navy of the United States, how it is to cooperate with the allies in this war?

Mr. BORAH. If you mean by "undertakes" that a censor may decide before he publishes that which he may not publish, I say no.

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. OVERMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield first to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I just want to understand the Senator's position. Do I understand the Senator to contend that under the Constitution the press is given unbridled license? Do I understand him to say that they have a license to do as they please and say what they please?

Mr. BORAH. My contention is that under the Constitution the fathers intended it should not be a subject matter upon which Congress could legislate at all. I have said I am not contending that that construction has been sustained. But I do contend that no restraint previous to publication can be put upon the press.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then the Senator thinks that subdivision (d) is unconstitutional?

Mr. BORAH. I would not undertake to say offhand what particular portion of the bill is constitutional or unconstitutional.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think I heard the Senator object to that. There is no difference between subdivision (d) and subdivision (c), except as to the intent to give comfort to the enemy.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is perfectly aware of the fact that I said in the committee that no part of Chapter II was agreeable to me.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator passes that point I trust he will, in response to the question addressed to him by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], give us his view about how any existing law may be appealed to to punish a man who does in a publication happen to suggest just exactly what are the purposes of the Navy Department at the present time. I understood the Senator to say that the present law would take care of that case.

Mr. BORAH. I had in mind this provision:

Whoever, owing allegiance to the United States, levies war against them or adheres to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the United States or elsewhere, is guilty of treason.

If it is not sufficient, it could be made sufficient.

Mr. WALSH. But I dare say the Senator will recognize the intent there. I suppose the Senator will recognize that intent is necessary in the case of treason.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I recognize that fact, either actual or constructive.

Mr. WALSH. But I understood the Senator to say that if a man did not intend that the matter should get to the enemy, but he published it simply to advise his readers, he would be punishable under an existing law. I wanted to know what the law is.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator did not understand me to say that, or at least I should not have been so understood.

Mr. WALSH. I so understood the Senator. Then, as I understand the Senator, he would answer the Senator from New Mexico that Congress could not pass a law to punish a man who having learned the exact purposes and plans of the Navy to-day in relation to the work it is to carry out should publish those plans; that it is beyond the power——

Mr. BORAH. No; I did not take any such position as that. I said that all that could be done under other provisions of the Constitution and had no relation whatever to the question with which we are dealing now.

Mr. WALSH. I understood the Senator to say——

Mr. BORAH. I do not contend for a moment that a man may be guilty of treason and that there is no power in the Government to punish treason; neither do I claim that if he uses the press that fact exempts him from punishment by reason of this provision of the Constitution. You may deal with the results of publication, but you can not impose restraint previous to publication.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I understand the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], his question is, If a man publishes in a paper plans of our military authorities which do become of use to the enemy, although the publisher did not intend that they should, is it within the power of Congress to pass any law to punish him for publishing such things, although he did not intend to furnish aid or comfort to the enemy?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says with the absence of intent?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; with the absence of intent on his part; and yet the plans published are of such a nature that a wise man would have seen that it would furnish aid and comfort to the enemy, but he did not see the effect of what he was doing.

Mr. BORAH. I apprehend the rule would be invoked there that every man intends the natural consequences of his own act, and in that respect there would be not an actual intent but a constructive intent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think so myself. Do I understand the Senator correctly—I ask simply for information—that Congress is utterly powerless to pass any regulation at all regulating the press?

Mr. BORAH. I have contended that was the understanding of its framers. I am now about to discuss the construction which has been put upon it later, and which for the purposes of this bill I accept.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. During time of war? Of course, we all agree that Congress under the Constitution has no power to pass a law abridging the freedom of the press, if we can find out what the freedom of the press means under the Constitution, but I assume the Senator means that the authors of the Constitution, from whose views he has read so interestingly this morning, contended that Congress should be inhibited from passing any law regulating in any manner the press of the country.

Mr. BORAH. That, in my judgment, is what they intended to do—that it should not be a subject matter about which Congress could legislate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I understand from the Senator. Now, does the Senator think that since the days of the fathers, whose utterances he has read, there has come over the country, either by judicial decision or otherwise, any different power in Congress to regulate the press than there was when the fathers framed the Constitution?

Mr. BORAH. There has been no change, of course, in the terms of the Constitution, but a judicial construction has been placed upon it which seems to me to be at variance with what I may call the historic construction.

Mr. KNOX and Mr. WALSH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. Before the Senator from Idaho proceeds with that statement, I should like to make this inquiry: Is it a regulation of the press to pass a general statute applicable to everybody, which, of course, would be applicable to the press in the sense that the press might be a violator of the law? Do you call that a regulation of the press?

Mr. BORAH. I would not.

Mr. KNOX. Is not that what this bill does?

Mr. BORAH. No; I am coming to that in a moment.

Mr. KNOX. That is what I would like to hear the Senator upon.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. In this very able discussion I wondered if it would not be important to distinguish whether the writers of the Constitution made a difference between the publication of news and the expression of an opinion?

Mr. BORAH. Whether the fathers made any difference?

Mr. HARDING. Whether they contemplated a difference between the conveyance of news and the expression of an editorial opinion?

Mr. BORAH. I could not say. I see nothing in the provision of the Constitution under discussion to warrant an opinion in regard to it.

Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, it is not necessary to rely upon this historic construction of the Constitution in order to establish the vulnerability of this proposed statute. I have only discussed that for the purpose of showing what was evidently intended, in order that we may place a more accurate construction upon the powers which are now assumed to be exercised by Congress and have been in some instances sustained by the courts.

Observe that this says:

Whoever, in time of war, in violation of regulations—

There is the offense. It must be in violation of regulations established by the censor, whoever he is, in this instance the President, but it might be anybody else. Before they can publish concerning any of these matters, before they can communicate or interchange views they must consult either directly the censor or consult him through his regulations—and (c) whoever, in time of war, in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans, or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be, or which might be, useful to the enemy.

In answer to the question submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], it seems to me the construction of this statute would necessitate going, in the first instance, before publication takes place at all, to consult some one who passes upon the question as to whether or not the publication or communication shall take place. It does not deal alone with a publication as a completed and finished fact. It does not deal alone with the subsequent consequences of a publication. It does not deal alone with the proposition whether it is libelous having been published, whether it is seditious having been published, but it requires a previous consultation with some one before he can publish it, and that is the censor or his regulations.

Mr. President, I understand there is no difference of opinion among the authorities that that kind of regulation of the press which requires previous consultation with some one as to what shall be published is inhibited by the Constitution.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in a moment. We may assume for the sake of this argument that Congress can pass a law which would make it criminal to publish a false or malicious statement or a statement which had the effect in its final consequences of aiding the enemy, but that is not what this proposed statute does. It puts a previous restraint upon the publication; that is, a restraint prior to publication; a consultation. It is a license, it is a privilege, it is a censorship; and that, in my judgment, is inhibited by the Constitution according to all the decisions and of all who have discussed this subject.

I now yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The question which I should like to ask the Senator is this: Does he believe that the court would construe this act as one regulating the press? Is not the proposed act so framed that it shows the intent of Congress not to regulate the press, but to prevent information from being given to the enemy? Would the first amendment of the Constitution apply to the legislation proposed here?

Mr. BORAH. In answer to the able Senator I will say that undoubtedly the court would not construe that it was the design to regulate the press alone, because as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] called attention yesterday, it not only covers the press, but it covers all acts of individuals and private citizens. It encompasses the whole field and would come under the inhibition of liberty of speech just as much as the inhibition of freedom of the press.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator, I believe, will agree that the purpose of the act is a laudable one; that the enemy should not get the information which is inhibited by the proposed law. Does not the first proviso indicate that it was not the intention of Congress to regulate the press, but to confine its activities to the prevention of the dissemination of information which would be detrimental to the Government?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I agree with the Senator that we would all inhibit the enemy from getting anything in the way of information from this country, but I do not agree with the proposition that this is the method by which that can be inhibited or should be inhibited. Of course, we must take into consideration that there has never been an attack made upon the press in the history of the press in which the attack has not been based upon public welfare. The king, in the first place, believed it was detrimental to the public welfare for anyone to publish anything without his consent. The dictator said, "It is not in the interest of the public that the news shall be spread abroad among my subjects, and therefore you shall not publish without my consent, and I will determine what it is best for the public to have." That was the very basis of the restraint upon the freedom of the press which the Constitution intended to inhibit, that the press should be unrestrained, and that the only consequences would be the punishment of any result from the use of that unrestrained power.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then does the Senator contend that Congress has the right to prevent an individual from doing these things but has no right to pass a law which would prevent the press from doing the same thing?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; I do not contend that. I contend that liberty of speech has the same standing in the Constitution as the liberty of the press. You can not censor either. You can only punish for acts done.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator from South Dakota rose a moment ago.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Does not the Senator think it just as necessary to enact a law which will restrain men not having the intent, which in certain cases would be just as apt to give information that would result in injury to our Government as the man who had an intent to do such a thing?

Mr. BORAH. If I understand the Senator's question correctly, he thinks the man who would have no intent could do as much evil as the man who had an intent?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. He might.

Mr. BORAH. That would be true in some instances, but ordinarily we have always assumed that there would be an intent either actual or constructive to effectuate the evil.

Mr. CURTIS. Would not the intent be a question of fact for the jury on the trial of the party indicted?

Mr. BORAH. That, I think, is true; but of course this relates rather to a policy of law than the subject which I was discussing.

If I may go back a minute, I want the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], in view of his question particularly, to the exact language of this statute:

> Whoever, in time of war, in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President.

He prescribes regulations in reference to what? With reference to publications concerning all these matters, and if his regulations inhibit the publication concerning certain of them it can not be made; in other words, there must be a consultation of some power, something aside from the unrestrained desire of the publisher to publish and take the consequences of his act. It may be a matter about which there would be no evil in the mind of the publisher. He might desire to publish it with the very best intent, without any criminal intent and without the intent of aiding the enemy in any way whatever, and yet under this regulation, if the President or the censor, whoever he might be, would come to a different conclusion that it could or might benefit the enemy, undoubtedly the party could not publish it. In other words, instead of the publisher determining for himself what he shall publish or the private citizen determining for himself what he shall speak, and each taking the chances as to punishment, some one else decides what he shall publish or what he shall say.

So I say, Mr. President, that this statute, as I read it and as I construe it—the fair interpretation of this statute necessitates the conclusion that there must be a consultation with a censor, a licensor, with the grantor of the privilege before a publication takes place at all under this proposed statute. If that be true, Mr. President, it is the very essence of censorship; it is the very essence of license and of privilege which it was the purpose and intent of those who had to do with the making of this matter to inhibit, and which the courts of our country have said is inhibited by the Constitution. This is the construction upon which all are agreed that there can be no previous restraint.

Here I call attention to a portion of a letter written by Thomas Paine. It has always been my hope that Paine's views upon religion did not in the other world militate too much against the reward to which he was entitled for his political views:

> Prior to what is in England called the revolution, which was in 1688, no work could be published in that country without first obtaining the permission of an officer appointed by the Government for inspecting works intended for publication. The same was the case in France, except that in France there were 40 who were called censors, and in England there was but one, called imprimateur.
> At the revolution the office of imprimateur was abolished, and as the works could then be published without first obtaining the permission of the Government officer the press was in consequence of that abolition said to be free, and it was from this circumstance that the term liberty of the press arose. The press, which is a tongue to the eye, was then put exactly in the case of the human tongue. A man does not ask liberty beforehand to say something he has a mind to say, but he becomes answerable afterwards for the atrocities he may utter.
> Some lawyers in defending their clients (for the generality of lawyers, like Swiss soldiers, will fight on either side) have often given their opinion of what they defined the liberty of the press to be. One said it was this, another said it was that, and so on, according to the case they were pleading. Now, these men ought to have known that the term liberty of the press arose from a fact, the abolition of the office of imprimateur, and that opinion has nothing to do in the case. The term refers to the fact of printing, free from prior restraint, and not at all to the matter printed, whether good or bad. The public at large—or, in case of prosecution, a jury of the country—will be judges of the matter.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] yesterday referred to the Patterson case. The Patterson case is not very conclusive authority, for the reason that it is clearly and unmistakably dicta, seemingly so considered by the judge writing it and stated to be so by the dissenting opinion, but it is persuasive as to the view of the court nevertheless:

> But even if we were to assume that freedom of speech and freedom of the press were protected from abridgment on the part not only of the United States but also of the States, still we should be far from the conclusion that the plaintiff in error would have us reach. In the first place, the main purpose of such constitutional provisions is "to prevent all such previous restraints upon publications as have been practiced by other Governments," and they do not prevent the subsequent punishment of such as may be deemed contrary to the public welfare.

What was the previous restraint at the common law? It was that restraint which was placed upon publications by necessitating a consultation with some one before publication took place as to whether it came within certain prohibitions, as to whether or not it was in harmony with the public welfare, as to whether or not it would serve the interest of the common good of the public. That was regarded as a restraint previous to publication. The court says that that is the restraint which was inhibited by the Constitution; and about that I understand there is no difference of opinion.

Does not this provision prohibit a publication until you have consulted either directly with a censor or one who establishes his regulations, one who determines for himself, and does not permit the publisher to determine whether it is contrary to law and whether or not it is in contravention of the public welfare? You must before the publication consult some one else, and that some one else, whatever you may call him, is censor, is the licensor and the grantor of privileges to publish upon certain occasions and upon certain subjects.

I read from the dissenting opinion on this matter from Justice Harlan. I think the dissenting opinion is quite as illuminating as is the majority opinion, and about as authoritative, since the majority opinion seems to be dicta:

But the court announces that it leaves undecided the specific question whether there is to be found in the fourteenth amendment a prohibition as to the rights of free speech and a free press similar to that in the first. It yet proceeds to say that the main purpose of such constitutional provisions was to prevent all such "previous restraints" upon publications as had been practiced by other Governments, but not to to the public welfare. I can not assent to that view, if it be meant prevent the subsequent punishment of such as may be deemed contrary that the legislature may impair or abridge the rights of a free press and of free speech whenever it thinks that the public welfare requires that to be done. The public welfare can not override constitutional privileges, and if the rights of free speech and of a free press are, in their essence, attributes of national citizenship, as I think they are, then neither Congress nor any State since the adoption of the fourteenth amendment can, by legislative enactments or by judicial action, impair or abridge them.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator please state the volume from which he is reading?

Mr. BORAH. I am reading from Two hundred and fifth United States, at page 462.

Mr. KNOX and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I am anxious to understand the course of the Senator's argument, and I am not questioning him for the purpose of combating it, but merely to develop it, in order that I may thoroughly grasp his meaning.

Now, does not the Senator think that the first sentence of subdivision (c), which the Senator has read several times, "Whoever, in time of war, in violation of regulations," is not susceptible of a construction that would make it constitutional? It seems to me that the Senator's argument proceeds upon the theory that one of those regulations must necessarily be a censorship. I think it is susceptible of a construction wholly free from that. It might be in the form of a censorship, and if in the form of a censorship, that regulation would become perhaps unconstitutional; but is it not susceptible of a construction that would make it constitutional?

Mr. BORAH. It is possible that the court might find that there was some subject matter about which a regulation could be made which would be constitutional under this provision, assuming now that the general principle which I discussed is to be laid aside, which I am perfectly willing it shall be for the purpose of this argument; but let us see, Mr. President, in the practical workings of this matter how it would operate. Bear in mind that liberty of speech is quite as well protected by the Constitution as the press. If you undertake to establish regulations which avoids liberty of the press and liberty of speech, there will not be much left upon which the regulations may operate. Let us read again—and (c) whoever, in time of war, in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans, or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct, of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be, or which might be, useful to the enemy * * *: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

When you construe the first statement, "whoever, in time of war, in violation of regulations," in connection with the proviso which uses terms which relate to publications particularly and to public discussions, such as would come in the newspapers naturally, it would be very difficult for the court, particularly giving a fair construction to it, not to say that the legislature intended to cover the whole subject matter, and that the statute is not so separated in its terms and separated in its elements that one part of it could fall and the other stand.

Mr. KNOX. Will the Senator permit me further to interrupt him?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. KNOX. It seems to me, if you eliminate the subproviso, which I think destroys the proviso altogether, that in reading this proviso the idea was that it was not probable that the regulation would take the form of a censorship, because the proviso says that it shall not be construed "to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for"—referring to the regulations which the President is empowered to make under the provisions of this bill—"limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government."

It seems to me that is wholly inconsistent with the mischiefs that the Senator seems to think that he sees following the power to make these regulations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment, before the Senator from Connecticut interrupts. Let us see about this. The proviso reads:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government—

But all other subject matters, whether or not they are those which the proviso covers, are clearly, according to a fair construction, within the power of the President to cover by regulations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it seems to me to be very obvious that this proviso protects nothing except editorial discussion.

Mr. FLETCHER. Or criticism—"discussion, comment, or criticism."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It, of course, has no relation to the publication of news. It protects merely the editorial field.

Mr. BORAH. That is the least important matter in a newspaper, in so far as these questions are concerned.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I agree entirely with what the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has said. The proviso simply allows discussion and criticism of Government policies.

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, no; the Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let us see if I am.

Mr. FLETCHER. It covers "discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I supposed the Senator from Idaho had yielded to me.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator, but I should like to avoid having other Senators in my time debating details.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to take up details.

Mr. BORAH. I will be glad to have the Senator make his statement, because I am in harmony with his views.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to ask the Senator from Idaho, in relation to the question asked him by the Senator from Pennsylvania, as to whether or not this would result in the establishment of a censorship? If I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania correctly, he thought it was susceptible of the construction that it might not; but, as it seems to me, the third line of subdivision (c), under which anybody who shall publish any of these things in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President of the United States is subject to the penalties, is an attempt to establish a censorship.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course it is intended to establish a censorship. It would not be here if it were not for that purpose. No one has concealed the fact that it is intended to establish a censorship.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator if he does not think he could present the argument more potently and clearly if there were not so many interruptions? The Senator is making a very fine argument upon a very important question, and I think perhaps he could state his views with greater precision, and more coherently, if interruptions were postponed until its completion.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator, but I always desire to accommodate my colleagues even at the expense of my argument. At the risk of being somewhat disconnected, I desire to call attention to some views from Cooley's Constitutional Limitations. On page 603 the author says:

Besides, it is well understood and received as a commentary on this provision for the liberty of the press, that it was intended to prevent all such previous restraints upon publications as had been practiced by other governments, and in early times here, to stifle the efforts of patriots toward enlightening their fellow subjects upon their rights and the duties of rulers. The liberty of the press was to be unrestrained, but he who used it was to be responsible in case of its abuse; like the right to keep firearms, which does not protect him who uses them for annoyance or destruction.

As I understand the word "unrestrained" there, it means that the Constitution inhibits setting up anyone to whom it is my duty as a publisher or speaker to go and consult as to what shall be published or said; the setting up of anyone who can establish regulations as to what shall be published or as to the liberty of speech or as to what shall be communicated. "Unrestrained" means that one can publish what he sees fit and consult no one else previous to publication. If, indeed, he does publish something which is libelous, he takes the result in the way of punishment; but he consults himself and his own wishes, his own will, and decides whether it is libelous and takes the chances. He decides whether it will give the enemy aid, and takes his chances. The law can only deal with the subsequent fact after publication, and can not, under the guise of protecting the public interest, create a censorship that shall determine for one whether or not he is taking chances in publishing an article. The court might decide that it was not contrary to the public interest; the court might decide that it was not calculated to benefit the public enemy; but the censor decides otherwise, and then under this provision the publisher violates the regulation.

So much, Mr. President, for the legal phase of this matter. I want to say a few words in regard to the policy of it. I suppose it will be conceded that here we are all Americans and thoroughly in accord with the idea that we should leave nothing undone which we can do properly or wisely to prevent information reaching those with whom we are at war. I assume that no one could for a moment in this Chamber harbor the idea that we should loosely permit information to go to the enemy which might be of benefit to him. I would want to go as far as one would need to go in order to protect that situation; but evil of that kind is not commensurate in its import with the evil which might flow from an abridgement of the freedom of the press.

Edwin Burke once said:

> It is right that there should be a clamor whenever there is an abuse. The fire bell at midnight disturbs your sleep, but it keeps you from being burned in your bed. The hue and cry alarms the country, but it preserves all the property of the Province.

We may suppose ourselves capable of seeing the evils of a free press or free speech, but it is almost impossible to even outline in the way of suggestions the benefits of a free press and free speech. Hence the wisdom of the ages is that we should permit unrestrained use of the printed page and speech and punish alone for abuse.

Sir James McIntosh in the Peltier case observed as follows:

> To inform the public on the conduct of those who administer public affairs requires courage and conscious security. It is always an invidious and obnoxious office, but it is often the most necessary of all public duties. If it is not done boldly, it can not be done effectually, and it is not from writers trembling under the uplifted scourge that we are to hope for it.

How exceedingly wise! What is the press or speech worth if fear, indefinite power to punish ever accompany the use?

Lord Northcliffe by publications in England stirred the nation from center to circumference, exposed the ineptitude—the almost criminal ineptitude—of some who had charge of the nation's affairs. Could he not have been punished under this bill? Will anyone contend that the London Times, in the days when Lord Northcliffe was revolutionizing the situation with reference to the fighting forces of England, could have been published under this proposed statute? Does anyone doubt that if Lord Northcliffe had not made those publications in all probability the English Army would have broken down or suffered incalculably? Has there been a greater and more distinct service rendered to the cause of English arms than has been rendered by the English press? All this would undoubtedly have been inhibited under this provision of this proposed statute.

Go back to another service performed by the London Times in the Crimean War. The publications made by that paper at that time not only changed for the better the situation with reference to the contest and mercilessly exposed those who were incapable of carrying the arms to success, but so exposed the aristocracy of England in its criminal incapacity that it was the initiatory step in the great democratic movement in England which led to the enfranchisement of the people 10 years afterwards.

I could come closer home for illustrations, but it would perhaps be a breach of taste to do so.

Mr. President, in this struggle of democracy, in this crusade for free institutions, let us hold fast among ourselves to those great underlying principles of freedom and liberty without which we may be a Republic in name, but could never be one in fact. Without an unfettered press, without liberty of speech, all the outward forms and structures of free institutions are a sham, a pretense—the sheerest mockery. If the press is not free; if speech is not independent and untrammeled; if the mind is shackled or made impotent through fear, it makes no difference under what form of government you live you are a subject and not a citizen. Republics are not in and of themselves better than other forms of government except in so far as they carry with them and guarantee to the citizen that liberty of thought and action for which they were established.

Of all times in time of war the press should be free. That of all occasions in human affairs calls for a press vigilant and bold, independent and uncensored. Better to lose a battle than to lose the vast advantage of a free press. A free and independent press, as historic incidents show, may be of greater service than any other single feature of a great conflict.

In times of war corruption and venality, sordidness and greed are always active, always prevalent. I know of very few exceptions. It was so in the Civil War when the Union seemed to be going to pieces. It was true—notoriously and brazenly true—during the Spanish-American War. Men were fed on diseased food that greed might riot in its profits. Everywhere, in high places and low places, men were spying about for a chance to take advantage of the patriotic people engaged in defending the honor of their country. I know of nothing more important to a free people in time of war, in time of great stress, than a free press.

I think one of the greatest services we can render the cause of democracy just now is to demonstrate to the world that a Republic can carry on war, defend itself effectively and triumphantly without recurring to the practices and procedures of absolute governments. The most interesting and at the same time the saddest features of this war to me, aside from the suffering and sacrifices of those engaged, has been the haste with which the freer, more liberal governments have adopted the arbitrary and dictatorial policies and practices of the most absolute of governments. There are no democracies at this hour in this conflict, whatever may be the outward form or whatever the fact was before the war, and whatever the fact may be after the war. It is certainly not for me to suggest that things could have been otherwise and that these arbitrary and absolute measures were unnecessary, for I have no reason to challenge the good faith of those who have risked all in this struggle. But I am sure if the time is to come when we shall have to follow in that course that time has not yet arrived. I do not believe that time will ever come. I think if danger should become more imminent and the situation more perilous that the patriotism, the active and self-imposed censorship of the press will meet in full the demands of the hour. I think the individual citizen will measure up to the occasion. I at least want to try out this situation to the end and see if a Republic may not be a Republic in war as well as a Republic in peace. I shall not have much faith in our institutions if they are fitted only to sail in serene seas and wholly unable to withstand the storm.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I agree with a great deal of what has been said by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I do think we ought not to allow our patriotism and our earnest desire to sustain the President and our country in the war which we have recognized exists to make us forgetful of the rights of the citizens of the United States and willing to abandon them.

This paragraph, under the usual practice, will not be acted upon at this time. It was passed over and will be taken up after the completion of the bill; but I wish to suggest some amendments, that they may go into the RECORD, without really having made up my own mind as to whether I will vote for the paragraph after it is so amended.

In the first place, I object to everything in it, except as it applies to the press. The provision that I would be guilty of a penal offense if I should attempt to elicit from anybody, even in a casual conversation, information with regard to anything connected with the war which might be useful to the enemy if the enemy knew it to me is rather shocking. I could not vote for such a provision. I could not vote for a bill with such a provision in it. It goes, I think, beyond all reason or justification.

I think we ought to strike out "collect" and "record," in line 23, before the word "publish." I think we ought to strike out "or communicate," after the word "publish." I think we ought to strike out, in line 24, "or attempt to elicit." I think we ought to leave it simply applying to publications.

What was really in the minds, I think, of those who framed this provision was to prevent the publication in the newspapers of such matter as was likely to reach the enemy through the publications, and calculated to do harm; but it goes much beyond that. I would certainly strike out, in line 6 on page 9, "or which might be." As it reads, it makes criminal the attempt to elicit any information relating to the public defense which might be useful to the enemy if known by the enemy. I certainly think we are going far enough when we put the inhibition upon something that is calculated, if found out by the enemy, to do harm. If the bare proposition that it might possibly be of use, if found out by the enemy, is to be embodied in this provision, you would almost be placed in such a position, according to its terms, that you would hesitate to ask of anybody any kind of question that pertained to the war or to matters connected with the war.

If we should limit it to publications and strike out "or which might be," what would we do? We would make it illegal to publish matter which was calculated to be of use to the enemy, except under regulations prescribed by the President, and we would then go one step further and provide—

That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

That would leave it in a reasonable shape. That would reach the evil, I think, which we have in view.

I doubt whether that could be considered an abridgment of the freedom of the press. I think that would limit it to acts which would be in their nature treason. For a newspaper to publish to any considerable extent information calculated to help the enemy could certainly be carried to a point where such publication would be treason; and I submit for the consideration of the Senate, not desiring to continue the discussion of this paragraph further, whether we could not confine the limitation to publications calculated to be of service to the enemy, under such rules and regulations as the President might prescribe.

I suppose we will return to this paragraph after we have finished the bill, and at that time there may be a motion to strike it out.

I have not made up my mind whether I will vote for the motion to strike it out completely or not. If it is left as it is, I know I will; but if it can be modified along the lines I have suggested, unless there is some objection to it still with such modifications, I think if we can we should provide a means by which there can be some restriction upon the publication of news items calculated to help the enemy.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator if he thinks it is possible for the President or anybody else to sit down now and formulate rules and regulations which will give to all the writers for the press for the next year information which will guide them as to what will be of use to the enemy if they should write it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all, and I think probably no rule or regulation at all ought to be issued now. It might be found, however, that certain classes of shipments going from this country and going through the war zone were subject to greater danger if publicity was given to the facts connected with them. Thereupon, under this bill, a regulation as to the nature of those publications, just one simple regulation, might be made by the President, placing some limitation upon them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; but I mean as to all the thousands of pieces of news and rumors that are going to originate in this country for the next year. How in the world can a newspaper man know, by any form of words that the President may issue in the shape of a regulation, whether the story that he wants to print comes within the prohibition of this act or not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would be utterly impossible; and nothing is illegal until the regulation is made under this act.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know; but I am saying, suppose the President makes a regulation in general terms, and then all these men who want to print stories in relation to the war, or in relation to our military activities, are unable to tell whether the particular story that they want to print is covered by the regulation or not. They are all left to print at their peril. Now, it seems to me that if we have constitutional authority to enact this sort of a statute at all, there ought to be somebody who would have authority to whom the newspaper men could submit their proposed articles and get authority to print them; at least, it seems to me so. I can not conceive of hundreds of thousands of newspaper men, some deciding that they can print without violating the President's regulations and others deciding that they can not, some willing to take the risk and others not, some newspapers having the advantage of publication of these things and others, more prudent, declining to print them. It seems to me it would give rise to chaos.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Answering the Senator, Mr. President, I repeat that I do not commit myself to vote for this paragraph, even with the amendments I suggest. What I had in mind was that the President would not issue any great set of rules and regulations, but he might issue a particular rule with reference to some particular class of publications, specifying the exact matter the publication of which in the particular situation was injurious and dangerous.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He might, but nobody knows what he would do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, if that is the situation, then perhaps we had better not do it at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If I thought he would issue a great general set of rules at once undertaking to cover the subject, then I would not vote for the section with any kind of an amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why should we not, then, I will ask the Senator, simply provide what we want to prohibit, in terms sufficiently general at least to cover the cases that we wish to prohibit, and then make it a criminal offense to violate that law, and cut out entirely every provision relating to the rules to be prescribed by the President?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if some one can prepare with reasonable accuracy a provision of that kind I would vastly prefer it to section "(c)" amended in any possible way.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am certain that the Senator himself could prepare it by reading over this bill, seeing what its intent and purposes are, and then covering the subject matter by sufficiently clear legislation to make it a law and then punish the violation of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before we get back to the section again I hope some one will undertake to do it. I only desired at this time to throw out some criticisms upon the section and to suggest the only way that I saw to trim it down and yet leave it possibly satisfactory.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter into a very extended discussion of this matter, but briefly to call the attention of the Senate to what I conceive to be our power and authority in the premises. Before I proceed, however, I want to suggest to the Senators who have had this colloquy how simple this matter of regulation seems to me.

President Roosevelt, during his administration, had the habit of calling in the newspaper men every day and giving them whatever information he could. Now, the President and the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War can make arrangements to call in the newspaper men every day and give them such information in respect to the operations of our Army and Navy, and all that pertains to our military operations, as may be deemed safe and proper.

I put a question yesterday to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who was for years the Secretary of State. I said, "Has not the President the right, in respect to the diplomatic correspondence and other matters in the hands of the State Department, to prohibit the information being made public?" Certainly he has. When our country is engaged in war the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy has exactly the same power in respect to the military and naval secrets of the Government that the President has in respect to diplomatic affairs.

Mr. President, I am sorry there are not more Senators here whose memory goes back to the days of the Civil War. Mine does. I remember well how the movements of our Army were constantly hampered because of the daily publicity that was given to all our movements and all our preparations by the press of the country. They had reporters from most of the leading papers of the country with every army in the field and they would report every movement. It would be published in their papers the next morning and the following morning those papers would be at Richmond, Va. The same thing happened with the Confederates. The Senator from North Carolina called my attention the other day to the manner in which the Confederate Army was handicapped by it in one instance, namely, the first movement of Lee into Maryland, leading to the Antietam campaign. To my mind one of the greatest injuries that happened to us during the war was the constant advertising of the public press, and of course there went to the enemy all the movements and transactions of our troops.

Now, it is not the purpose of this bill to deprive the newspapers of any just criticism—nothing of the kind. It is the purpose of the bill to prevent information of the organization of our Army and Navy, of their movements on sea and land, and to keep the enemy in the dark as far as possible. Congress under the Constitution has the power to declare war, and a part of that power is to equip and supply the country with all the necessary means and appliances necessary to carry on that war successfully. It is the duty of Congress, after they have declared war, to see to it that all military and naval appliances necessary to make the war a success are provided for, and one of the most necessary essentials, to my mind, is to prevent information in respect to the movements of our Army and Navy to be passed up to the enemy. That is a part of the authority of Congress under the war-making power.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota, in view of the grant to the Federal Government to carry on war, if in the prosecution of that grant there is a conflict between the power given to the Federal Government and some power reserved by the State would not the exercise of the power to the Federal Government be paramount, and would it not have the right to submerge the right of the State in the exercise of that grant of power?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly; and I shall point out briefly that these constitutional rights of the liberty of the press and of free speech and of personal liberty are all subrogated to this higher authority.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is one clause of the Constitution which says that we shall "provide for the common defense," and that is all this bill is doing, in time of war.

Mr. NELSON. Yes. As I said a moment ago, Mr. President, it is our duty, having declared war, to equip and fit out all our military and naval forces in the most efficient manner to carry on the war, and one of the essentials we have to provide for besides powder, shot, shell, aeroplanes, submarines, and torpedo destroyers is to protect our soldiers and sailors from any fire in the rear by having information carried to the enemy of the movements and operations of our fleet. So I say, Mr. President, under this power of declaring war and carrying on war we have ample power to legislate in such a manner as to protect the country from having this information in any shape or manner, either privately or through the public press, conveyed to the enemy.

It is important, Mr. President, to keep the enemy in the dark as to our movements, for then if the enemy strike us they will be striking in the dark, in the mist, in the fog, as it were, and they will be unable to cause the havoc and destruction they would if they should attack us with their eyes open as to all our movements. And so with us, Mr. President, if we are the attacking force, it is of the utmost importance that we should be in such a position that our attack would be a surprise to the enemy rather than have them forewarned in advance.

Mr. President, the highest power possessed by the Government is called by the courts the police power. The name seems rather belittling, but it is the highest and the supreme power, the power that goes to sustain the vitality and force and life of the Government in all great emergencies.

I desire to quote in this connection a few brief authorities. I quote from the case of Patterson v. Kentucky (97 U. S., 504). Here is what the court said:

> By the settled doctrines of this court the police power extends, at least, to the protection of the lives, the health, and the property of the community against the injurious exercise by any citizen of his own rights.

I quote the following from Chief Justice Redfield, of Vermont, one of the ablest lawyers of his day in the country. In the case of Thorpe v. Rutland & Burlington Railroad Co. (27 Vermont, 149, 150) he said that the police power extends—> to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property * * * and persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity * * *. Of the perfect right of the legislature to do this no question ever was or, upon acknowledged general principles, ever can be made.

Mr. President, the Federal Government exercises the police power in aid of and under the war power. Our Government is at this moment exercising war power in legislation, and in the exercise of that power we resort to the police power. You had an illustration of that a short time ago in the decision of the Supreme Court on the Adamson law. Under the power to regulate commerce the police power of the Federal Government, the Supreme Court held that our Government has not only the right to regulate the transportation rates, but it has the right to regulate the wages and hours of labor of the trainmen, and in that way it established the doctrine which has been disputed and contended against—the doctrine of compulsory arbitration in disputes of that character.

In cases of great emergency, when we have to resort to the police power, all the other rights that are referred to are subrogated to this ultimate power, which involves the life and safety of the country.

I want to quote in this connection from the opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan on this subject. It is very apt and appropriate. It is found in the case of Jacobson v. Massachusetts (197 U. S., 29). Justice Harlan says in the opinion of the court:

> But it is equally true that in every well-ordered society charged with the duty of conserving the safety of its members the rights of the individual in respect of his liberty may at times, under the pressure of great dangers, be subjected to such restraint, to be enforced by reasonable regulations, as the safety of the general public may demand. An American citizen, arriving at an American port on a vessel in which during the voyage there had been cases of yellow fever or Asiatic cholera, although apparently free from disease himself, may yet, in some circumstances, be held in quarantine against his will on board of such vessel or in a quarantine station until it be ascertained by inspection, conducted with due diligence, that the danger of the spread of the disease among the community at large has disappeared.

Now, listen to this—

> The liberty secured by the fourteenth amendment, this court has said, consists, in part, in the right of a person "to live and work where he will," and yet he may be compelled, by force, if need be, against his will and without regard to his personal wishes or his pecuniary interests, or even his religious or political convictions, to take his place in the ranks of the army of his country and risk the chance of being shot down in its defense. It is not, therefore, true that the power of the public to guard itself against imminent danger depends in every case involving the control of one's body upon his willingness to submit to reasonable regulations established by the constituted authorities, under the sanction of the State, for the purpose of protecting the public collectively against such danger.

In other words, the effect of this decision is that these personal rights, the right of personal liberty as conferred by the Constitution of the United States in the fifth amendment, are all subrogated to this supreme power in the State, this power of self-preservation exercised for the time being under the war power of the Government. The right of free speech, the right of the press, the right of personal liberty are all subrogated to this supreme and paramount power.

Mr. President, the Constitution nowhere in express terms makes an American citizen liable to military service. I have not found any express language in the Constitution making me or any other citizen liable to military service; but yet, under the war power, under the power to organize armies and call out the militia, and to provide rules and regulations for governing them, Congress has the power to enforce military service, to enforce compulsory service, to enact a law compelling every citizen to perform his duty as a soldier. Yet, nowhere in the Constitution do you find any express declaration that every citizen is liable to military service.

Now, what would you think, Mr. President, if a man who is drawn as a soldier under a law that we are about to pass should come up to the recruiting officer and quote the fifth amendment? I will read so much of it as applies here: "Nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Would that article of the Constitution be very effective in that instance if the recruit called for walked up to the recruiting officer and said, "My dear sir, here is the fifth amendment; you have no right to deprive me of my liberty without due process of law; I am immune from military service"?

Mr. President, talk about free speech. Suppose an orator of the I. W. W., the Industrial Workers of the World, is standing on a street corner on top of a dry-goods box or a barrel leaning against a lamp-post and is harranguing the crowd and getting a mob there, inducing them to raise a riot leading to bloodshed and the destruction of property. He gets them all excited and worked up by his speech. Is there no power in the Government to deprive that fellow of free speech? Must we lie back supinely and let that brother talk until his throat is hoarse and until the mob have wrought destruction in the street and upon the town or the city? It is the most preposterous thing in the world. So you may apply the same to the press. Suppose a newspaper operates on the lines of that orator of the Industrial Workers of the World. Suppose he proceeds on the same theory. Suppose he goes as far as my good friend the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] suggested, on the verge of treason, is the country helpless? Can you do nothing more than prosecute him after the offense? Must we lie supinely by and let him carry on his free will in the future? Can we not stop that publication? If he is traveling in the field of treason can we not stop it just as much as we can stop the street orator to whom I referred? Mr. President, to contend for any other doctrine than that would be to make our country as helpless and impotent as it was in its original state before the European settlers settled in this country.

So, Mr. President, to summarize briefly what I have contended for, Congress has a right to declare war. To declare war entails upon us the duty of providing all means, equipment, and facilities necessary to carry on the war. As a part of those necessary means, we must provide our Army in the field and our sailors on the sea; we must protect our Army and our sailors from any backfire, from people at home, that might result from giving information to the enemy of the movements of our troops or our vessels. It is as essential, Mr. President, as it is to equip our soldiers with powder and bullets, with guns and artillery, and all that pertains to modern warfare.

Mr. President, my heart goes out to the soldiers and sailors of this country. I think our first duty is to protect them instead of protecting a few newsmongers, publishers, men who are prowling around for curiosity to get information that may be exploited in the public press or otherwise.

I think our supreme duty on this occasion, Mr. President, is to look after the welfare of our soldiers and sailors and fortify them against all such fire in the rear as is embraced in the contention of some of the orators in this Chamber.

This war, Mr. President, has led to one curious thing. It has compelled the soldiers of the allies to protect themselves with masks against poisonous gases. Mr. President, I think we owe it as a duty to protect our own men, our soldiers and sailors, in like manner against the gases of these newsmongers, these publishers here. We had better pass legislation that will operate like the gas masks in Europe to protect our soldiers and sailors against the insidious attacks of these men.

Oh, Mr. President, a spirit of old times comes over me. I can not help it. During the Civil War, when we were sitting around the camp fires singing our songs, I remember a part of one Army song that was near and dear to us:

Tell the traitors all around you
That their cruel words, we know,
In every battle kill our soldiers
By the aid they give the foe.

So, Mr. President, I would say here, giving this information through these newsmongers, through these publicity bureaus, giving them a free hand, will simply play into the hands of the enemy, and it would lead to what our soldiers felt during the Civil War in many instances—

Brave boys are they,
Gone at their country's call—

They will be going—

And yet we can not forget
That many brave boys must fall.

Mr. President, as an old soldier I feel that I owe a duty to the young men who are now about to enter our Army and Navy and to carry on our country to victory. It seems to me to belittle the subject to take the ground which has been taken by some Senators in this Chamber.

Now, what is there in this paragraph? Have we a czar? I am not afraid to trust President Wilson. We have trusted the Secretary of the Treasury with the issue of $5,000,000,000 of bonds. We are going to intrust him with appropriations amounting to perhaps a billion and a half more. We have got to leave discretion somewhere in time of war. I have confidence and faith that these public officials in this emergency will perform their duties honestly and fairly, and that if we enact this legislation the President will exercise his power with discretion and moderation. I am not afraid that he will not do so.

I heard Senators admit in a kind of a mild milk-and-water way that some rule ought to be adopted. I ask those Senators to sit down and frame a set of rules that seems to be commensurate. The truth of it is, Mr. President, it can not be done. You have got to leave the discretion to the President or somebody else; and I imagine that the discretion will be exercised exactly in the way I indicated at the outset of my remarks. The President and the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War—none of them connected with the public press of the country—will day by day hold a short seance with the newspaper men, call them up, give them all the information they feel is safe, and when it is given to them in that way the newspapers are perfectly safe in publishing it. If the newspapers want any more the Government says to them, "No; I do not think it is safe; I do not think it is prudent to give any more information." Is not that a correct way, and is not that the way that it likely this provision of the law will be carried out? I can not conceive how it is possible to lay down any specific or general rule in advance. You can not prescribe just what items of news shall be published from day to day. You can not lay down any general rule about it. The discretion in the matter must be left to the heads of the War and Navy Departments and to the President of the United States.

Now, my friends, I am not here to criticize the newspapers. Most of the public press of the country have acted, especially lately, with a calmness and a discretion and a prudence that have done them great credit. We know little to-day; the papers convey no information to us in respect to the movement of our fleet. None of us can point out where our battleships are located, or where our submarines are, or where our submarine base is. The newspapers are practicing great restraint, and I know they will practice the same in the future.

But unfortunately among them, as among other classes in life, there are a few on the outer verge, a set of men whom you may call newspaper guerillas, who for the sake of getting notoriety, for the sake of exploiting their circulation, will resort to any method and any means to secure surreptitiously any information that it is possible for them to get and publish it and show how they beat the regular papers. It is those men we must reach. It is like the law against larceny. We pass a law prohibiting larceny and punishing it. We do not suppose everybody is going to steal, but there may be a few who will. So in this case we pass this law, not because we think all the newspapers are going to violate it—nothing of the kind; the best of them never will; the best of them will never criticize this legislation—but we aim to reach a class of newspapers which, I am thankful to say, are not numerous in this country, and they are becoming less and less every day, and we aim to hold the check upon them, as is necessary in time of war.

In this connection—and I intended to call attention to it when I was discussing the liberty of the press—I ask leave to insert in my remarks a very brief quotation which I will read from the case of Gompers against The Buck Stove & Range Co., Two hundred and twenty-first United States, 434. The court is discussing the question of boycotting, and it says:

And that the constitutional right of free speech and free press does not extend to securing immunity to the boycotter in such cases is so well settled and declared by the courts as to render citations unnecessary.

So in this case, if for the safety and well-being of our Naval and Army forces it be necessary to keep information from the enemy, he who is guilty of conveying information to the enemy is guilty of a crime, and he gets no immunity, as the court held in those cases under the paragraph of the Constitution relating to freedom of speech or freedom of the press. All these great constitutional rights, as I have said, Mr. President, in an emergency are subrogated to the ultimate and supreme police power of preserving the life, the integrity, and the existence of our Nation.

Mr. JOHNSON of California obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator from California yield to me long enough to enable me to offer an amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to suggest, for the consideration of the committee, a proposed amendment to the pending section. On page 8, line 13, I propose to strike out the words "or supposed plans"; in line 18, on the same page, I propose to strike out the words "or which might be"; and beginning with subdivision (c), in line 20, I propose to strike out everything down to and including the word "imprisonment," in line 9, on page 9. I will discuss my amendment hereafter. I thank the Senator from California for his courtesy.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I simply desire to register a very cordial and enthusiastic approval of what was said yesterday by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and what has been said to-day by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] concerning the policy of the particular enactment under discussion. So far as I am concerned, I would prefer to eliminate from this measure everything after the parenthetical "c," in line 20, on page 8, down to and including the end of that particular section.

I favor doing this not from any particular tenderness for the press of the Nation; I am not greatly concerned with the press in this discussion. A decent and a self-respecting press will in time of war censor itself, and will not give aid or comfort to the enemy; and a decent and a self-respecting press, true to its traditions and true to the spirit of America, will not be deterred by any law from honest and legitimate discussion and criticism.

I am concerned chiefly with the right of free speech, with the very preservation of democracy itself. This is neither a partisan war nor a war of a part of our people. This is an American war of all our people, and America is the light to all the world in demoocracy.

War is the natural enemy of freedom and democracy. We have already conferred practically autocratic powers financially; we doubtless shall in the future, where imperative necessity demands it, accord extraordinary and unheard-of powers to our President; but we must stop short of successful assault upon democracy's basic principles. No free people should be subjected to undefined and indefinable laws. To subject a people to unwritten penal statutes, resting from day to day in the bosom of any one man, however exalted, in nebulous and elastic language, even where no evil intent exists by construction of any one official, however high and highly respected, to make felons of our people, is an excursion into autocracy in America that can not be justified or excused by our desire to destroy autocracy in Europe.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I wish briefly to express the manner in which the question under discussion appeals to me. At the outset I send to the desk to have read by the Secretary an amendment which in due time I hope to propose to subdivision (c), the subdivision under consideration. Down to the beginning of the committee amendment on page 9, in this proposed substitute, I propose to strike out some of the series of acts which are made offenses under the subdivision. I propose to strike out certain phraseology alluded to by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] a while ago, and by the striking out of which he proposed to amend the subdivision. Before proceeding I should like to have the amendment read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota sends to the desk an amendment to be proposed by him at a later time, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized in time of war to make and promulgate such reasonable regulations as he shall deem necessary to prevent the publication or communication of any knowledge, fact, or information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct of the naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures connected with or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, which might be of use to the enemy, or any other information relating to the public defense which might be of such use. Any person who violates any regulation so made and promulgated shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or be imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or by both fine and imprisonment.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, it will thus be seen that I propose to strike out the words "collect and record" and the words "or attempt to elicit any information," these being under this subdivision distinct offenses. I think the gist of the section is the publication or communication of any fact, knowledge, or information that may be useful to the enemy. So I have left the words "publication or communication of such facts or information" as the offense or offenses to be covered by the subdivision. I have also proposed to strike out the words "or supposed plans or conduct" as being unnecessary. I had thought to make clearer the intent or purport of the bill by inserting in line 5, after the word "place," the words "which might be of use to the enemy," there having been some question about that in the discussions of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. President, it seems to me the questions with which we should concern ourselves in considering this subdivision (c) are largely these, namely: Might the publication of knowledge or information in regard to the movement of our troops be useful to the enemy? Might it be useful to them in enabling them to concentrate their own forces in order to meet, and possibly to overcome, our own forces? The paragraph refers to the description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces. This, then, is the question: Might the publication of knowledge or information in regard to the disposition of the armed forces of the United States be useful to the enemy and enable the enemy to meet those forces as they are so disposed according to the information given? Might the information in regard to any of the plans of the naval or military forces of the United States be useful to the enemy if published, if made known to the enemy? That is the question. Might any of the works or measures relating to our fortifications or to any part of our national defense be useful to the enemy if published? If so, Mr. President, we ought to have the power to prevent that publication or to prevent the knowledge or information on the part of the enemy that such was the condition with reference to the movements, numbers, or disposition of our forces, land or naval.

Who will say, Mr. President, that such publication might not be useful to the enemy and as a consequence most injurious to our forces on land or on sea? If such be the conditions, then there must be the power inherent somewhere to prevent a publication that will be of use to the enemy in time of war. The territorial integrity, the sovereignty even, of the Nation may ultimately be dependent upon a prohibition against the enemy's obtaining this information.

Mr. President, whatever may be said in regard to the guaranties of the Constitution, in regard to the Bill of Rights as it protects the freedom of speech or of the press, they must be subordinate, after all, to the national integrity, to the national sovereignty, and to the principle of self-preservation. Hence, as a necessary war measure, and for the protection of that integrity and national sovereignty, indeed, it may be for our own self-preservation, the possession of the power of preventing information concerning our military resources and plans is necessary. I have no doubt as to the existence of the power, and this subdivision is to confer upon the President the right to exercise it. That is the simple purpose of subdivision (c). We would make a great mistake, I think, Mr. President, if we were to strike out the main features of subdivision (c), which are designed to prevent the publication or communication of any information in regard to our troops or our Navy which might be useful to the enemy.

Mr. President, much has been said here in regard to the guaranties of the Constitution. I want to call attention to a little something in our own history, and to the observations of a great foreign writer, no less a one than the former British ambassador to the United States, Mr. Bryce, in regard to the powers that have been exercised in the past in our country, and especially by the great Lincoln during the Civil War. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who has so vividly recalled to our minds the days and the perils of the Civil War will be reminded of some of what seemed to be stretches of power upon the part of the Executive during those perilous times. Mr. Bryce says, among other things:

The domestic authority of the President is in time of peace small, because by far the larger part of law and administration belongs to the State governments, and because Federal administration is regulated by statutes which leave little discretion to the Executive. In war time, however, and especially in a civil war, it expands with portentous speed. Both as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and as charged with the "faithful execution of the laws" the President is likely to be led to assume all the powers which the emergency requires. How much he can legally do without the aid of statutes is disputed, for the acts of President Lincoln during the earlier part of the War of Secession, including his proclamation suspending the writ of habeas corpus, were subsequently legalized by Congress; but it is at least clear that Congress can make him, as it did make Lincoln, almost a dictator.

Strange as it might seem, inappropriate as it might be, in time of peace to confer such tremendous powers upon the Executive, yet when the national life is in peril, or in any great war in which we are engaged, it is then the time that under—I will not say "under"—but aside from the Constitution, these sovereign powers may be invoked and exercised.

A further word from Mr. Bryce:

Now, the President has, during 99 years, carried on the internal administrative business of the Nation with due efficiency. Once or twice, as when Jefferson purchased Louisiana, and Lincoln emancipated the slaves in the revolted States, he has courageously ventured on stretches of authority, held at the time to be doubtfully constitutional, yet necessary, and approved by the judgment of posterity. He has kept the machinery working quietly, steadily when Congress has been distracted by party strife, or paralyzed by dissensions of the two Houses, or enfeebled by the want of first-rate leaders. The Executive has been able, at moments of peril, to rise almost to a dictatorship, as during the War of Secession—

And now, here are the words of assurance, which I think show there is no cause for the alarm expressed by some of the Senators who have spoken in opposition to this measure—and when peace returned, to sink back into its proper constitutional position. It has shown no tendency so to dwarf the other authorities of the State as to pave the way for a monarchy.

I quote further from Mr. Bryce:

If the case is not urgent, if there is no strong popular impulse behind Congress or the President, no paramount need for the usage which had sprung up and is now disapproved, the decision of the courts will be acquiesced in, and whatever tendency toward change exists will seek some other channel where no constitutional obstacle bars its course. But if the needs of the time be pressing, courts and Constitution may have to give way. Salus respublicae lex suprema—

The safety of the State, of the Republic, is the supreme law; and although it may seem to override the Constitution, it is a law inherent in every sovereignty. Mr. Bryce goes on to say:

Above that supreme written law stands the safety of the Commonwealth, which will be secured, if possible, in conformity with the Constitution; but if that be not possible, then by evading, or even by overriding the Constitution. This is what happened in the Civil War, when men said they would break the Constitution in order to preserve it.

I will quote one sentence from that remarkable letter written by Mr. Lincoln in 1864 to Mr. Hodges, in which he says:

I felt that measures, otherwise unconstitutional, might become lawful by becoming indispensable to the preservation of the Constitution through the preservation of the Nation.

Mr. President, the prohibiting of that publication or communication which would give information to the enemy of the movements, the numbers, the disposition of the armed forces of the United States, land or naval, and thus prove useful to the enemy, may be essential to the welfare—nay, the very existence—of the Nation, and I here, in favor of the main proposition involved in subdivision (c), invoke the principle of sovereignty and of self-preservation, confident in the belief that this is nothing more than a just and reasonable war measure.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I shall not take any time in discussing the policy of this proposed law. I can readily understand that Senators may differ as to its policy. I can readily understand, having been a lawyer myself, that it is particularly difficult for a lawyer to lay aside for a moment the ordinary rules of construction in discussing constitutional or legislative provisions. However, if we approach the subject now under discussion with the realization that all laws are intended for the government of society and individuals, in the regulation of their mutual association in times of peace, and that when it becomes necessary for the safety or self-defense of a people or of a government that such laws can be suspended as is provided directly in the Constitution, we can possibly apply the constitutional provisions to an emergency of this kind as we would not be able to see them or apply them otherwise.

We had a little experience, Mr. President, with a Government which was unable to protect itself from 1776 down to 1787. It became apparent to the people of the various States forming the Confederation that it was necessary to place the power of common defense and common welfare somewhere else than in the States themselves. For that reason the Constitution was framed and a preamble adopted setting forth the objects sought to be attained. We forget them, apparently, at times. The preamble provides:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

In framing the Constitution, the Convention, composed, I think, of the brightest minds in this country, and certainly of men who were the peers of any who ever sat in any convention or legislative body, proceeded to define the rights of the Union and the rights of the States within the Union and to insure the rights and privileges of the people of the Union. I asked the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] a question as to whether it was not true, in his judgment, that in matters relating to war the same rule of constitutional construction must be adopted with reference to the powers of the Congress of the United States that should be adopted with reference to a State constitution and the powers of the legislature thereunder. To my mind the same rule of construction applies, because the States have absolutely delegated to the National Congress the right to declare war, and, by their constitutional provisions, further agreed that neither of them should have any such right.

When war is declared, war exists in so far as this country and its inhabitants are concerned. Every American citizen to-day is, under the rules of war and the Constitution of the United States and the decisions of its courts, an enemy of every German citizen in Germany and of every Austrian, or of every citizen of the countries with which this country is at war, and some American citizens do not seem to realize that this is the status of a citizen. The men who framed the Constitution were the wisest men whom this country has ever known. It has been astounding to the commentators, to the law writers of the world, that they should have framed an instrument such as was issued by them and under which we have since lived. They did not restrict the Congress of the United States as to the legislation which it should adopt in carrying out its constitutional power and duty to provide for the defense of this country. They simply provided in broad terms that Congress should declare war, that Congress should provide for the defense of the country, that Congress should raise an army, that Congress should authorize the muster into the service of the militia of the States. Then they provided, following these war declarations, that the Congress should have the power to pass all laws necessary to enable these duties to be performed and these powers to become operative.

The Senators here are familiar with the different provisions of the Constitution. It is scarcely necessary, it seems to me, to call attention to the first portion of section 8:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

Well might it be suggested by a Senator upon the other side who agreed with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in his construction, and well might it be agreed to by the Senator from Idaho, that under this clause Congress might claim this authority; but under this further provision they distinctly have the authority, in my judgment:

> The Congress shall have power—
> Among other things—
> to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water; to raise and support armies; * * * to provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; to provide for calling forth the militia * * *; to provide for arganizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States—
> And, as I have read in the first part of this section—
> to provide for the common defense.

And no authority in this country but Congress and the Executive of the United States, under their present constitutional powers, can exercise these powers.

The President of the United States can make war in self-defense. The Congress of the United States can declare war. Then it becomes the duty of the Congress of the United States to provide every measure necessary for the proper carrying on of that war, not only abroad but at home, just as they propose to do now in the military bills which have been offered in each of these bodies. Those bills are within the constitutional powers of Congress. No one doubts it. It is their duty to provide them. It is their duty to give to the President of the United States the weapons with which he shall resent the injuries which have been heaped upon us and with which he shall defend this country, that it may live; and it is their duty, sir, as has been so well said by this old soldier [Mr. NELSON], to provide by legislation that they who are baring their breasts to the common foe shall not be attacked by an insidious enemy from behind. To assume for a moment that the Constitution of the United States would prohibit the passage of such an act as this is to assume that those who formed this Government knew not what they were doing, that their acts were futile, and that the Government itself is not capable of sustaining itself in time of peril.

The question as to whether or not this is necessary legislation is a question of policy. We may well, as I have said, differ upon that. I can understand readily how Senators may differ on it, and to the policy I am not addressing myself. To deny, however, the power of this Government to do anything necessary for its preservation is to deny the Government itself; it is to deny the work of our forefathers, and it is to deny the work of the men who saved the Union under Abraham Lincoln.

The emancipation proclamation was unconstitutional. It was made constitutional by the sword. I say to you now, sir, that when you invoke a constitutional provision against the power of the great American people to preserve their Government, to contend with a common foe, the arbitrament of the sword will decide the question.

All rules of law are set aside in the face of national necessity, of self-preservation. Treaties are the supreme law of the land, made so by the Constitution. A declaration of war wipes out a treaty of amity and commerce between the contending nations. A declaration of war creates a status. It is not the status of peace. The decisions against libel apply in time of peace. They do not apply in time of war. No other constitutional restriction or legislative action can be invoked in the effort to hamper the people of this great country in defending themselves, in perpetuating the Union, and in deputizing the necessary power to the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I merely wish at this time to offer some general considerations on the pending measure.

In a bill of this kind, which is distinctly a war measure, I think we ought to bear in mind the attitude in which we should approach its consideration.

Speaking in general terms, war and law are antagonistic. The rule of force and the rule of law do not harmonize together. In the history of Roman and English jurisprudence we find that during war law, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, is in a very large degree suspended. That is human nature. We would not lay it down as a broad rule, of course, that the Constitution of the United States is suspended during war, but as a matter of fact it is suspended to this extent, that acts which are committed in violation of the Constitution in time of national peril are acquiesced in by the people and ratified as legal.

We are dealing here, in this war measure, with the primal instincts of humanity and with what war means, and we must not lose sight of these facts. The Romans were great lawmakers, perhaps the greatest in the history of the world. The present codes of law of Europe are founded upon the Roman law. When war was declared in Rome, the first thing that was done was to appoint a dictator and suspend the municipal law for six months; and we find that principle running through the law down to the present time wherever a state of war exists.

Let me refer to one or two of the maxims familiar to all, but nevertheless pertinent to the spirit in which we should approach this legislation; for, after all, good legislation depends largely upon the spirit with which it is approached, and the decisions of the Supreme Court depend in large degree upon the spirit with which they interpret the Constitution, and thereby reflect the sound public opinion of society in its upward march to a higher civilization.

"In time of war the laws are silent." This applies as between the State and its external enemies, and also in case of civil disturbance. "The safety of the people is the supreme law." "Necessity makes lawful that which otherwise is unlawful." "Necessity controls the law." "Necessity is not restrained by law, since what otherwise is not lawful necessity makes lawful."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if it will not disturb the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COLT. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Because I entertain a very high opinion of the Senator's legal ability and learning, I venture to ask him if he really means to say that because the country is at war the ordinary constitutional guaranties are not in full force, validity, and effect and will not so remain up to the point when, as may happen, that martial law shall be declared? I fear that the Senator's language was so broad as to indicate that the Government can now, if it so desires, override or disregard the Constitution.

Mr. COLT. I have always found in life that if I tried to state anything clearly I usually went a little beyond what I may have intended to convey to others. I said that we ought to approach this measure, remembering that it was a war measure, and while I did not advance the doctrine that the Constitution and all municipal laws were suspended when war was declared, I did say that if it becomes necessary to suspend any of those laws, constitutional or otherwise, in order to save the Nation, it would be justified and would be ratified by the people.

Mr. REED. But would not the condition which the Senator has last adverted to arise only when there was actually such a condition of war in the country as to bring us within the doctrine of Ex parte Milligan, a case with which I know the Senator is familiar——

Mr. COLT. Yes.

Mr. REED (continuing). Which, as I understand it, lays down the doctrine that the Constitution of the United States retains full force and vigor until such time as the civil authorities shall be unable to cope with a situation, and that then, of course, martial law may be declared, and all that martial law means may be visited upon the country? But I ventured to interrupt the distinguished Senator to suggest that an erroneous doctrine is being preached in this country, and I was afraid the Senator's views might be quoted erroneously, perhaps, in support of it. That doctrine seems to be this: That because the United States is at war the Government can do anything that it pleases. I undertake to say that is unsound.

I am interrupting the Senator. Perhaps I ought not to. If it is entirely agreeable, I will conclude the sentence.

Mr. COLT. I am very glad to have the Senator interrupt me if I made a statement which he regards as too broad.

Mr. REED. I undertake to say that, although we have substantially declared war against Germany—we have declared that a condition of war exists—the Constitution of the United States, the constitutions of the various States of the Union, the laws of the United States, all stand unimpaired; that while Congress can change any statute of the United States, it can not add to or take from the Constitution, or impair or impinge upon any principle laid down in the Constitution, until and unless a condition of war has been created which has broken down or overcome the power of the civil authorities to maintain their usual functions, and that up to that time when martial law is declared the civil law and the Constitution remain; that Congress can not destroy the Constitution.

Now, to complete the statement, I do believe that the power of the Government, when we are in war, to carry on that war is a thing perhaps not subject in all respects to all those constitutional limitations which obtain in time of peace. That is to say, the power of the Government in time of war is in some respects broader than in time of peace. In still other words, the right to declare and carry on war carries with it certain very broad powers. Just how far we can go I am not at present prepared to say. I, however, express the hope the doctrine will not be given out here that it is necessary to destroy the Constitution of the United States, or to impair it in any way, or to destroy American liberty, or impair it in any way, in order to carry on this war. We are fighting a war for our national rights, for human rights, for democracy. In seeking to overthrow the citadel of autocracy let us not destroy the temple of democracy. It is not necessary to impair our Constitution in order to defend liberty.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I appreciate very much what the Senator from Missouri has said. I was simply stating the aspect in which I approached this bill by drawing attention to the distinction between law and war, and how they were somewhat irreconcilable. I did not lay down the proposition, and do not intend to advocate the proposition, that upon the declaration of war our constitutional and municipal laws are suspended. I did refer to certain legal maxims simply with this view, to show that in approaching this subject we are justified in giving enlarged powers to the General Government; and I did also lay down the proposition that even in the case of our organic law, where the preservation of the country was required, the people justified a violation of its provisions.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. COLT. The case of President Lincoln was referred to by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. In a letter to Mr. Hodges, cited in Bryce's American Commonwealth, dated April 4, 1864, President Lincoln said:

> My oath to preserve the Constitution imposed on me the duty of preserving by every indispensable means that Government, that Nation, of which the Constitution was the organic law. Was it possible to lose the Nation and yet preserve the Constitution? By general law life and limb must be protected, yet often a limb must be amputated to save a life, but a life is never wisely given to save a limb. I felt that measures, otherwise unconstitutional, might become lawful by becoming indispensable to the preservation of the Constitution through the preservation of the Nation. Right or wrong I assumed this ground, and now avow it. I could not feel that to the best of my ability I had even tried to preserve the Constitution if, to save slavery, or any minor matter, I should permit the wreck of Government, country, and Constitution all together.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. COLT. I yield, although I have only a few more words to say.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator whether he believes that at this time we have reached a stage in this war in which we should properly suspend the operation of the Constitution, or that it will be necessary or is necessary at the present time for us to grant to anyone any power that is not clearly within the constitutional rights?

Mr. COLT. I believe it is necessary to clothe the Government of the United States with the powers mentioned in Chapter II, section 3, of the bill which is before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. Can not that be done under the Constitution without suspending it?

Mr. COLT. I believe it can be done under the Constitution.

Referring to the Constitution, I take the position taken by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] that in those provisions conferring power upon Congress to declare war and other provisions relating to military affairs, and then the provision that Congress has power to enact any legislation necessary to carry these laws into effect—that these provisions, and especially the provision relating to war, which should be broadly construed, carry by necessary implication the power to enact this proposed legislation.

I want to say just one word more. From the point of view of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], we are dealing with the Bill of Rights in the Constitution, rights which should be preserved in all their broad outlines; but in the construction of these constitutional rights we should not adopt the narrow construction that prevails in the case of statutes.

We are here dealing with the framework of a great Government. Those provisions in the Constitution are expressed as they should be, in very general terms. In form, however, they are rigid formulæ. They must be made elastic. They were enacted 128 years ago. They must be made to apply to a moving body, to society, to this great Republic, which has increased from 13 to 48 States and from 5,000,000 to 100,000,000 of population, with changed social conditions, changed views as to many great problems, such as the problem whether society is to be regarded as made up of separate individual units or whether you are to consider society as a whole and look at the good of the whole and not merely the individual right of property and contract.

Those fundamental provisions in the Bill of Rights must be molded and interpreted as society advances. "It is a Constitution we are expounding," exclaimed Marshall, and he brushed aside all narrow rules of interpretation and clothed that instrument with flesh and blood in order that it might be made equal to the great purposes for which it was designed.

When you say freedom of the press, what does freedom mean? It means orderly freedom, does it not? Again, freedom of speech does not mean unlicensed speech. But however strict the construction might have been when those provisions were enacted, we must now, if necessary, enlarge their meaning in order to meet the great emergencies arising out of the present war in order to meet the spy system and the easy communication of information by means of modern inventions which annihilate space and time.

Mr. President, when the Supreme Court in a case before it undertakes to determine whether an act of Congress is unconstitutional, what takes place? The court looks at the precedents. Ah, yes; but there are two other factors which enter into the decision. The court looks at society. It looks at the general will, or what the best public opinion of the country demands. Thirdly, there is the question of the individual conscience of the judges, and this enters into the decision. A decision of the Supreme Court calling for the construction of a constitutional provision is made up of three elements—precedent, public opinion, and conscience. In this way the Supreme Court, in fact, legislates through its decisions. By being influenced by what the common or general will of this Nation demands the court keeps the Constitution in line with the advance of society in its upward march to a higher civilization.

Mr. President, as sure as you are sitting in that chair those rigid rules will break unless you bridge the chasm between the advance of society and those rigid formulæ.

I think, therefore, with regard to this legislation that we should bear in mind these general considerations, that this pending bill is war legislation and that we shall not forget the relation of war to law in the history of nations and of jurisprudence; again, that under the Constitution the power is granted to Congress to declare war; and, further, that this legislation is justifiable under a proper construction of the first 10 amendments to the Constitution; and, finally, in the situation of the world to-day and the part which this country must play in this war for democracy against military autocracy, this legislation is necessary if we are to conduct this war to a successful conclusion.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I feel constrained to submit a few observations before the debate comes to a conclusion. None of the distinguished Senators who have discussed the matter before us relating to the power of Congress to enact legislation of this character have undertaken at all to discuss it from the standpoint of war or from the standpoint of the power of Congress to enact legislation under the war power. This legislation is to be effective only during the war.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I think, overlooked an obvious distinction apparent from a most casual reading of the first amendment of the Constitution between the provision in relation to an establishment of religion and the abridgment of freedom of speech or of the press. The language is that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof"; that it shall make no law respecting religion at all—that is, "respecting an establishment of religion"—but the language then follows, "or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." There is no inhibition upon Congress, so far as that section is concerned, to pass acts in relation to the press, but those laws, whatever they are, must not abridge the freedom of the press.

Then it becomes an important inquiry as to whether a particular act does abridge the freedom of the press, and that presents the question as to what does the freedom of the press include? Everybody concedes that the freedom of the press does not include the right to print matter that is libelous or scandalous. Everybody concedes that the freedom of the press does not include the right to print blasphemous matter. Everybody concedes that it does not include the right to print matter that is obscene. Likewise, Mr. President, I undertake to say that it does not include the right to print matter that is destructive to the integrity of the State or that is helpful to the enemies of the State.

Neither Mr. Madison nor Mr. Hamilton in discussing the general question of the liberty of speech or of the freedom of the press as it is used in the first amendment of the Constitution had in mind at all nor were they discussing at all the question as to whether in order to accomplish a successful war it was within the power of Congress to limit the publication of matters that might be helpful to the public enemy.

This distinction between the language of this provision of the Constitution as it affects the establishment of religion and the freedom of the press was noticed by Justice James Iredell, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, in his charge to the jury in the case of the trial of the Northampton insurgents. He said:

> Here is a remarkable difference in expressions as to the different objects in the same clause. They are to make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. When, as to one object, they entirely prohibit any act whatever, and, as to another object, only limit the exercise of the power, they must, in reason, be supposed to mean different things. I presume, therefore, that Congress may make a law respecting the press, provided the law be such as not to abridge its freedom.

Mr. President, it is not necessary for us to enter into a consideration of the question as to whether if there were no such provisions as this found in the first amendment of the Constitution Congress would have any power to legislate with reference to the subject of the press at all, but I do not believe that anyone who allows his mind to address itself to a consideration of war and the powers of Congress to take steps necessary to bring to a successful conclusion a war can doubt for a single moment that the Congress may take all necessary steps in order to prevent information that would be of value to the enemy from reaching them.

You will have observed that that question has not been the subject of discussion by any of the writers whose views upon this subject have been commented upon. I wish to call your attention to some comments on this general subject that are found in a very carefully thought out article appearing in the fiftieth volume of the American Law Register. I read from page 15:

> It seems worth while to remember in this connection that the phrase "liberty of the press," which has been so frequently and so eloquently descanted on by American orators, is by no means a native product of American soil. Blackstone, whose commentaries were written more than a quarter of a century before the adoption of this first amendment, uses the phrase, and uses it in a manner which indicates that even then it had become a familiar one. Every student of the law remembers his forcible and eloquent exposition of the meaning of the phrase, and the passage in which it was discussed has been referred to by almost every case involving the principles there discussed. It must have been familiar to those who framed this amendment, and when they use the same phrase used by Blackstone and in no way qualify it, except by adding to it the "liberty of speech," it seems a natural inference that they use it in the same sense in which it was used by him. Judge Cooley, notwithstanding what he says above concerning the scope of the amendment, admits that "in this country it (i. e., Mr. Justice Blackstone's view) has been accepted as expressing the views of those who framed and adopted this amendment." And he cites in support of this Rawle on Constitutions, Chapter X, 2 Kent, 17; Story on Constitutions, section 1889; Commonwealth v. Blondings.

The author continues:

> Now, Blackstone enumerates seditious libels among offenses which are punishable under the law without a violation of that liberty of the press, to which he gives his full and forcible indorsement. It would follow, then, that the punishment of seditious libel was not intended by those who framed and adopted this amendment to be considered an infringement of the liberty of the press, and that such publications were still subject to governmental animadversion.

I have here the comment of Mr. Justice Blackstone upon the matter, which it might be helpful to advert to at this time. From the fourth volume I read, on page 151, as follows:

> In this and the other instances which we have lately considered, where blasphemous, immoral, treasonable, schismatical, seditious, or scandalous libels are punished by the English law, some with a greater, others with a less, degree of severity, the liberty of the press, properly understood, is by no means infringed or violated. The liberty of the press is, indeed, essential to the nature of a free State; but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published. Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public; to forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press; but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequence of his own temerity. To subject the press to the restrictive power of a licenser, as was formerly done, both before and since the Revolution, is to subject all freedom of sentiment to the prejudices of one man, and make him the arbitrary and infallible judge of all controverted points in learning, religion, and government. But to punish (as the law does at present) any dangerous or offensive writings, which, when published, shall on a fair and impartial trial be adjudged of a pernicious tendency, is necessary for the preservation of peace and good order, of government and religion, the only solid foundations of civil liberty. Thus the will of individuals is still left free; the abuse only of that free will is the object of legal punishment.

I continue reading from the author who contributed to the American Law Register his conclusions, on page 23, as follows:

> The English constitution boasts, with that of America, a "liberty of the press," and yet it does not hesitate to admit that publications may materially and seriously affect the Government and its officers, and that these are proper subjects for punishment. In doing so it in no sense admits that it is abridging the liberty of the press, but always contends that it is bridling its licentiousness. This distinction, so clearly drawn by Mr. Justice Blackstone, has been adopted without question by American courts in other classes of illegal publications. Why should they hesitate to apply it in distinguishing from a constitutional point of view what does and what does not infringe that liberty?
> The form of government of the United States contains in itself the means of changing either its policy or its structure by constitutional measures. The advocate of such changes who urges the exercise of constitutional rights for dislodging the party in power or for amending the Constitution can, with perfect propriety, we think, claim that he is within the protection of the constitutional amendment. It is when he passes this line and urges illegal and unconstitutional measures to replace the governing party or to overthrow the form of government that there arises an abuse of that liberty of speech and of the press which is intended to be secured to the people. This, it seems to us, furnishes a distinction in a sense fundamental. It will always remain to consider whether the publication in question has so far passed the line referred to as to endanger the security or efficiency of the Federal Government.

To sum up in brief the conclusions at which we have been able to arrive in this second part of the discussion, we find ground to believe that the language of the first amendment securing the liberty of the press was used in the sense in which it was understood under the English system of government, and was not intended to prohibit action on the part of Congress against the licentiousness of the press, when such licentiousness affected in a material and serious way the security of the government or the effectiveness of its action. The sedition act of 1798 forms the closest precedent in our history in deciding the questions which arise in determining the scope of the liberty of the press; but inasmuch as the constitutionality of that act was never passed on by the Supreme Court of the United States we have no authoritative declaration of its validity. If it passed beyond the bounds of what was authorized by the Constitution, it would seem to have done so, not so much because a measure of this nature is not within the implied powers of Congress as because the act included in its denunciation publications which would not now be regarded as affecting the safety or efficiency of Government, and, therefore, not seditious. To draw the line between what does impair the vigor of governmental action and threaten its existence and what does not, and hence to decide what is without and what within the liberty of the press is the really difficult problem; but not more so, apparently, than the solution of similar questions in allied cases of libel.

I think, Mr. President, that is the distinction here. The liberty of the press does not include the right to publish what is obviously dangerous to the perpetuity of the Government and likely to overthrow the effort of the administrative arm of the Government to carry to a successful conclusion a war; for, Mr. President, to what end would Congress be empowered by the Constitution to declare and to wage war by every possible means if at the same time there were no power to prevent the press of the country from bringing to naught every undertaking and every enterprise that the Government might undertake in order to effect that end?

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I desire to say only a word relative to the pending measure. I may say that it is my desire and wish to support the Government and the President in every way I consistently can in carrying on the war that has been declared. The title of the pending bill reads: "To punish acts of interference with foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes." That is the purpose and intent of the bill we are about to enact into a law.

I am just as much in favor of the freedom of the press as any Member of this body, but at the same time I believe we are facing a crisis and there exists at this time an emergency which demands that unusual power be given to our Executive. For that reason, and for the reason that I believe it will be beneficial in carrying the war to a successful conclusion, I am in favor of this measure, and I shall favor all of the measure down to line 20, on page 8, known as subsection (c). I believe we could agree on some small and reasonable changes that should be made in this measure, or this subsection, rather, that would, I hope, enable every Senator to support it.

In the preparation of this bill, as all other bills that come before this body, I realize the difficulties the persons preparing them have to encounter. We have this measure prepared by the General Staff, consisting of 56 officers of the Army, collaborating with the members of the Cabinet and the Secretary of War. There is no Senator in this Chamber who does not realize that those men are honest, patriotic citizens, and are endeavoring to furnish us with material that will enable us to enact a law that will help us to protect ourselves against a foreign foe.

I shall move at the proper time to strike out, commencing in line 23, page 8, after the word "shall," the words "collect, record"; in the same line, after the word "publish," to strike out the words "or communicate, or attempt to elicit"; and, on page 9, line 6, to strike out the words "or which might be." I will read subsection (c) as it will read with these amendments:

And (c) whoever, in time of war, in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall publish any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct, of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be useful to the enemy, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same: Provided, That no discussion, comment, or criticism shall convey information prohibited under the provisions of this section.

It seems to me that the section in that form is fair and equitable and will only enable the President and his associates to protect your interests and mine. There is nothing in this section as it will then read which will prevent the press from publishing anything or discussing anything relative to the war, making any comment or criticism of any act or policy of the Government or its representatives. They are permitted to do that under this section.

That is as far as the papers of this Nation are asking to go to-day. I may say in passing that the decent papers, the papers that have the interest of the country at heart, are asking for just such legislation as this, and their associations have prepared an amendment similar to this. They have themselves placed a censorship over their own news, and they have asked the Government to help them do so. They have a right to be protected from the irresponsible paper that is going to publish something that should not be published and will give aid and comfort to the enemy. High-class papers, papers that furnish the news and have the interest of the country at heart, will be blamed for what some irresponsible paper or its editor has caused to be published. I believe that they want and should receive this very protection. No Senator believes in time of war, when we are facing an enemy, that anybody should furnish any information with respect to the movement or numbers or description or condition or disposition of any of the armed forces of our Nation or of our ships or aircraft or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct of any officer. It seems to me that the restrictions which are contained in the bill are restrictions which we should desire to enact into law.

There has been a great deal said about giving so much power to our President. In times of peace no man is more jealous of the power of this body and of the other House of Congress than I; but in times of war, after war has been declared, when party lines have been obliterated and all loyal citizens are cooperating for one great purpose of protecting American rights and world democracy, we should not so far forget ourselves as to let the thought of our democracy at home cause us to commit an act or to pass a law which will prevent a democracy of the world.

We are face to face with the greatest fighting machine on earth. It is well known that this country is not prepared for a personal conflict of soldier against soldier with any first-class nation of the world; but we have by our act assisted the allies in a material and financial way, which I think it was entirely proper we should do.

Here to-day we find men in this country who, as you know and as I know, are securing information for the benefit of the enemy. Just a moment ago there was laid on my desk an evening paper—the Washington Times—with the following headline:

Capitol burglar seeks naval secrets. Spy "jimmies" Senate office. Splinters doors of Naval Affairs Committee meeting place.

That is the news that is published to-day, and it is the duty of the press to publish such news. It is true that kind of conduct is to be found all over the United States to-day; and we must be brought to a realization of the fact that we are now at war, and that we have to adopt, and must necessarily adopt, war measures if we are going to win; and win we must.

I believe this section is as important as any section in the bill. Therefore I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will accept my amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss this section or to discuss the bill at this time. But I conceive it to be my duty to say a word or two with reference to the doctrine that has been announced here by at least one Senator. Not so much in the exact words uttered as in the implication which seems to be conveyed by them is the doctrine put forth that it is necessary now for us to disregard the Constitution. We are told that the Supreme Court, when construing the Constitution, first takes into consideration the precedents of the past and then takes into consideration public opinion, and that the Constitution is to be expanded or contracted in accordance with public opinion.

I have as much respect for public opinion as I think anyone ought to have, and I believe that public opinion, when it has been crystallized into statutory and into constitutional provisions, is and that it should always be supreme in this land; but I am astounded to hear uttered upon the floor of the Senate by a Senator of distinguished learning and record the doctrine that the Supreme Court of the United States, when it comes to write a decision announcing the law of the country, pauses and inquires "what is the state of public opinion to-day." The only kind of public opinion that can be recognized in the construction of a statute and in the construction of a constitution is that kind of public opinion which by constitutional and statutory methods has inscribed itself as a part of the law of the land. Any other doctrine will be subversive of all law and of all constitutions, because it leaves to the judge the right, not to determine what the people have said and what the law is, but to determine for himself what the state of the public mind is at that particular time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator from Missouri think that, if the Senator from Rhode Island is correct, the oath of office administered to the judges of the Supreme Court should be changed, requiring them to support the Constitution of the United States and public opinion?

Mr. REED. I am not going to indulge in any severe criticism. I do not mean to do that. I simply want to put on record this much of a protest, because I feel assured——

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator from Missouri to misunderstand me. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Let me finish the sentence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. REED. I do; certainly.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator from Missouri to have the impression that I said the decisions of the Supreme Court were founded upon public opinion. That was not what I intended to say. I said that public opinion entered into the decision as one of its elements. The Senator from Missouri is a good lawyer, and he knows that when a case comes up before the Supreme Court there are facts probably in the case which had not arisen in any other case. The question, then, is, What is a proper decision?

We will take the attitude of the Supreme Court toward patents. In relation to patents and the patent law the tendency is to modify or to restrict the monopoly granted by a patent. Here, for example, is a case with its complicated state of facts, some of which are new. In determining that case the court will be guided by three things—precedent, public opinion or the general will or tendency of society, and individual conscience of the judges. The way in which the law is made to conform to social growth and progress arises from the fact, in part, that public opinion or the general will of society and the progress of society enter into a decision where the facts are different. That is what I meant to state, that public opinion is one of the elements of the decision, but not the controlling one.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I say again I have so much regard for the Senator from Rhode Island——

Mr. COLT. I know the Senator from Missouri would not misrepresent me.

Mr. REED. I would not misinterpret the Senator's remarks.

Mr. COLT. I know the Senator would not.

Mr. REED. And it was only because I believed the Senator's remarks were bound to suggest something that I can not think he had in his mind that I took the floor.

Mr. President, this is what I think is in the mind of the Senator, and I do not believe he expressed it. I am aware that it requires considerable temerity to undertake to define what is in another man's mind and to express it better than he has done. Nevertheless I venture to say that I believe the Senator had in mind this thought: That when some decision of a court, some precedent in being tried out in the actual experience of life, develops the fact that it is in conflict with some principle of human right, then that old precedent will give way to the principle of human right, which is greater than the mere expression of some court in the past; and to that extent there always will be a modification of opinions and decisions; for in the changing conditions of life it frequently occurs that the application of a principle may be just and equitable under certain conditions of society, and under other and changing conditions the same application might work a hardship; but I do not believe that the principles of law change, and I do not believe that the courts have any right to ask themselves, first, what is the law, and then what is public opinion, then what is in their conscience and then add them together or stir them all together or jumble them all together and say that the conglomerate of law and public opinion and judicial conscience constitute the law. On the contrary, it is their business to determine what the law is. When that has been done their business is done. The less they mix the law with other things the purer will be the law. The law is the voice of the people expressed by legal and proper methods. I have only slight exception to the Senator's remarks in connection with his last statement.

I did not rise merely for the purpose of offering observations with reference to what the Senator had said, but I wanted to say that I hope in the Senate of the United States nothing will be said to lead the people of the United States to understand that at the inception of the war, which up to this time is a mere paper war—I hope, sir, nothing will be said in this Chamber that will give the American people to understand that it is necessary in the slightest degree to impinge upon their constitutional liberties in order to carry on this war, or that anyone will think of tolerating for a moment so monstrous a thing as the destruction or the impairment of the Constitution of the United States. On the contrary, this war can be carried on, the resources in money, in brains, in blood, and in soul of this Nation can be mobilized and utilized without in any way destroying our constitutional liberties.

I intend to vote for this bill, perhaps with some changes and amendments. I know that it proposes to do many things in time of war that I do not think we ought to undertake in time of peace; but I am not voting for such propositions because I believe they are whittling down the Constitution or impairing the Constitution. I intend to vote for them because I believe they are within the Constitution. There may be matter contained in this bill that before the debate is concluded I shall think is not within the Constitution; and whenever any such proposition is presented to my mind I shall unhesitatingly vote against its retention in the bill. But let us not in this Chamber start preaching the doctrine that the Constitution is to be treated lightly, that our liberties are to be suspended, or the rights of the people are to be impaired either temporarily or permanently. That is not necessary, and it will not be necessary during the pending conflict.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate in discussing this subject. I shall have nothing to say, except that I ask unanimous consent to have read at the desk by the Secretary an editorial appearing in the Chicago Daily Tribune of April 5, 1917.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR CENSORSHIP.

Congress is to be asked again to pass an espionage bill for purposes of war emergency. The bill has certain superficial qualities of merit and other qualities of downright malevolence to the essentials of democratic government.

It would be theoretically possible under this bill for a government to suspend temporarily the publication of any newspaper which presumed to publish criticism of gross defects in the handling of the troops.

The courts probably would not indulge or tolerate such an invasion of the right of the freedom of the press, but an attempt could be made to punish critics of the administration, no matter how valuable and important the criticism was.

It is known that the attacks of the Northcliffe press in England made upon the British bureaucracy were dictated by Northcliffe after despairing talks with Gen. French. Northcliffe was tried under a sedition act and French was supplanted by Haig, but the work the two men did can be registered in the advances the British Army is making.

An intelligent press attacked a stupid bureaucracy and the general who inspired the attack and the editor who conducted it were pilloried, but what they did may have saved the British Empire.

When a stupid bureaucracy tries to conceal itself from criticism by penalizing the critic, it attacks democracy by refusing to allow the formation of an intelligent opinion.

Any newspaper which would divulge military secrets of importance to the enemy ought to be suspended and its editors ought to be punished. But a newspaper which is kept from telling the people how their troops are mishandled is helping the enemy and not betraying the Republic.

So far as the Tribune is concerned it welcomes a sensible censorship, but law or no law, if the embalmed beef scandal is repeated in this war in which we are about to engage; if typhoid camps are erected again, and if men willing to sacrifice themselves for cause are sacrificed without cause, the facts will be told and the responsible editors will accept the penalty.

Congress may do what it wants to do to cover up incompetence, but self-respecting journalism will ignore the penalties, accept punishment, tell the truth, do what good may be done by telling the truth and accept the verdict of the people.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I was struck with the comment made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that the Supreme Court should not be bound by public opinion. I do not like to have that pass without expressing at least my own opinion to the contrary. I think the mature public opinion of the United States ought to be respected by the Supreme Court. I think that the acts of Congress passed in pursuance of that opinion ought to be binding on that court; that the construction of the Constitution by the Congress of the United States is binding on that court, and that they ought not to be permitted to disregard it.

The Supreme Court of the United States has no jurisdiction worth mentioning, except appellate jurisdiction. That appellate jurisdiction under Article III, section 2, paragraph 2, of the Constitution of the United States is subject to the control of Congress, and is granted "with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." Therefore Congress can take from that court, under the Constitution of the United States, as construed by the court in eight particular cases—a note of which I ask permission to put in the RECORD—such part of that jurisdiction as it may see fit. Congress has that power, and having that power the time has come, in my judgment, for the Congress of the United States to exercise it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the decisions referred to by the Senator from Oklahoma will be printed in the RECORD.

The decisions referred to are as follows:

Wiscart v. Dauchey, 3 Dall., 321 (1796); Duroussean v. U. S., 6 Cranch, 307 (1810); U. S. v. Gordon, 7 Cranch, 287 (1813); Daniels v. C., R. I. & P. R. R., 3 Wall., 250 (1865); In re McCardle, 7 Wall., 510 (1868); Nat. Ex. Bk. v. Peters, 144 U. S., 570 (1891); Col. C. C. M. Co. v. Turck, 150 U. S., 138 (1893).

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not think there will be a yea-and-nay vote asked for on the amendment proposed by the committee, as every Senator who has expressed himself is in favor of the amendment. I am not going to ask for a vote on subsection (c), but I ask that that amendment offered by the committee be put to the Senate now. There is no objection to it, because it really protects the press.

Mr. SMOOT. Is not the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] now before the Senate, or has that been accepted by the committee? What is the motion before the Senate, Mr. President?

Mr. OVERMAN. The committee amendment is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has moved to strike out——

Mr. OVERMAN. Unanimous consent was given that no other amendment should be considered until the committee amendments had been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is to a part of a committee amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. We agreed to strike out the second proviso. That has already been stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; that has not been stricken out. The Senator from Massachusetts has moved to strike out the second proviso.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have agreed on behalf of the committee to strike that out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has moved to strike out the proviso reading:

Provided, That no discussion, comment, or criticism shall convey information prohibited under the provisions of this section.

Mr. OVERMAN. The second proviso the committee have agreed to strike out. Therefore, Mr. President, I now ask that the first proviso be voted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us see where we are, so far as the parliamentary status is concerned. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts must be put.

Mr. OVERMAN. The committee agrees to withdraw the second proviso, with the unanimous consent of the Senate. That was the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the second proviso, by unanimous consent, is stricken out.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the Senate vote on the committee amendment. I would not ask for action if there were objection on the part of any Senator, but I understand there is no objection, and therefore I ask for a vote.

Mr. SMOOT. Even if there were objection, the action could be reconsidered.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; it could be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All in favor say "aye"——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we can not understand what is going on. There has been nothing stated to the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Secretary to read the first proviso.

Mr. REED. I do not ask that anything be read, but I do ask to be informed as to what we are voting on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the proviso on page 9.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Secretary had better read it, so that every Senator will understand it.

The SECRETARY. In Chapter II, section 2, page 9, line 9, after the word "imprisonment," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I presented an amendment this morning, which I presume is now in order, as I understand all the committee amendments to this chapter have been agreed to. The amendment which I offer goes to the same section of which the amendment just adopted is a part, but affects another part of it. If I am right in my assumption that the amendment which I have presented is now in order, I will take it up and endeavor to outline what I seek to accomplish by it.

It will be noticed that the phraseology of subsection (b) and that of subsection (c) is practically identical after the first two lines of subsection (b) down to its penalty clause. The two principal differences therefore—and they are fundamental—between subsection (b) and subsection (c) is that the first creates a class of offenses which must be committed with intent that the subject matter of the offenses shall be communicated to the enemy. The other is the clause of subsection (e) which invests the President in time of war with the power to make regulations upon the same subject, which regulations are violated regardless of the intent of the person committing the offense, and which becomes an offense immediately the act is performed or attempted, whether any intent to communicate with the enemy exists or not.

Mr. President, I outlined some objections yesterday to a part of the phraseology of subsection (c), considered as a whole. The same objections apply to similar expressions in subsection (b). Hence my amendment proposes first to strike out, in line 13, the words "or supposed plans or conduct," and in line 18 the words "or which might be," so that if the amendment is adopted it will be provided that—

Whoever, in time of war, with intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense or calculated to be, directly or indirectly, useful to the enemy, shall be punished—

And so forth.

Supposed plans or conduct of a naval or military operation seem to me to be entirely imaginary, impalpable, and immaterial, and communications made or contemplated regarding supposed plans, or information sought concerning supposed plans, should constitute no legitimate basis or foundation upon which to predicate an indictment for the commission of an offense punishable with death; and the same criticism can be properly directed to the words "or which might be, directly or indirectly, useful to the enemy."

The fact that some information is gathered which, whatever the intent, might be directly or indirectly useful to the enemy opens up a wide field of liability, and certainly a very wide one for investgation and indictment. What might be directly or indirectly useful to the enemy perhaps in every instance would be a controverted proposition. It certainly would be one susceptible of dispute. The Senator from Mississippi might regard some information relating to the public defense as of great value to the enemy, directly. I might regard it as of no possible value to him, even indirectly. It is impossible to legislate for the creation of criminal offenses, either in times of war or in times of peace, with any safety to the citizen, if the offense is predicated upon such general and nebulous lines of conduct, and I do not think any lawyer in this body would challenge this criticism.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I agree with much of what the Senator says, so far as subdivision (c) is concerned; but why should we let anybody in this country collect information of any kind with intent to convey it to the enemy?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if a man is to be prevented—and perhaps he should be—from collecting information of any kind with intent to communicate it to the enemy, let us say so plainly and intelligently.

Mr. WALSH. Would not the Senator agree that that would be a wise thing?

Mr. THOMAS. I should not care to commit myself offhand upon so important a proposition. There might be occasions when its collection even with such intent would be useful to us. I should want to think it over before expressing a definite opinion. There might be reasons why the collection of information would be entirely devoid of any possible evil or injury to the Government of the United States, whatever the intent.

I do not know; but I will say, as a case of first impression, that the Senator is right about it. But, however that may be, the objectionable phraseology to which I have just directed my attention is, in my opinion, indefensible. It makes the subsection susceptible of constructions which, while creating an offense to-day, might not create an offense to-morrow, which enables one court to determine a certain line of conduct to constitute an offense in violation of the statute which would not appeal to another court at all. The one element essential in statutory legislation of a criminal character is certainty, positiveness, to the end that the citizen may understand what the law is and govern his conduct accordingly, leaving nothing, or as little as possible, to speculation or to inference.

Now, let me state another proposition to which there can be no dissent. The element of intent is an essential ingredient to the commission of a criminal offense. Some acts are so reckless, so utterly indefensible and unjustifiable, that the law infers the intent from the act. For example, if I drive an automobile recklessly down Pennsylvania Avenue without regard to the rights or the safety of others, and somebody is injured or killed, the law presumes, and ought to presume, an intention to accomplish that result, because of my reckless disregard of the laws of my country and of the rights of others. In other instances the intent may not be predicated directly upon the act, but depends upon independent proof for its establishment. In other words, if the intent is not obvious from the act, it must be established by a proper line of testimony or there can be no conviction. It is a fundamental element of the criminal laws of this country that offenses against them must be committed with criminal or unlawful intent; and in that particular the recitals of subsection (b) are in entire harmony with this legal requirement. When we come to subsection (c), however, no element of intent is there involved.

The President may make a regulation, and instantly the doing of any of the things mentioned in subsection (c) innocently, ignorantly, or in good faith constitutes a crime as completely as the doing of the same thing by the worst traitor in the United States, with full intent to obtain information and communicate it to the enemy; and what is, I think, equally important, it is the regulation of the Executive which imposes such a tremendous responsibility, which creates such tremendous consequences to the citizen, and not a statute of the United States. This can not be under our Constitution if it be any more than a scrap of paper.

I believe that subsection (b) covers the entire subject, and with the amendments I have proposed, covers it completely—so completely, indeed, as to make the retention of subdivision (c) of this section entirely unnecessary.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the suggested amendment in line 13, where, as I understood the Senator, he would have the words "or supposed plans or conduct" eliminated from the bill. I ask the Senator if that amendment would not be a very unfortunate one? Suppose, for illustration, that the department had tentatively agreed upon plans of a very important character relative to military or naval movements in the interest of the country——

Mr. THOMAS. That would not be a supposed plan; that would be an incomplete plan.

Mr. KING. Just one moment—and suppose later it was believed that those plans were not for the best interests of the war, and they were wholly abandoned, and some other plans were agreed upon. Suppose, further, that a knowledge of those abandoned plans should be obtained and communicated to the enemy. Would not that information perhaps prove very advantageous to the enemy? To know a negative might be sometimes just as beneficial to the enemy as to know the affirmative.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator would prefer to see the words "or incomplete or abandoned plans" substituted, I do not know that I would object to it; but the term "supposed plans" includes not only the things suggested by the Senator from Utah, but plans which do not have and never have possessed material existence anywhere. That is the basis of my criticism.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does not the Senator think that where a man is engaged in hunting into our plans, even if they are only supposed plans, with the idea of betraying them, without any hesitation we can well afford to catch him and punish him? Is he not interfering with our business, and ought we not to catch everybody of that kind that we can?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, his moral obliquity may be quite as great as if he were attempting to get actual information.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has he not become a traitor already?

Mr. THOMAS. If I forge the Senator's name to a note, I am at once amenable to the criminal laws of my country, and punished accordingly; but if I forge the name of a fictitious individual to a note, my moral offense may be quite as great as my actual one, but the law in that case would not punish me, unless the forged note was successfully used for the perpetration of a still further fraud; and I think that aptly illustrates the idea which I have in mind. At least I have given it in the hope that it does.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator consider that a spy is any less reprehensible, because the information that he gives is not accurate or true, than if it were accurate or true?

Mr. THOMAS. I think a spy should be punished because he is a spy, if you know that he is a spy and in this country for that purpose, regardless of information obtained. And we should so legislate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Would the Senator consider a man a spy who was attempting to obtain information?

Mr. THOMAS. I certainly would, and punish him accordingly.

Mr. PITTMAN. Whether the information he actually obtained was true or not true?

Mr. THOMAS. I would punish such an individual for the essential reason that he is an enemy of the country and engaged in treason or attempted treason; but this statute goes much further than that.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then does it make any difference whether the plan is an actual plan of the Government or a supposed plan?

Mr. THOMAS. It does not, so far as the individual the Senator mentions is concerned; but here you have a sweeping statute, a statute broad enough to embrace men who are not spies as well as men who are spies.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does not the word "intent" cover every phrase in that subdivision?

Mr. THOMAS. There is no such word in subsection (c). Perhaps that might be its effect in the other subsection. Certainly it is presumable that an individual who is engaged in attempting to secure information with the intent that it shall be communicated to the public enemy is himself a public enemy, but you must recall that this section provides punishment by death, and I think you should hesitate long before you condemn to death a man whose work consists in the ascertainment of imaginary information. It is certainly carrying the criminal laws of the country beyond the extreme when such a penalty is sweepingly provided for such an offense.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The phase of this part of the bill which has bothered me is this: The word "supposed" relates entirely to the person who communicates, not to the department. That is, it is a plan which the person who publishes or communicates with the enemy supposed will be followed by the department or those in charge of the war. Now, imagine a person communicating a supposed or imaginary plan to the enemy for the purpose of deceiving the enemy and benefiting the United States. That person would still be liable to punishment by death or not less than 30 years' imprisonment. I do not say he would be prosecuted, but I instance that to show how loosely it is drawn.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I think the inference suggested is well within the phraseology of this subdivision and would subject a friend as well as an enemy to its penalties. I shall not detain the Senate any longer with a discussion of the amendment. If the remainder of it can be adopted, upon the condition that there is no change in the phraseology of subsection (b), I shall not complain very seriously, although I think these words should go out. But I think, Mr. President, that in view of the fact, as will be seen from a careful reading of subsection (b), that it covers everything which will constitute an offense which is embraced within the purview of subsection (c), then, since subsection (c) depends upon and provides for a regulation of the President and makes the intent a matter of no concern, it should be eliminated entirely; and I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted.

I wish to ask the Senator having charge of the bill, however, to postpone a vote upon it until to-morrow morning, because one or two Senators who are now absent desire to be here when the vote is taken.

Mr. OVERMAN. After the Senator from South Dakota offers an amendment, which he is going to submit and ask to have printed, I shall move an executive session.

Mr. STERLING. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment which I offered, and which was read at the desk this afternoon, be printed and lie on the table until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

Mr. CUMMINS. I propose to offer, at the proper time, a substitute for paragraph (c), which has been under discussion. I ask to have it printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Permission is granted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill to allow me to offer an amendment to section "(c)," and ask to have it printed and go over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The present presiding officer was not in the chair when I offered it earlier in the afternoon, but I will do so again. I have elaborated it somewhat.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood it was not yet ready for printing.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, yes; it is now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be printed, then.

Mr. POMERENE. I submit an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

The amendment was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When the United States is engaged in war or is threatened with war, insurrection, or invasion, upon an affidavit being made before any United States commissioner or United States district judge stating that affiant has probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed or is about to be committed against the laws, proclamations of the President, or Constitution of the United States, the said judge or commissioner shall issue subpœnas in the usual manner for such person or persons as the district attorney may approve for an inquiry as to the matter set out in the said affidavit; the right and authority is hereby given the several commissioners and judges to administer oaths to affiants and to witnesses under this section.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 20, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 19, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal and ever-living God, we thank Thee for the message which came through Jesus Christ to the world, which changes doubt and uncertainty in the hearts of men to faith, hope, and love; and we most fervently pray that these qualities of soul may increase in strength and fervor, that the message may find its way to every heart; that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in all the world, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. POU. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD some resolutions adopted by a mass meeting in the city of Smithfield, N. C.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry, but I will object. I will object to all——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution and bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 13. Joint resolution extending the time within which the "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River" shall remain in effect;

S. 1007. An act authorizing the city of Bemidji, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near that place; and

S. 1802. An act to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills and a joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 1007. An act authorizing the city of Bemidji, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near that place; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 1802. An act to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. J. Res. 13. Joint resolution extending the time within which the "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River," shall remain in effect; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of the committees.

AGE LIMIT OF OFFICERS IN NAVAL RESERVE.

Mr. PADGETT (when the Committee on Naval Affairs was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 2340.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee calls up the bill H. R. 2340, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2340) to increase the age limit for persons appointed as officers in the Naval Reserve.

Be it enacted, etc., That the maximum limit of age for officers of the Naval Reserve on first appointment as such therein be, and it is hereby, increased from 35 to 50 years.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Amend, in line 4, after the word "Reserve," by inserting the words "of the Naval Reserve Force."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, in the subdivision Naval Reserve Force, composed of men who have had sea service in the merchant marine, the maximum age limit was fixed at 35 years. Many valuable men up to 50 years who have served in that capacity would be available, and the whole effect of this is to increase the age limit to not exceeding 50 years.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL OFFICERS, HYDROGRAPHIC OFFICE.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 2338.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee calls up the bill H. R. 2338, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2338) to authorize the detail of additional officers to the Hydrographic Office.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to detail such naval officers as may be necessary to the Hydrographic Office.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Amend, in line 5, after the word "Office," by inserting "during the continuance of the present war."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how many officers is it intended under this to detach from real service in the Navy for clerical work in the Hydrographic Office?

Mr. PADGETT. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. MANN. How many officers is it intended under this bill to detach from real service in the Navy for clerical work in the Hydrographic Office?

Mr. PADGETT. This is not clerical work.

Mr. MANN. Pretty nearly.

Mr. PADGETT. It is doing expert work, and it requires naval men to do it. They want to bring the charts and sailing directions up to date and revise them and review them, and the Secretary said that they would need several other men. There was a limitation in the appropriation bill to not exceeding four, and this merely extends it during the continuance of the war.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman says it is expert work; the naval officers are not experts in this work unless they have been in the Hydrographic Office and had experience. It is easy to get experts from civil life to do this work. Now, the proposition is to transfer men from the boats, where they are needed, where you really need experienced experts, to do work that you can get men from civil life to do better than the naval men can do it.

Mr. PADGETT. The committee has had that matter before it several times, and we have had a number of officers before it, and they tell us it requires naval men who are experienced in Navy work, and in the actual handling of the ships to do this work. The committee has had hearings upon that question several times in the several years past. It has been the universal testimony——

Mr. MANN. This matter has been before the House for the 20 years that I have been here, the Navy always desiring, very properly, some places on the land in order to relieve men who stay two or three years on board ship and give them a chance to serve a time on the land and have sought to increase the naval officers in the Hydrographic Office. Well, we have not always done it.

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir. They have had a limitation of four, but during the continuance of war it will necessitate the bringing up to date the sailing charts and directions, and to make us independent of foreign countries they need additional help. At the beginning of the war England cut off the opportunity which she had given the Government to purchase. I assume that under conditions now we can get them from England, but we do not want to be dependent for our sailing charts and sailing directions upon any foreign country.

Mr. MANN. We will be dependent upon England for a great many things just now, and if we are warring on the same side, I do not see any objection to it. But that is not the question. It does not require the service of a naval officer to work out a hydrographic chart or sailing directions. Any master of a vessel can do it as well as a naval officer, and if he has had experience he can do it better than a naval officer without experience.

Mr. PADGETT. As I stated to the gentleman a moment ago, we have inquired into that a number of times; have taken the testimony of various naval officers, and they all positively disagree with that statement.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I understand. The gentleman brought propositions before the House several times on the subject heretofore, and in time of peace it has always been defeated.

Mr. PADGETT. I have never brought it in but once.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it has been before the House for 20 years.

Mr. PADGETT. That may be; but I did not bring it from the committee for 20 years.

Mr. MANN. Well, the Committee on Naval Affairs has had it before the House several times. I will not say the gentleman from Tennessee brought it out. We put a limitation in because the House was of opinion that naval officers in time of peace might better be doing naval work. Now, in time of war we are short of naval officers. The ships are short of naval officers now.

Here is a proposition to take these naval officers off the ships, where they are needed, and put them at civil work that anybody can do with a little knowledge and that masters or men experienced in the shipping business may do better than the naval officers without experience. We need the naval officers on the ships. We do not need them so much on the land.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PADGETT. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. We have no objection to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 121, noes 0.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, this is very important, and I hope the bill will be passed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 96, noes 73.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 96 and the noes are 73.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-nine gentlemen are present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of passing the bill will answer "yea" when their names are called; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 263, nays 96, not voting 72, as follows:

MINORITY ENLISTMENTS IN THE NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 2008) to provide for the extension of minority enlistments in the naval service.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter any enlistment for minority in the Navy or Marine Corps may be extended as is provided by law for extending an enlistment for a term of four years, under similar conditions and with like rights, privileges, benefits, and obligations.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, under the existing law a minor not less than 18 years of age, with the consent of his parents or guardian, may enlist in the Navy during the period of minority. The regular term of enlistment in the Navy under existing law is four years, but minors enlist during minority. If a boy is under 18 years of age it requires special permission of the department before he can enlist.

Under a law passed, I believe about two years ago, the privilege was granted that after the first enlistment a person might extend his enlistment for one year, or for two years, or for three years, or for four years. If he extended it for four years in the aggregate, he got the same benefit as if he had reenlisted for four years; but if he extended it for one year or two years or less than four years he did not get the benefit of the reenlistment for four years. That privilege is not extended to minors arriving at majority. This bill simply gives to minors enlisting during minority the privilege of reenlisting upon attaining their majority with the same privilege that is granted to an original four-year enlistment by persons of full age.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. What is the minimum age at which a minor can enlist with the consent of his parents?

Mr. PADGETT. Eighteen years is the age, unless it is specially waived by the department.

Mr. BORLAND. And even if it is specially waived, he must also have the consent of parents or guardians?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; as provided by law.

Mr. BORLAND. Having the waiver of the department and the consent of the parents or guardians, what is the lowest age at which a minor can enlist?

Mr. PADGETT. That depends upon the department and the physical development or maturity of the boy.

Mr. BORLAND. Is there no minimum at all?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir; not by law, as I remember.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me there ought to be.

Mr. BRITTEN. My impression is that the minimum age has been placed at 16 years.

Mr. PADGETT. That is by regulation, but not by law, as I remember.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. What would the gentleman think of a law or regulation permitting these young men to enlist during the continuance of the war and not binding them for a long time?

Mr. PADGETT. I will say that yesterday I introduced a bill authorizing enlistments for four years, or for such shorter period of time as the President may authorize, or during the continuance of the war.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Very likely the gentleman has heard, as many of us have, that the young men of the country seem perfectly willing to enlist for service during the war, but they hesitate to enlist, feeling that they may be held for a long time, even after the war is over.

Mr. PADGETT. I introduced a bill yesterday to meet that, and hope to have it before the House next week.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the bill which the gentleman has introduced, if it becomes a law, relate to this matter which we have up this morning and cover this, too?

Mr. PADGETT. No; this bill does not relate to enlistments. This is to extend certain privileges of reenlistment to minors under existing law.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. But suppose some of these young men might wish to reenlist for the term of the war but should not want to enlist for the full four years?

Mr. PADGETT. They can do it if the bill that I introduced yesterday passes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Under this bill could they?

Mr. PADGETT. No; under the bill I introduced yesterday.

Mr. SABATH. But they would not be entitled to the benefit that you are trying to grant them under this bill?

Mr. PADGETT. No; they would not. They would have to enlist for four years in order to get the increased pay and the four months' gratuity pay. A man has four months in which to renew his enlistment, and if he reenlists it dates back, so far as pay is concerned.

Mr. SABATH. So if any of these young men desire to enlist only for the time of the war they will not be entitled to the benefits of this act?

Mr. PADGETT. No; not unless they serve four years. This is only to give the privilege of extending their service so as to make up the four years. The Secretary states as follows:

The enlistment of any enlisted man in the Navy may be voluntarily extended for a period of either one, two, three, or four years. It further provides that those men who extend their enlistments for an aggregate of four years shall receive the increase of $1.36 per month in their pay for continuous service, as well as the four months' gratuity pay provided for those men who reenlist within four months after the date of expiration of a term of enlistment.

This bill extends the same privileges to minors reenlisting.

Mr. KAHN. If the Revised Statutes have not been amended within the last year regarding enlistments in the Navy, there is a provision that minors between 16 and 18 years of age may enlist with the consent of their parents or guardians.

Mr. PADGETT. I was under the impression that that was by regulation.

Mr. KAHN. No; that is a provision of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. PADGETT. I thank the gentleman for his statement. I was under the impression that 16 years was fixed by regulation.

Mr. KAHN. No; a boy can enlist at 18 without the consent of parent or guardian.

Mr. PADGETT. Not under the statute. The naval bill carried a provision currently for several years, and I think made it permanent law last year, by which the consent of the parents or guardians is required for minors.

Mr. KAHN. I happened to look up the provisions of the Revised Statutes when we were considering the national-defense act, and the statute at that time provided that minors could enlist at the age of 16, and if they had the consent of the parent or guardian they could be held; but if the minor enlisted at 18, he did not require the consent of the parent or guardian, and we put a similar provision in the national-defense bill regarding Army enlistments.

Mr. PADGETT. If the gentleman will look up the naval bill of the past year or two, he will see that that carries a provision as follows:

Provided, That hereafter no part of any appropriation for the naval service shall be expended in recruiting seamen, ordinary seamen, or apprentice seamen unless, in case of minors, a certificate of birth or a verified written statement by the parents, or either of them, or in case of their death a verified written statement by the legal guardian, be first furnished to the recruiting officer, showing applicant to be of age required by naval regulations, which shall be presented with the application for enlistment; except in cases where such certificate is unobtainable, enlistment may be made when the recruiting officer is convinced that oath of applicant as to age is credible; but when it is afterwards found, upon evidence satisfactory to the Navy Deyartment, that recruit has sworn falsely as to age, and is under 18 years of age at the time of enlistment, he shall, upon request of either parent, or, in case of their death, by the legal guardian, be released from service in the Navy, upon payment of full cost of first outfit, unless, in any given case, the Secretary, in his discretion, shall relieve said recruit of such payment.

Mr. CARY. I had a similar case two weeks ago before the Secretary of the Navy, and he refused to allow a boy to be discharged because he joined when he was 18.

Mr. PADGETT. He had the consent of his parents?

Mr. CARY. No; the parents wanted him out, but the department refused to let him out.

Mr. PADGETT. I think you will find that he had their consent originally.

Mr. CARY. No; he ran away.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have such a case, in which the mother, a widow, did not consent to the enlistment. During the last week the discharge of this boy, 18 years of age, was refused, although he did not have the consent of his mother, she being a widow.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. RUSSELL. I had an experience along that line recently. A boy in my home town went to a recruiting office in the Navy and they told him that he could not enlist because he was not 17, although the mother went before a notary public and consented. I had to get permission from the naval officer in Washington to permit him to enlist when he was over 16.

Mr. PADGETT. I understood you had to get a special permit from the department for boys between 16 and 18. A recruiting officer enlists them over 18 during the period of minority upon procuring the consent of the parent or guardian.

Mr. RUSSELL. I was advised by the boy's parents that he could enlist if he was 17—he could go in with the consent of the parents—but if he is under 17 he had to get the consent of the Navy Department.

Mr. FLOOD. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. I would like to know what would be the result where a boy under 16 enlists in the Navy without consent of the parents, or without any special permission from the Navy Department. What is his status?

Mr. PADGETT. He would be discharged upon request.

Mr. FLOOD. Upon his request or the request of his parents?

Mr. PADGETT. Upon the request of the parents.

Mr. FLOOD. I have a great many cases where boys enlist between 16 and 18; enlist without the consent of the parents. As a rule they make a false affidavit that they are over 18 years of age. When the parents are acquainted with the fact that they have enlisted without their consent, they make application for a release, and invariably the department will answer: "Well, we may not have the power to hold him, but we will prosecute him for perjury if the parents insist on his release."

Mr. PADGETT. That was the practice several years ago, but I understand it has not been the practice lately. We put a provision in the naval bill several years ago directing that in cases of that kind they would be discharged upon refunding to the Government the cost of their first outfit.

Mr. SABATH. I am advising all such people to leave the boys in the service and let them do something for their country, and that they will feel better about it further on. I have not made application for the release of any boy within the last six weeks.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, many Members of the House were engaged in private conversation while the gentleman from Tennessee was carrying on what was almost a private conversation with various gentlemen on that side of the House, and I could not hear what was said. I want to know if I understand the situation about this bill. Under existing law a man who is not a minor and enlists in the Navy has authority during his first term of enlistment to extend his term of enlistment one, two, three, or four years, and if he does so, does he get an increase in pay as well as the four months' gratuity?

Mr. PADGETT. He gets an increase in pay during the extended four years, but does not get it until the expiration of the four-year enlistment.

Mr. MANN. He gets the four months' service pay when?

Mr. PADGETT. When he enlists for the second four years.

Mr. MANN. Even though he extended the time during the first period?

Mr. PADGETT. He gets it when he serves out the second four years. If his reenlistment is for full four years, he gets gratuity pay at the beginning. If it is an extended enlistment by years, he must serve four years.

Mr. MANN. This bill proposes to give a minor who has enlisted for two or three years, or whatever his term is—he could not now enlist beyond the age of 21?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. During the first enlistment to extend his enlistment as though he was over age?

Mr. PADGETT. Under the terms of this bill, when he arrives at majority he can extend his enlistment from year to year if he sees fit, and when he serves four years he will get the benefit of the gratuity under the law, the same as a man of age would get.

Mr. MANN. When his first enlistment expires he can reenlist under existing law?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; but his minority enlistment is not counted the same as the four-year enlistment. He does not get the benefits.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing in the bill that says that he will get any different benefit.

Mr. PADGETT. It gives him the same benefit that a man of majority would get.

Mr. MANN. If the minor now in the service enlists comes to the age of 21 and the first enlistment expires and he reenlists, does he not get any gratuity?

Mr. PADGETT. He does, if he reenlists for a period of four years.

Mr. MANN. I see that the Committee on Naval Affairs do not agree, for the gentleman from Michigan shakes his head.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I did not suppose he did until his four years expire.

Mr. PADGETT. If he enlists for the full four years, but he would not if he extended his enlistment and took it out year by year.

Mr. MANN. When he reenlists, does he not get an increase in pay?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; $1.36 a month.

Mr. MANN. I would like to know out of curiosity in what possible way this bill helps a minor.

Mr. PADGETT. It gives the minor the benefit of extending his enlistment the same as if he was of majority age. He can reenlist for a year.

Mr. MANN. He has that opportunity now.

Mr. PADGETT. No; he must enlist for four years or not at all. This puts him on the same basis. When a minor serves out his minority enlistment and wants to reenlist, he must reenlist under existing law for four years. He has no privilege of extending his enlistment for one or two years.

Mr. MANN. The only purpose of this bill, then, as I understand the gentleman, is to permit the minor to extend his enlistment for a less period than four years.

Mr. PADGETT. Upon the same terms given to a major.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. No; I want to say something else.

Mr. BRITTEN. I was going to ask the gentleman a question and give him a little information.

Mr. MANN. I would be very glad to have the information. Recently during the recess between the last Congress and this session of Congress I started on a trip to the island of Haiti to visit our experiment down there with the Republic of Haiti and the Republic of Santo Domingo.

The Navy Department very courteously gave me passage on the transport Prairie, which carried down 700 young enlisted sailormen from Norfolk to Guantanamo Bay, to be distributed among the fleet. I believe a majority of the 700 were from the Great Lakes Training Station, situated near Chicago, and a portion of them from the station at Norfolk. I watched those boys with great interest for seven or eight or nine days. I do not now recall just how long the trip was, owing to the fact that when we got to Guantanamo, on account of measles and scarlet fever, we were detained on board for a few days before the distribution was made. They were a bright lot of fellows, and really it did me good as I watched them day after day to see how intelligent and bright they were, and I felt prouder of the country, prouder of the Navy, prouder of the boys in the Navy as a result of the privilege of watching them and seeing them on board that ship. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FLEET NAVAL RESERVE.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 1771) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to the Fleet Naval Reserve, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman means to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, and I also ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the clause in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," which reads as follows: "The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to assign any member of the Fleet Naval Reserve to active duty for training on board ship, upon the application of such member," etc., be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking therefrom the words "on board ship."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, the only purpose of the bill is this: In the law creating the Naval Reserve Force, in the division known as the Fleet Naval Reserve, as to ex-enlisted men of the naval service they are required to serve some time each year in time of peace, and the Secretary is authorized to assign them for a month or so during the year for training. In the law as written he was required to assign them for training "on board ship." It appears now that that limits it to "on board ship," and that they can not be trained in the stations on shore. This simply strikes out the words "on board ship" and leaves it so that they can be trained either on board ship or in the naval training station on shore or in other shore stations, such as hospital work or radio electricians.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INCREASE IN MIDSHIPMEN AT NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2339) to increase the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy until September 1, 1918, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 2339. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in addition to the number of midshipmen now authorized by law, there shall be allowed for the period from the date of passage of this act until September 1, 1918, one additional midshipman for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress. Nominations shall be made for these vacancies by the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates concerned for any regular or special examination that may be ordered before that date.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, this bill allows the appointment by each Member and Senator until September 1, 1918, of one additional midshipman to the Naval Academy. Under existing law each Member of the House and each Senator has three appointments at the Naval Academy. One of the classes was graduated on the 29th of March, and the other class is to be graduated not later than September. I believe it was designated that they would be graduated in the coming September. There is talk that they may be graduated some time sooner. That would take two classes out of the Naval Academy in one year instead of one, and this bill would allow one additional appointment, which would give each Member and each Senator four appointments next year.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will we have the right to make these appointments any time between the passage of this bill and September of next year?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. There is no particular time when we must do it sooner?

Mr. PADGETT. No; you can appoint them, and the Secretary states in his letter, if the gentleman has noticed it in the report, that the appointments could be made to take the examinations that would be ordered at different times between now and that date. If a man is not ready to make his nomination now, there will be examinations held later. The first examination will be held June 27. If the member is not ready to make the nomination by that time, the examinations will be held later and the nomination could be made next year.

The idea is that perhaps 50 per cent would pass and go in the coming year and the others would go into the class beginning in 1918.

Mr. RUSSELL. Well, now, if we appoint a man between this and September, 1918, under this act, suppose he should fail after September, 1918, would we then have the right to fill that vacancy?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir.

Mr. RUSSELL. Would simply lose out on the place?

Mr. PADGETT. The whole thing would end there.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. BORLAND. What is the full capacity of the Naval Academy now?

Mr. PADGETT. At the present time approximately 1,200. That is a little bit over, but in round numbers 1,200.

Mr. BORLAND. How near is it full of midshipmen?

Mr. PADGETT. They had about 1,200; they had the full capacity.

Mr. BORLAND. How is it proposed to dispose of these additional appointees?

Mr. PADGETT. I will tell the gentleman. In the last naval approprition bill we authorized the use of the marine barracks there on the grounds near Bancroft Hall, where the 1,200 are accommodated. That will accommodate about 400 in round numbers. We also authorized the enlargement of Bancroft Hall to accommodate 600 additional, but that will not be completed and ready for occupation perhaps for 18 months. Pending that these marine barracks are to be used to meet the incoming class. If there should be any surplus the Secretary would put a ship with accommodations alongside the dock to take care of them until accommodations were provided.

Mr. BORLAND. How does the number of men who were graduated, or can be graduated, from the academy meet the needs of the present naval program?

Mr. PADGETT. Well——

Mr. BORLAND. How many men could they get out each year in order to man the ships authorized?

Mr. PADGETT. As ships are completed we take on additional officers, but of those ships that have been authorized it will be several years before the larger ones are completed. We graduated in March 180, and there were 2 young men who were sick and they will be graduated as soon as they have recovered from their sickness, which would make 182, and I understand there are about 200 who will be graduated between now and September. That would make 382.

Mr. BORLAND. Will that fill all the ranks as far as we need them?

Mr, PADGETT. No; we need more officers than that.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the number graduated, 382, fill up the present complement of officers?

Mr. PADGETT. Not all that are needed for the ships we have authorized and that are in course of construction.

Mr. BORLAND. What I am getting at is this: Has the committee in mind any permanent enlargement of the academy made necessary by the enlarged naval program we adopted at the last session?

Mr. PADGETT. Under existing law possible appointments to the academy will be about 2,050, and if that number are qualified by passing the examinations it would be possible for us to have in several years 2,050 in the academy, but we never have the full quota in the academy because a number fail to pass the examination. Others fail to stay in after they get in. Some die and some resign.

Mr. BORLAND. What I am trying to get at is this: Is the present capacity of the academy sufficient, if it is employed to a reasonable extent, to keep pace with the growth of the Navy according to the program we have outlined?

Mr. PADGETT. It will be full when we get this enlargement that I stated was authorized in the bill we passed March 4.

Mr. BORLAND. Then why is not this law made a permanent one?

Mr. PADGETT. Simply because we do not need it. We already have a law that authorizes as much as 2,050 appointments. This is just simply put in for this year because we are graduating two classes this year instead of one. We would only have two classes left of the four who were in there at the beginning of the year. This is just to fill up.

Mr. BORLAND. It takes the place——

Mr. PADGETT. Of those.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMSON. As I understand the gentleman's bill, if it becomes a law, it will simply create one vacancy from now until September, 1918?

Mr. PADGETT. It gives the right of appointment up to that time.

Mr. ADAMSON. It will be a vacancy until we fill it. Suppose you make the appointment and the appointee fails. Is that a strike-out, or can you appoint another?

Mr. PADGETT. If he were appointed now and he took the examination on the 27th of June, the first examination to be held, and he failed, you could name one for the next examination that would be held perhaps later.

Mr. ADAMSON. And keep on naming——

Mr. PADGETT. Up until September, 1918.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman is entirely welcome.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A boy who has been examined and failed just now, would he be eligible to be examined a little later on this year?

Mr. PADGETT. There is no limitation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And if examined and having failed within the last two months, would he still be eligible to be appointed in the additional class this year?

Mr. PADGETT. There is a general law on the statute books that when a certain man is nominated and fails to pass the examination he can not take the examination for that year unless he is recommended by the academic board.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I understand that very well; but here comes an additional class in the same year.

Mr. PADGETT. I know; but the general law provides as to holding examinations. If he has in that examination indicated that there is a probability of passing a second examination, the academic board has authority to recommend him for examination.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The academic board does not always do that, because I have a boy whom I had to appoint three separate years in order to get him in, and the second year he passed very high in every branch except grammar. It seems to me if there ever was a case where a boy should be sent in by that board and permitted to make it up, it should have been that boy.

Mr. PADGETT. Did you make application?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. The law provides he may——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I was unable to have it done. I then appointed the boy for the third year, and he is now in.

Mr. HOUSTON. Do I understand that this additional appointee must be appointed to take the examination that must occur before September, 1918?

Mr. PADGETT. You can appoint to the different examinations.

Mr. HOUSTON. That brings me to what I wanted to know. Suppose you appoint this boy in August, 1918, can he be examined in February the following year?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then the examination must come before that?

Mr. PADGETT. I should imagine so. If you named him before September for an examination which the Secretary has called for that year after that time, he could take it.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is for an examination that has already been called; not the regular examination in February and March.

Mr. PADGETT. That examination that is held in March or April, 1919, would be for the 1919 class; not for the 1918 class.

Mr. RUSSELL. This act provides that nomination must be made so that an examination can be held before that date, before September, 1918. It says:

Nominations shall be made for these vacancies by the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates concerned for any regular or special examination that may be ordered before that date.

Mr. PADGETT. That is what I stated. If he had ordered that examination before that date, although it might be held after that date, if he was appointed for that date; but he could not appoint him for the regular examination that was to be held in 1919.

Mr. KEARNS. Suppose this bill would become a law to-morrow, and within a week or a month an appointment would be made, when would he get examined?

Mr. PADGETT. The first examination would be held the 27th of June.

Mr. KEARNS. And when is the next one?

Mr. PADGETT. That has not been called yet.

Mr. KEARNS. He could enter on the 27th of June?

Mr. PADGETT. If he passes an examination.

Mr. LANGLEY. You are referring now to the special examination. Of course, there are the regular ones.

Mr. PADGETT. There is a special one to be held on the 27th of June, and I imagine they would hold one in July or August if there were a sufficient number of nominations to justify and they had not passed in the June examination.

Mr. REED. I have been notified by the department of a vacancy, and I have now a blank for the principal and first alternate for this June examination. Can I have the first alternate examined at the same time in order to be sure of getting one if the first one fails?

Mr. PADGETT. You could have three alternates examined if you wanted to.

Mr. REED. At the same time?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. LANGLEY. This makes no change in the existing law?

Mr. PADGETT. No. If this law passes you could name eight young men to take the examination, four for each appointment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. When a man is admitted by examination does he have to put up money for any purpose?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir; to purchase his own clothing and outfit.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. About how much?

Mr. PADGETT. Approximately $300.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Does he ever get that back?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Suppose he fails after his first examination?

Mr. PADGETT. That is his misfortune. It is like a boy who goes to college and incurs expense and fails. It is for his own clothing.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is for uniform and not equipment?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir; for uniform and outfit of clothing.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Is not that a discrimination? Does not the gentleman think that is a discrimination against poor boys?

Mr. PADGETT. All of them stand on the same basis. There is no discrimination against anybody.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. A boy who has not $300 has no chance of getting into the game?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, yes, sir.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. How would he get in?

Mr. PADGETT. There is no proposition to change the law in that respect.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. How would he get in if he has not $300?

Mr. PADGETT. I have never known a case where a boy that has received an appointment and passed an examination that some of his friends did not put it up.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does the boy require $300 if he has been in the service one year and then takes the examination for Annapolis?

Mr. PADGETT. He has to buy his outfit the same as anybody else.

Mr. BRITTEN. Can not that be taken out of his salary in the academy?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know of any provision for taking it out of his salary. But he gets his salary of $700 a year. He puts up the money in advance for his own clothing, and then if he does not spend his salary he has got that much accumulation at the end of his time. He is charged up with so much for books, board, and so forth, and they have a good big surplus if they save it. A good many spend it themselves, but under the regulation they do keep out of each month a small amortization that at the end of his graduation will pay for his uniform upon graduation and going out as a commissioned officer.

Mr. KEARNS. Is this taken out of the $701?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; in small amounts.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. If the candidate successfully passes this special examination to be held on the 27th of June, when will his term of service begin?

Mr. PADGETT. He will be sworn in in the course of three or four days.

The gentleman asks, if a candidate successfully passes the examination held on the 27th of June, when his term of service will begin. I say he will be sworn in in the course of three or four days if he passes the physical examination.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. If you have already a regular candidate at the academy for the year and this other candidate passes the examination, each Member will have another cadet in addition?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. Suppose the Member has a cadet there now?

Mr. PADGETT. He has an additional appointment, and that appointment carries with it the right to name a principal and first, second, and third alternates, if the Representative wants to put them that way; or he may name four young men without designating any of them as principals or alternates and may stipulate that they are all on an equality and that the understanding is that the one who makes the best examination will be appointed.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me five minutes?

Mr. PADGETT. In a moment. I promised first to yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. KEARNS. Just one moment, Mr. Speaker. Let me ask the gentleman this question: In the blank that you fill out you name the principal and first alternate and second alternate?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; but you can scratch that blank out and put the other stipulation upon it instead. That is the way I do it.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Has that always been the regulation that you could have a competitive examination? Have you to request that specially?

Mr. PADGETT. If you certify that you appoint A as principal, and B as first alternate, and C as second alternate, and D as third alternate, they will examine them in that way, and act accordingly. But if you scratch out the alternates and state there that you appoint them all on an equality, they will examine them all and grade them, and the one who makes the best examination will be the one appointed.

Now, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, something like a year ago here, on this floor, I charged the Army and Navy with being the two most undemocratic institutions in America. I rise to reiterate that charge, and I want to cite, as an additional proof of what I then said, the fact just stated by the chairman of the Naval Committee that a boy can not be admitted to the Naval Academy unless his father or somebody else puts up $300 for him. It is not a mere temporary deposit. He has got to pay that much out of his pocket, and he will never get one cent of it back.

I want to call the attention of the people of the country to this situation. It was disclosed by the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the committee, made in reply to a question that was propounded to him a few moments ago, that a boy, when he has taken the entrance examination to the Naval Academy, after having received a nomination from a Congressman or Senator, can not enter the academy until he has deposited $300 with the authorities to take care of his equipment, clothing, and other things that may be necessary. He never gets that $300 back. It never comes back to him at all. If he loses out on a subsequent examination, his equipment and clothing are worthless to him and his $300 is gone.

Now, what does that mean? It means that the common people are being discriminated against. It means that the sons of the working class can not be admitted to the Naval Academy because they have not got the money. The real purpose of such a rule is to keep the common people out of the academy. They might contaminate it. It would not be sufficiently exclusive in a social way if poor boys were allowed to enter.

In the first place, the Naval Academy is an exclusive social institution; a school of manners and languages, a place where young men are taught to be gentlemen of the world and accomplished ornaments of society. The entrance examinations to this institution are made so rigid that the average common boy has not got the slightest chance to get in. It takes a thorough high-school education to enable him to stand the entrance examination, and very few workingmen can afford to graduate their sons at high schools.

In the first place, a boy has got to have a father or friends who have enough political influence and pull with a Congressman or a Senator before he can be designated to take an examination for admission to the Naval Academy, then he has got to have a first-class high-school education in order to stand the entrance examination, and on top of that he has got to go down in his pocket and put up $300 in order to get into the academy. The end of it all is that few or none of the sons of the masses of the people are found in the Naval and Military Academies or are able to become Army officers.

No wonder those institutions are undemocratic. No wonder the academies are shot through and through with false notions of aristocracy. No wonder self-respecting men do not want to go into the Army and the Navy as enlisted men. No wonder there is an immeasurable gulf between the officers and the privates. No wonder it is difficult, if not impossible, for an enlisted man to win a commission in the Navy. The hard-handed common man would be out of place with his exclusive fellow officers of high social standing.

Oh, you call us pacifists, we who fear this great shadow of militarism that overhangs the land. I say to you that when you have created your vast armies and navies, when you have made officers by the hundred thousand, all selected from the upper classes, the classes of wealth, social prestige, and best educational advantages, you will saturate the country with undemocratic and illiberal influences, with the overbearing spirit of West Point and Annapolis that will be utterly damning to American democracy and ideals.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Oh, I do not want the gentleman to say anything. I want him to ask his question. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman says that the laboring man's son can not go in. Now——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I did not yield for a statement from the gentleman. I yielded for a question.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. You say a young man gets $700 for shoes and clothing and things of that kind. Can they not economize as much as they see fit on that $700?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I know this, that everybody who gets into the Academy has got to go down into his pocket and put up $300 upon his entrance to pay for his equipment and so forth and many poor young men can not produce that money. The average man's boy has not the necessary education to get in, in the first place, and in the second place, he can not produce the necessary $300.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the appointee has got to put up $300 at the time of his nomination?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. He has to deposit that when he goes in, and he never gets it back.

Mr. PADGETT. He has to put up a deposit after he has passed the examination to pay for his uniform and so forth.

Mr. KEARNS. He does not have to pay a nickle until he is admitted, does he?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. He is barred at the doors of the Academy unless he produces the money as a deposit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has no time to yield. We are in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill, but I do not think it goes far enough. There is a limitation in this bill providing that in addition to the number of midshipmen now authorized by law there shall be allowed from the date of the passage of this act until September 1, 1918, for each Member, Senator, and Delegate one additional midshipman. Now, the fact of the matter is we need additional appointments at the Naval Academy as a permanent thing, because we need more officers in the Navy, even under peace conditions. I find in looking over the hearings of the Naval Committee held last December that the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, Admiral Palmer, the man who is in charge of the personnel of the Navy and who fixes the complement of crews and officers for the ships, asked of the Naval Committee of the House the passage of a bill providing for the appointment of additional midshipmen without any limitation whatever as to time.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. And the Naval Committee reported a provision in the naval appropriation bill, that became a law, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to appoint from the enlisted force 100 each year, so that that would in the course of four years increase the number 400, and there would be 400 additional young men in the academy, which runs the total available appointments to the academy up to approximately 2,050, as I stated a moment ago, and that will be abundant material to go through the academy, and will yield the officers needed as fast and as many as we need them.

Mr. FOSS. I understand from the Bureau of Navigation of the Navy Department that we need more officers. I further understand that they would like to have this permanent legislation, without any limitation as to time. In the hearing of Admiral Palmer last December, before we were at war, he stated that for mobilization on that day—December 5, 1916—there were needed 3,049 officers. He stated that the number in service on that date was 2,111 officers, and the number of shortage for mobilization 938 officers. If you ask the Bureau of Navigation to-day how short they are in the matter of officers, they will tell you 938 on a peace basis.

In addition to this what did we do? We provided for a three-year building program, which is to be completed about July, 1921, and Admiral Palmer, the man charged with the responsibility of fixing the number of officers on the different ships of the Navy, stated that upon mobilization then we would need 4,487 officers. He says that the Naval Academy and promotion of warrant officers by that time will add 986; new officers from civil life, 60. Then to that he adds the number in the service to-day, 2,011, so that we would have an available force of officers of 3,157 to meet the demand and the necessity for 4,487 on the 1st of July, 1921. That, he says, will leave a shortage at that time, on July 1, 1921, of 1,330 officers.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. Last year, in the session which ended in September, we gave each Member, Senator, and Delegate, and the President additional appointments, that run the number up to something over 535 a year, and then we gave the Secretary 100 a year, which, as I stated, would run it up 400, and that would be running from year to year, and then the additional 537 that we authorize in this bill will overrun by several hundred the deficiency which the gentleman mentions by 1921.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSS. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSS. I want to ask the gentleman what was the enlisted personnel fixed at that time?

Mr. PADGETT. The enlisted personnel fixed at that time was 51,500, and we increased it to 74,000, with the provision that the President might increase it to 87,000; and in that same session of Congress we authorized an additional appointment for every Member, Senator, and Delegate, and added somewhat to the President's appointments, running the number of appointments to the Naval Academy up to something like 540 in round numbers. Then the additional accumulated appointments from the Secretary of the Navy would give 400 there at a time after four years; and then that runs from year to year up until 1921, and this additional 537, counting in the Delegates, gives abundant provision for appointments to the academy to meet everything needed.

Mr. FOSS. I will state to the gentleman that I have official figures from the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation with reference to the number of men. The number allowed is 96,900. There is a shortage of 26,000 men, and it will be necessary to add to these 96,900 at least 50,000 men, in order to make full complements for all our ships.

Mr. PADGETT. That is the enlisted personnel. The act of August last authorized the increase up to 88,000. The President called for that additional number, and a few days ago I saw that we had enlistments up to 71,600 out of the 88,000. They are enlisting somewhere between 600 and 800 a day now. Yesterday I introduced a bill to authorize a temporary increase of the Navy to 150,000. That is only temporary, however, above the permanent authorization of 88,000.

Mr. FOSS. Making the total enlisted force 150,000?

Mr. PADGETT. One hundred and fifty thousand. That is, the difference between 88,000 and 150,000 is temporary, and to increase the limit of the Marine Corps from 17,400 to 30,000, the increase of 12,600 is temporary.

Mr. FOSS. Will not this great increase in the enlisted force make necessary an increase in the number of officers?

Mr. PADGETT. We will need some officers in the lower grades. I do not think we will need any in the upper grades, and the bill does not make any provision for that. But increasing the appointments to Annapolis will not help this temporary increase needed because of the temporary increase in the enlisted personnel.

Mr. FOSS. That is very true indeed, because these boys will not graduate for three years.

Mr. PADGETT. Three or four.

Mr. FOSS. If we are going on building up our Navy—and Congress has already authorized completing this great program in three years—I want to say to the gentleman that I do not believe we have yet made ample provision for the required number of officers.

Mr. PADGETT. According to a very careful estimate that I have made, the present authorization of appointments to the academy by the time of the completion of the ships in 1921 will yield all the graduates that we need by that time. We will then catch up with the needs of the service, because when this war is over we will reduce the personnel and come back to 80,000 or 90,000, and we will have more officers than we need.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. Has the gentleman or his committee considered the propriety of having the law amended so as to meet with the objections so strenuously urged by the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. PADGETT. There is only one way about that, and that is for Congress to appropriate sufficient money to pay about $300 for the clothing for each of the twelve or eighteen hundred midshipmen appointed to the academy from time to time. They have got to pay it themselves, or the Government has got to appropriate for it.

Mr. ROSE. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good thing to put it in this bill?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not. I do not think there is any necessity for it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have one minute more, that I may ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes, in order that I may ask him a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSS. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any objection to striking out the words "from the period of the passage of this act until September 1, 1918"?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not think there is any necessity for doing that.

Mr. FOSS. Then, when we have reached the point where we have a sufficient number of officers, of course Congress could act on the proposition.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not think it is wise to increase the appointments to the Naval Academy to 2,600 when the capacity of the academy is somewhere in the neighborhood of 1,800 or 2,000. We have the authority to appoint now over 2,000 and maintain that number a year. There is no use in enlarging the appointment power. The gentleman must remember that only a short time ago Congress increased the appointments permanently by giving each Senator and Representative an additional appointment, and that has not got fully at work yet. That ran the appointments up from 800 to 1,200 the past session, and the next season they are looking for 1,600 under the act that we passed at the last session of Congress. If we pass this there will be in the neighborhood of 2,600 appointments. So there is no necessity for making this permanent. I brought it in for the purpose of supplying the deficiency in the academy brought about by the graduation of two classes this present year.

Mr. FOSS. I want to say that the information I got from the Navy Department and the Bureau of Navigation is to the effect that the present law, even with the passage of the additional one last August, requires a larger number of officers for our ships, those that need the officers to-day and those that will need them when the great naval program is completed. It is very important that we should have officers to officer our ships, and not only that, but men, too, and it is only in the interest of an efficient Navy that I call the attention of this matter to the chairman of the committee. And I make this prediction, that he will be here on the floor asking for permanent legislation for an additional appointment of midshipmen to the Naval Academy.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I want to ask the gentleman whether we have resources for officers outside of the Naval Academy?

Mr. FOSS. The Naval Academy and some that come up from the ranks?

Mr. FESS. How many?

Mr. FOSS. The number has been increased.

Mr. PADGETT. About 100 a year.

Mr. FOSS. Is that for every year?

Mr. PADGETT. That is for every year.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to suggest to my colleague from Illinois that officers are being enrolled in the service very much more rapidly than he has any idea of. I was down at the Navy Department this morning to inquire about the enrollment of a young man who graduated from the Naval Academy with high honors. He served as an ensign in the Navy and left the service 10 or 12 years ago. He has since kept abreast of the times and is a first-class engineer in the city of Chicago. He is a married man, but is willing to make a sacrifice and go into the service at once with the fleet.

The enrollment of this character of reserves should be promoted in every way possible, and nothing should be left undone by the department to bring about active service.

On the contrary, I am very much opposed to the system under which commandants of the various naval districts of the country have enrolled ensigns, lieutenants, and lieutenant commanders into the service, merely because the individual so enrolled has been the owner or the controlling power of some little gasoline launch, yacht, or other pleasure craft.

In many instances owners of these little boats have been enrolled in the service as lieutenant commanders, where they will draw pay, wear the same uniform, and have the same rank as men who have spent the best parts of their young lives in the service, while the newcomer is hardly likely to know the difference between a torpedo and a sewing machine.

Should the would-be officer own a boat of quite small dimensions, he is not enrolled as a lieutenant commander, but goes into the service as a lieutenant or an ensign, and immediately draws pay and has the same rank that lieutenants in the service have.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Are the wealthy yacht owners required to take an examination to develop their capacity as engineers or navigators?

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, the examination is conducted by the commandant of that particular naval district. No physical examination is required, no specific mental or service qualifications are necessary. The gentleman owns or acquires or borrows a yacht in the neighborhood and he tenders his services as commodore of that yacht, and is immediately enrolled as a lieutenant commander or as a lieutenant, with the same rank alongside of the men who have graduated from the Naval Academy and who have given the best of their lives to the service.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Do I understand that these men are being enrolled in the Naval Establishment or in the reserves?

Mr. BRITTEN. They are being enrolled in the Navy under one of the several reserves. There are four or five reserves. And, by the way, this particular reserve was recommended by the Secretary of the Navy and Admiral Blue, who was Chief of the Bureau of Navigation. It was purely experimental. Many members of the committee did not agree with it, but in the hope of acquiring a reasonable reserve—we had no appreciable reserve in the service—they said, "Let us acquire a few men by this classification, some others by another classification, and some one else down South or up North by another classification." I am told by men in the service that this particular classification of reserves, giving the commandant of the various naval districts all over the United States, inland as well as on the coast, permission to enlist or enroll men in the service has been a rank failure, and will be abolished probably at the coming session of Congress or amended in some way.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an inquiry about the bill, if I may.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The bill was drafted by the Navy Department and transmitted to the committee?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And I suppose that they will construe it the way they intended it to be construed. The bill provides that, in addition to the number of midshipmen now authorized by law, "there shall be allowed for the period from the date of passage of this act until September 1, 1918, one additional midshipman for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress." That does not provide that there shall be appointed during that period an additional midshipman, but only that there shall be "allowed" during that period. According to the language of the bill, at the end of September 1, 1918, there could be no more midshipmen at Annapolis than there are now. Is that the purpose of the bill, or is it the purpose of the bill to provide for additional appointments without interfering with the regular appointments?

Mr. PADGETT. Then, in line 6, after the word "eighteen," if the words "the appointment of" were inserted, would that meet the objection of the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. I have two tentative amendments that occur to me. I do not say that either one would be desirable. The first was to strike out the words "allowed for," in line 4, and to insert the words "appointed during"; and the second was—and it was an alternative proposition—to make it read "allowed to be appointed for the period."

Mr. PADGETT. I think the gentleman's first suggestion the better one, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. MANN. I did not know. I asked really for information, because the gentleman stated a while ago that possibly the class of next year would be graduated this year. I did not know whether the Navy Department wanted to have an additional midshipman there during the balance of the term for which he was appointed, or whether it was intended simply to name them a year earlier.

Mr. PADGETT. The purpose is to allow additional appointments during this time for every Senator and Member and Delegate.

Mr. MANN. Then, let us say "appointed during the period."

Mr. PADGETT. That is all right. If the gentleman will offer that amendment, I will be glad to accept it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker. I move to amend in line 4 by striking out the words "allowed for" and inserting the words "appointed during."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 1, line 4, by striking out the words "allowed for" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "appointed during."

Mr. MANN. So that it will read, "there shall be appointed during the period from the date of passage of this act," and so forth.

Mr. PADGETT. That is correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "date," insert the words "and may include names of those who have been examined for entrance after January 1, 1917, and before the passage of this act."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, having offered the amendment, I desire to say a word in behalf of it. The amendment proposes to permit Members to give boys a second chance within the year. Under the law a boy who has failed at the first of this spring's examinations can not again be examined for admission to the class which he missed. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] has said that he can not under the law be examined for a year. But we are to-day passing a law to create an entirely new class for this year. In case Members find some of their nominees who have been examined either in February or April of this year have failed, this amendment arranges that it will not be one full year before they can be renamed. Here comes a new class, and there are available for it many young men who might be renamed next year, but can not be named this year.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it will be well to put that amendment on there. It would just allow a reexamination of men who are incompetent, who have failed, and it would subject Members to considerable pressure to rename a man who has by his examination shown that he was wholly incapable of passing an examination.

Mr. MANN. You can rename him now.

Mr. PADGETT. He can rename him now by the approval of the academic board.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the chairman [Mr. PADGETT], in answer to a question of mine, thought that a man who might fail in one examination this spring could not be named as an applicant under this act.

Mr. MANN. There is no examination now until June.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and under the bill there is one, and there was one in February, and there was one on April 17—last Tuesday.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but a man who was named for February and failed can be renamed.

Mr. LANGLEY. I have already renamed one of exactly that kind, because he failed in February.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. One can not be renamed for a second examination for the same class. At least, I was so informed by the Bureau of Navigation.

Mr. BRITTEN. For the examination in June; but a special examination does not come under that law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me get that clear. Suppose you have a boy, a bright alternate, and he comes within two notches of passing, you can not rename him for this June——

Mr. BRITTEN. You can rename him for the examination in June. There is nothing to prevent that, providing he does not become 20 years of age.

Mr. PADGETT. I said for the same year.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman mean the same class or the same year?

Mr. PADGETT. The same class.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If that is the case, I shall be glad to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MANN. It requires permission to get a second examination, but if a man has any sort of standing at all there is no trouble about getting the permission authorizing the examination.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have not found it so. Let me tell again of my experience in appointing one boy. He came from so far back in the woods that it was easier to say that he came from section 19, township so-and-so, than to try to locate his post office. That boy at his first appointment as alternate made a rather poor showing. The next year I gave him another chance and he passed above 3½ on a total of 4 in all branches except grammar, and that was about 2½. I called on the Secretary of the Navy and tried to have that boy sent into the class and to let him be permitted to make up in grammar. I was told it could be done by the permission of a certain examining board——

Mr. BUTLER. The academic board.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The academic board. That board refused to give that boy a chance, and therefore I nominated him—a poor, backwoods boy, with no pull whatsoever—this year and he has passed at the top of the heap, and he will go in the academy; but it took me a long time to do it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman take a suggestion?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. MANN. Put him in the Revenue-Cutter Service or the Marine Corps and he will get on quicker and have a great deal better service——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I come from a marine district, which has put a good many men in those corps.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires to withdraw the amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. STEAGALL was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of physical injuries.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by having printed in the RECORD a patriotic resolution adopted by unanimous vote at a mass meeting at Mason City, in my district.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly I must object, and I do object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

FILING OF REPORTS ON H. R. 3545 (H. REPT. NO. 17).

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the majority and minority reports to accompanying the bill H. R. 3545 from the Committee on Military Affairs, introduced to-day, be permitted to be filed with the Clerk on Saturday, and that it shall be in order on Monday to consider that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the majority and minority reports from the Committee on Military Affairs may be permitted to be filed with the Clerk of the House on Saturday on the bill H. R. 3545, and that the bill be taken up for consideration on next Monday. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina when these reports will be printed? Not until Monday?

Mr. KITCHIN. They will be printed at once.

Mr. BORLAND. Is there not some way in which the reports could be put in print, even if they could not be filed by the Clerk, so that they would be available to the Members?

Mr. KITCHIN. You can get them from the Clerk. They will be printed at once.

Mr. BORLAND. Would it be possible to file them to-morrow night?

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not tell about that. I should think not, from what I understand. They can not be filed by Saturday.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me very desirable for the Members to have them before we begin the consideration of the bill on Monday.

Mr. KITCHIN. The bill will be printed. In fact, the bill is printed now.

Mr. MANN. The bill is likely to be under general debate for two or three days.

Mr. KITCHIN. I should say, at least, for two days. The bill is printed now.

Mr. GILLETT. When you say it is in order, you do not mean by that to waive any points of order?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not a bit. It is understood that no points of order or other jurisdiction is waived at all.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman include in his request also that it will be in order to consider the bill on next Wednesday?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman includes in his request that it be in order to consider the bill next Wednesday if we do not get through next Tuesday. Is there objection to any part of this request?

The Clerk will have these reports printed immediately when they get into his hands.

Mr. CARLIN. Reserving the right to object, would not that displace the bill that went over from last Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. MANN. It would.

Mr. CARLIN. If it can be done without prejudice, there would be no objection.

Mr. MANN. There would be no prejudice about that. It would go over for a week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article concerning a former Member of this House, Mr. Ricketts.

The SPEAKER. On what subject?

Mr. EMERSON. It has nothing to do with the war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. What is the request?

Mr. EMERSON. It is an article concerning a former Member of this House, Mr. Ricketts, of Ohio.

Mr. DOWELL. I object.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the location of the Government armor-plate plant at Charleston, W. Va.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the location of the armor-plate plant? Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. I object.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection to that?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, after that does the gentleman from North Carolina expect to move to adjourn?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; but I hope the gentleman from West Virginia will not make the request now. We will have to caucus this afternoon, and then we have a conference on the bond bill. The gentleman can get in some time next week.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. All right. I do not want to be intrusive. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Has any other gentleman a motion to make?

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that in printing the documents prepared by Dr. FESS, which are now to be put on the press, and will be printed much cheaper than they would be if we wait until after this first edition is out, they saying that they might be printed for the amount of $500 in addition to what is——

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman had an estimate made?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How many?

Mr. FOSTER. Between 3,300 and 3,400 copies. They could not give me the exact number. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who looked that matter up, to give the information.

Mr. MANN. How many can they print for $500 now?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Smith, the RECORD clerk, says between 3,300 and 3,400.

Mr. MANN. Let us say 3,300, then, and let them go to the folding room.

Mr. FOSTER. Then say 3,300 copies be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent that 3,300 additional copies of this compilation that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is making shall be printed and go to the folding room. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 20, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in this age on ages telling we seek Thy guidance and direction that we may fulfill the mission of our lives and measure up to the thought and purpose of God in us. We face a responsibility that staggers the imagination—burdens too heavy for us to bear. We seek the strength and wisdom and guidance that God alone can give. We pray that all our acts may be inspired by the presence and the power of Thy holy Spirit. To that end do Thou bless us and guide us this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. HITCHCOCK and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 2893. An act to amend section 10 of chapter 2 of the Criminal Code was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRODUCTION OF FOOD SUPPLIES (S. DOC. NO 11).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 6th instant, certain information relative to the increased production of food supplies, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 1771. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to the Fleet Naval Reserve;

H. R. 2008. An act to provide for the extension of minority enlistments in the naval service;

H. R. 2338. An act to authorize the detail of additional officers to the Hydrographic Office;

H. R. 2339. An act to increase the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy until September 1, 1918; and

H. R. 2340. An act to increase the age limit for persons appointed as officers in the Naval Reserve.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is receiving a constantly increasing number of documents that are neither petitions nor memorials. The Chair has no means of knowing whether the Senate desires them included in the RECORD or not. The Chair refers them to the Committee on Printing for determination as to whether they ought to go in the RECORD or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of Arbuckle Bros., of New York City, praying for the levying of an excise tax of 2 cents a pound on sugar, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Chicago (Ill.) Club, pledging support to the President, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Maritime Exchange, praying for the passage of a river and harbor bill at this session of Congress, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented petitions of the Merchants' Association of New York City and of the faculty of the University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Va., praying for compulsory military service, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Woman's Missionary Council of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in session at New Orleans, La., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota presented petitions of Prof. H. C. Solberg and other engineers of the South Dakota State College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, of Brookings, S. Dak., praying for the organization of the engineers of the country for national defense under the central authority of the United States Government and not the individual States, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have received a number of petitions from the growers of tomatoes in various tomato-growing sections in Florida with reference to the standard size of tomato baskets. I ask to have the one I send to the desk printed in the RECORD, without the names, because it is similar to numerous other petitions which I have received, and I think it is an important matter.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senators and Members of Congress from the State of Florida:

We, the undersigned growers of tomatoes and residents of the tomato-growing section of the State of Florida, do hereby strenuously protest against the proposed fixing of the standard size for tomato baskets to be used in standard carrier crates at a size suggested by the National Basket & Fruit Package Manufacturers' Association.

The size basket now commonly used in Florida for packing tomatoes is 9½ inches long in the bottom, 5 inches wide across the bottom, and 4½ inches deep. All inside measurements with the length of the inside of the top hoop 32⅜ inches.

The proposed new basket is 9¾ inches by 5⅜ inches by 4⅞ inches by 32⅜ inches. And the basket now used holds four full quarts.

The objection to the proposed new standard basket is that the extra length and width at the bottom will require more tomatoes to fill the basket.

All quotations on tomatoes now are based on the classification of fancy and choice. The fancy sizes are now 108s, 120s, and 144s. The 144 size is the most desirable size now which will be affected more by this change than any other. Fifty per cent of the crop now runs 144s; these will then become 180s, making choice tomatoes out of them and reducing the price 50 cents. The choice size is now 180, and if the proposed change is made will be packed 216s, which is practically worthless product. The only reason they are packed at all is because they have to be picked anyway; 144s are about half of the present crop.

The present crop amounts to about 7,000 cars, which is about 1,750,000 crates. Fifty cents less which the 144s would bring if packed as 180s, would be a difference of $875,000 per year on the 144 size alone. The 180s would be rendered practically worthless, which brings this loss well above $1,000,000 a year, and that would be felt by the tomato growers in Palm Beach, Broward, and Dade Counties, not mentioning the other tomato-growing districts of Florida.

There is no objection on the part of the tomato growers of this section of the State to 4-quart baskets; in fact they want a 4-quart basket, and want a standard basket, but the trade requires all tomatoes packed to be well above the basket, to be packed to overflow, so that actually there are about five quarts of tomatoes in every 4-quart basket.

Under the new proposed standard basket it would be necessary to pack much larger tomatoes in the bottom of the basket in order to bring the tomatoes well above the outside edges of the basket.

The present standard tomato crate is 10 inches by 11 inches by 24 inches. If the proposed standard basket is adopted there will be so much room in the crate that the baskets must necessarily be packed more than full in order to fill the crate. The crate must be full and therefore every basket will contain much more than 4 quarts of tomatoes.

The proposed new basket will almost entirely prevent free circulation of air between baskets, hence prevent ventilation, leading to a larger percentage of decay than at present.

For all these reasons we earnestly protest against the adoption of the proposed standard size basket and request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use every effort they can to prevent the adoption of this new proposed standard basket.

Mr. JAMES. I present resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Louisville, Ky., and resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Seminole Club, of Paducah, Ky., tendering their hearty support and cooperation to the Government, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOUISVILLE BOARD OF TRADE,
Louisville, Ky., April 17, 1917.

Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have the honor to transmit herewith resolution unanimously adopted by the directors and approved by the entire membership of the Louisville Board of Trade at a meeting held in Louisville Monday, April 16, 1917:

"Resolved, That the Louisville Board of Trade, a body created and maintained for the commercial, industrial, and economic development of Louisville, and including in its membership the leading citizens, firms, and corporations of the commercial and professional activities of the city, desires to express its sense of patriotic duty in this time of war with a foreign Government and to offer as a public body every facility which the board of trade may have to the Government of the United States in any of its branches, and to put at its disposal the services of the board and its whole membership in any line of work which the Government may delegate to the board."

Assuring you of the pleasure that it gives us to convey these sentiments of the loyalty and devotion of this community, we are,

Respectfully,

FRED M. SACKETT, President.
W. E. MORROW, Secretary.

SEMINOLE CLUB (INC.),
Paducah, Ky., April 13, 1917.

Senator OLLIE M. JAMES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the Seminole Club of Paducah, Ky., held Tuesday, April 10, 1917, resolutions were passed indorsing the stand of President Wilson and the Congress in their action of declaring war against the central powers and indorsing the principle of universal liability for military training as embodied in the Chamberlain bill now before Congress.

In accordance with instructions, I inclose herewith a copy of these resolutions.

Yours, very truly,

SEMINOLE CLUB,
H. D. WILLIAMSON, Secretary.

Whereas the President of the United States and the Congress assembled have, in the cause of humanity and justice, declared our Nation to be in a state of war with the Imperial German Government: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, citizens of the United States and members of the Seminole Club of Paducah, Ky., tender our hearty support and cooperation to the Government and indorse its action; and be it further

Resolved, That we indorse the principle of universal liability for military training as embodied in the Chamberlain bill now before Congress and give it our sincere recommendation, and that copies of this resolution be sent to Senators OLLIE M. JAMES, J. C. W. BECKHAM, and Congressman BARKLEY.

JOSEPH JACOBS,
C. M. HAND,
W. R. WRIGHT,
Committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from 27 citizens and business firms of Detroit and Jackson, in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against voluntary enlistment for the proposed army, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WEEKS presented petitions of the Business Men's Association of Hyde Park; the Ashmont Social and Athletic Club, of Dorchester; the Board of Trade of North Attleboro; the Committee of Public Safety of Newburyport; and the Bar Association of Norfolk County, all in the State of Massachusetts, pledging support to the President, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Suffolk North Association of Congregational Churches and Ministers, of Beachmont, Mass., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the National Guard Association of the United States, pledging the support of the National Guard, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HALE presented resolutions adopted by Cumberland County Pomona Grange, No. 15, Patrons of Husbandry, of Westbrook, Me., pledging support to the President, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THOMPSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Garden City, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the consumption of food products in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 27) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 1993) authorizing the Osage Tribe of Indians, in Oklahoma, to employ a tribal attorney for said tribe, and appropriating therefor Osage funds; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 1994) authorizing the licensing and control of corporations engaged in the storing of food products for interstate shipment; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

A bill (S. 1995) for the relief of dependent families of employees of the Government killed or injured in the service; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 1996) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. OWEN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 38) authorizing cooperation with the Ozark Trails Association in the inspection and selection of the route from St. Louis to New Mexico; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. GORE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 39) to appropriate $3,000,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to prosecute the work of eradicating the southern cattle tick; and

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 40) to appropriate $500,000 for the encouragement of the production of foodstuffs; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

RAILROAD FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution, which I ask to have read and that it lie over until to-morrow under the rule.

The resolution (S. Res. 44) was read, as follows:

Whereas the railroad companies of the United States have applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a flat increase of 15 per cent on all freight charges, amounting to $400,000,000 annually, in spite of the fact that within the past three years the railroads in the central division have been given an increase on freight rates of 5 per cent, and the railroads in the western division an increase amounting to between 5 and 10 per cent, and the railroads in the southeastern division an increase amounting to between 15 and 20 per cent, and the gross freight revenues of the railroads for the six months ending January 1, 1917, amounted to $1,356,039,797, and the net revenues for said six months of the railroads earning over a million dollars annually amounted to practically $700,000,000, the same being 3½ per cent for six months on the book value of these railroads; and

Whereas the applications for increase of rates, if granted, would place a great additional charge upon the cost of living, and are based largely upon the alleged increase of expenses caused by the Adamson Act, which has been variously estimated at between thirty and forty million dollars: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Committee be requested to investigate fully the facts and report the same, with their recommendations, to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over under the rule.

FOOD PRODUCTION.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution (S. Res. 43) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and hereby is, requested to inform the Senate as to what steps are being taken by the Department of Agriculture to induce larger production of foodstuffs throughout the United States and what assistance, if any, is being furnished by the department to the food producers of the United States to stimulate food production.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the usual form in such resolutions is to use the word "directed" instead of "requested."

Mr. KENYON. Of course I would have no objection to that, but I thought "requested" a politer term.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think according to precedent and practice the word "requested" should be changed to "directed."

Mr. KENYON. I myself prefer the word "requested," unless the Senator desires that the word "directed" shall be used. I think we can simply request the information. The Secretary of Agriculture may not be able to furnish all the information.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course he can say so if he is not able to furnish it all. I am simply inclined to conform to the uniform practice.

Mr. KENYON. I will amend the resolution by using the word "directed" instead of "requested."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified. Is there objection to agreeing to the resolution as modified? The Chair hears none and the resolution is adopted.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON INTEROCEANIC CANALS.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 45), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fifth Congress to send for books and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 2, the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to interrupt the Senator from North Carolina, with his permission, for a few moments.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish to ask the Senator if there is any probability of the bill now pending, which is the unfinished business, taking all of the day, or will it take only a part of to-day? I make the request because it is very essential that the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States be taken up and disposed of as speedily as possible. The Senator and the Senate will readily understand that the whole increase of the Army is dependent upon the disposition of the bill, and all the proceedings in the War Department are stayed until it can be finally determined what course Congress intends to take in reference to it. I should like to have that bill taken up, if the Senator can yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I realize the importance of having that bill acted upon at as early a day as possible. I think it will take two or three days more to dispose of the pending bill, but the chapter we were on all day yesterday—Chapter II—I think we can finish, probably, in an hour or two, because I do not believe there will be much more debate on it. If the Senator is satisfied with that course, I should like to have Chapter II adopted, and then, on my own motion, I will have the Senate temporarily lay aside the bill, that the Senator may call up the Army bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will be very glad to have the Senator do that. I think probably it is best to dispose of the chapter now under consideration before laying the unfinished business aside.

Mr. PENROSE. While this order of business is suggested, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon whether it would be his purpose to hold a session of the Senate to-morrow or to adjourn over until Monday.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think in view of the emergency and the necessity which exists for its passage, or the disposition of the act in some way, the Senate ought to continue in session to-morrow if the bill is then before the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. The bill now before the Senate is of the utmost importance, but we shall have all the time we will want on our hands. The most important measure of all is the Army bill. Therefore I will be inclined, as I said, to lay this bill aside; but I do not want to lay it aside now, because all the argument on Chapter II has been had, and if the bill goes over for a week we will reopen it and the whole argument will take place again. I want to settle the question now as to the press. It has been debated, and the whole chapter has been debated, with the exception of subsection (c). I hope there will be little further debate on it, and that we can soon vote on subsection (c). I hope to get through with it in an hour.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator permit me to offer an amendment, not to subsection (c) but a little amendment to which, I think, he will have no objection, to cover what I consider an important point. Beginning on line 21, page 9, the bill reads:

And whoever in time of war shall willfully cause or attempt to cause disaffection in the military or naval forces of the United States—

Then comes the amendment which has been agreed to—

to the injury of the service or of the United States.

I propose to insert after the word "States," in line 23, the words "or shall interfere with or obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States."

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection to that amendment. As far as I am concerned, I will accept it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 23, after the words "United States," where they first appear, insert:

or shall interfere with or obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Recurring to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], it is to strike out, in line 13, the words "or supposed plans or conduct," and in line 18 the words "or which might be."

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope the amendment will be voted down. As I told the Senator, certain amendments which he has offered to subsection (c), striking out certain words, I am willing to accept.

Mr. THOMAS. I understood the Senator's statement to refer to the proposed amendment to subsection (b).

Mr. OVERMAN. Subsection (c).

Mr. THOMAS. I am stating what I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. OVERMAN. In subsection (b) the word "intent" is used—and (b) whoever, in time of war, with intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense or calculated to be, or which might be, directly or indirectly, useful to the enemy, shall be punished by death—or by imprisonment for not less than 30 years.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will accept that part of my amendment relating to the next subsection, I will withdraw the part of it relating to subsection (b).

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us understand where we are. Suppose we take up subsection (c) and see what we can, and then we can go back to subsection (b).

Mr. THOMAS. I am perfectly willing to adopt that course. I was going to ask for a separate vote on the part of the amendment which refers to subsection (b). That suggestion is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. OVERMAN. I could not agree to strike out those words in subsection (b); I see no reason for doing it; but I want to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the amendment presented by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. THOMAS. I have seen that amendment, but naturally I prefer my own. If I can not get a whole loaf, I will be satisfied with half a loaf, but in this connection let me say I would rather prefer the phraseology of the amendment I offered to that of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has also moved to strike out certain words, which I have agreed to accept, and all that is included in the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes. If the Senator will yield to me, I believe that the suggested amendment I presented at an early period in the debate before these other amendments were suggested, if accepted, will obviate the objection to paragraph (c).

Mr. OVERMAN. I think so, and I am willing to accept that amendment. The Senator from South Dakota has offered a substitute for it which includes the amendment the Senator has offered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not seen the substitute.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is at the desk. If we can get a compromise on this matter, it may save a long debate.

Mr. STERLING. If in order, I should like to offer my amendment now.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think it will be in order, because we want to settle the matter pending first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. Perhaps the Senator from South Dakota did not hear the suggestion of the Senator having charge of the bill, which was that my amendment, which mainly refers to subsection (c), be postponed to a consideration of the other proposed amendment, because out of all of these amendments we may be able to reach a working agreement, which I think very desirable.

Mr. OVERMAN. Was subsection (c) the one the Senator from Colorado desired to postpone?

Mr. THOMAS. Both of them.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand, then, the Senator wants to postpone all of his amendments, and I therefore do not know what amendment is next in order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to postponing the vote on the amendments of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] until the disposition of subsequent amendments? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. STERLING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota offered an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object to the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us have the amendment stated.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought it had been stated. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 20, strike out all after the "(c)" down to and including the word "imprisonment," in line 9, on page 9, and substitute the following in lieu thereof:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized, in time of war, to make and promulgate such reasonable regulations as he shall deem necessary to prevent the publication or communication of any knowledge, facts, or information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures connected with or intended for the fortification or defense of any place which might be of use to the enemy or any other information relating to the public defense which might be of such use.

Any person who violates any regulation so made and promulgated shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or be imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or by both fine and imprisonment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, that is really a substitute for subsection (c) of Chapter II.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Montana for a moment.

Mr. WALSH. I rise to inquire if the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] shall be adopted, will the first proviso which appears on page 9 remain as a part of the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. My understanding is that that proviso has not yet been adopted.

Mr. OVERMAN. It has been adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been adopted, and would remain as a part of the bill, for there is nothing in the amendment proposing to strike it out.

Mr. WALSH. I thought possibly that the presence of that language might obviate the objection of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; it does not.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am glad the Senator from Montana has called attention to that fact, for though that was my understanding there seems to be some doubt about it. I am glad the Chair has ruled on the question, so that there will now be no doubt.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to say that there is no intention whatever on my part in offering the amendment to interfere with the proviso, being the committee amendment immediately following that amendment. I heartily concur with the provisions of the first proviso.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, then this amendment is really a motion to strike out subdivision (c) and to substitute therefor the provision offered by the Senator from South Dakota?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a motion to strike out and insert, so that the matter proposed to be stricken out may be amended before the motion to strike out and insert is put.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the rule.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not like the substitute, because it uses language which is found in the original provision, which I consider objectionable. It uses the language, "which might be of use to the enemy." I think that is too broad; I think the language should be "calculated to be useful to the enemy." If you will take the original provision of section 2, Chapter II, and strike out, in line 23, the two words "collect, record," then, after the word "publish," strike out the words "or communicate," and in line 24, strike out the words "or attempt to elicit"; then, in line 2, on page 9, strike out the words "or supposed plans or conduct"; then, in line 6, strike out the words "or which might be," so that it would read as follows:

Whoever, in time of peace, in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall publish any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be useful to the enemy shall be punished—

And so forth. I like the words "calculated to be useful" very much better than I do the words "or which might be useful." I think that the publication on its face ought to be calculated to be useful to justify its suppression. The term "calculated to be useful" signifies from its nature it is likely to be useful.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. As I understand it, the Senator's amendment is to substitute the word "calculated" for the word "might," in line 1, page 2, of the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; it is not. My suggestion is that we take what we have in the bill coming from the committee and strike out the objectionable words, leaving the balance. We have the matter before us; we have been studying it; and we can do what I suggest with perfect ease.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Georgia to propose to cut out the words "publish or communicate," in line 23, page 8? Ought not those words to be in the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I propose to strike out the word "communicate," and have it apply simply to publication. I would not object to the words "publish or communicate"; but it is really the publication that the President is after. What we are after is to prevent the publication of matter calculated to carry information to the enemy which will be damaging to our country. If we can give authority to do that, we shall reach the subject and stop that abuse.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is not the word "publish" broad enough to cover the word "communicate"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think so.

Mr. OVERMAN. If I communicate to the Senator the plans of fortifications down at Fort Caswell, in my State, am I not publishing them? Though I do not publicly make the statement, I am publishing them to the Senator. Does not the word "publish" include the word "communicate"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not sure; but I really think the word "publish" is strong enough.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think so, too.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, a suggestion just made to me by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], I think, is a good one. Suppose we leave out the words "might be" and the words "calculated to be" and just say "information useful."

Mr. OVERMAN. I have agreed, if the Senator please, to accept this amendment, and I want to see if we can not compose our differences.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, we on this side are interested in the debate and should like to hear what is going on.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have yielded to the Senator from Mississippi at present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The word "calculated" involves a premeditation; it involves an intent; it involves deliberation. If we were merely to strike out the words "might be," which are somewhat indefinite, and were not to substitute "calculated to be" or any other words, but just leave it so as to read "information useful to the enemy," then that would leave the question to be determined by the very fact of it, and not by the intent of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I hesitate to differ with the Senator from Mississippi about the meaning of a word, because few men in or out of the Senate have the accurate knowledge of the meaning of words that the Senator from Mississippi possesses. Undoubtedly the word "calculated" can carry the meaning under some circumstances which he attributes to it here; but I believe, if he will carefully consider its use at this place, he will see that that is not the meaning that should be given to it here. As used here, I think it has a broader meaning. Used in connection with the phrase "any information relating to the public defense calculated to be," I think it means "likely to be." I do not think it implies any intention that it should be of use, but simply that it is likely to be of use.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it does involve that there shall be a calculator, and the man who is publishing the thing is the man who did the calculating, and that involves his intent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; it does not mean that the publisher must have calculated it; it simply means that the information is liable to be or likely to be useful to the enemy. My preference would be to strike out also the words "or communicate," and just leave the word "publish"; but if that will harmonize the matter, I would be willing to leave in the words "or communicate."

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, how would it read as the Senator proposes to amend it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would read as follows:

(c) Whoever, in time of war, in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall publish any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be useful to the enemy, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from South Dakota that his amendment is practically the same as that proposed by the Senator from Georgia; and, as there is objection to accepting his amendment, if the Senator from Georgia will offer his amendment, I am willing to accept it if the Senator from South Dakota will consent to withdraw his amendment. I repeat, the two amendments are practically the same, and in that manner we can compose our differences. I am authorized by the committee to accept the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. I would have accepted the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota, but objection has arisen to it; and therefore, as his amendment and that of the Senator from Georgia are practically the same, if the Senator from South Dakota will withdraw his amendment, I will accept on the part of the committee the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator from Georgia is so insistent upon his amendment, although admitting that it is practically the same as mine, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Iowa has offered an important substitute for this section, and if we can get the text perfected the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will then be in order.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I only rose to suggest that, as I understand, the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Georgia has not been submitted to the committee; and so I can hardly see how the Senator from North Carolina can accept it on behalf of the committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will accept it, so far as I only am concerned, of course.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not object to that; but I would not want to be embarrassed by having it assumed that I believe the paragraph would be better when so amended than it would be if amended according to the suggestion that I intend to make.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that. I only accept it as the Senator in charge of the bill, so far as I am concerned. I do not think there will be any objection on the part of any Senator to accepting this amendment, and since the Senator from South Dakota has kindly withdrawn his amendment and since the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is practically the same as the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, therefore, if there is no objection on the part of any Senator or on the part of the committee, I will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I want to be fully understood. I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will improve paragraph 3; but I think that there are still objections to it which ought to be removed, and which I will attempt to remove by the amendment which I intend to offer.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not taking any advantage of the Senator, because he knows the parliamentary situation as well as I do, and he is aware of the fact that when the text is perfected, he can then introduce his amendment as a substitute for the perfected text.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that, but I do not want to be personally put in a false position.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to inquire if we can not have the question put on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to determine whether it shall be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is about to do that. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 23, after the word "shall," it is proposed to strike out the words "collect, record," and the comma after the word "record"; after the word "publish," on line 23, to strike out the comma and the words "or communicate" and the comma following the word "communicate"; in line 24, to strike out the words "or attempt to elicit"; on page 9, line 2, after the word "conduct," to strike out the comma and the words "or supposed plans or conduct"; and on line 6, page 9, after the words "calculated to be," to strike out the comma and the words "or which might be" and the comma after the word "be"; so that, if amended, subdivision (c) will read:

(c) Whoever, in time of war, in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall publish any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be useful to the enemy, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Georgia a question. It is, of course, impossible, not having the text of the section as it would be amended by this amendment before me, to indicate exactly where the words should be inserted in the amendment as read; but why not let the word "collect" remain in the bill? Why should anybody be permitted to collect information contrary to the regulations made by the President and which might be calculated to be useful to the enemy? The very fact that one is permitted to collect information without infringing this statute, although he infringes it if he publishes the information, might put a mass of information in the possession of some one which could be stolen from him or by some other means than publication diffused; and the information, which is the thing that we want to prevent getting to the enemy, might get to the enemy after its collection had been made through other channels. In other respects I think well of the amendment; but I think it is a mistake to strike out the word "collect."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To leave simply the word "collect" in the text would give to it the meaning not simply of gathering some information but of going after and absorbing large quantities of information, I think. It would not apply to casual information. I am just thinking aloud at present, and I do not see any objection to preventing efforts to collect matter that ought not to be made public. I am disposed to withdraw my suggestion as to the word "collect" and leave the word "collect" in. If any Senator disagrees with me, I should be glad to have him state his views on the subject.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I will raise this question: This was intended in part to refer to newspapers, and it is expected that the newspapers necessarily will be alert at all times to gather information for publication. This act will prohibit them from publishing what is improper, and undoubtedly newspapers in the natural course of business will collect a good deal of information improper to publish. It would not be expected that they should be penalized for collecting it. They should be penalized for publishing it. Necessarily in various ways newspapers will come into the possession of information which ought not to be published; and I think it would be a mistake to penalize them for collecting it when all we intend to do is to prevent its publication. At the present time undoubtedly newspapers are in possession of a good deal of information which they are withholding from the people because its information would be detrimental.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. The provision of the Constitution which forbids the Congress to pass a law abridging the liberty of the press is the same provision or clause of the Constitution which prohibits the Congress passing a law abridging the liberty of speech. What applies to one applies to the other. Some people seem to think that there is something about a newspaper man that makes him immune from the operation of a law which applies to other people—that he is a sort of sacred personage. I do not share in that belief. Indeed, I have rather a contrary opinion of the newspaper bunch in general. I wish, however, here to apologize to the Senator from Nebraska by reminding him that there are always very enlightening exceptions to every rule. But, Mr. President, I can not understand why a citizen engaged in the newspaper business should be permitted to go about prowling as he pleases to gather information, and to make that lawful because of his business and unlawful only if he prints it and gives it to the public, while at the same time you make it criminal for a citizen who is not a newspaper man to go about in the same way or in a less obtrusive way, frequently in a less subterranean way, to gather and pick up information, it may be designedly or it may be by accident—to make the mere collection of information by the nonnewspaper man a crime; a crime to collect it whether he gives it to the public or not. I can not understand that sort of thing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, undoubtedly this section applies not only to newspaper men but to individuals. It applies to the general public as well as to the newspapers. I only mentioned newspapers because it is the business of the newspapers to gather legitimate news and publish it. Now, in gathering this legitimate news the reporters inevitably will learn some news the publication of which would be undesirable, or at least the premature publication of which is undesirable. The grocer, the lawyer, the business man generally, the professional man generally, has no occasion to go to the War Department to ask for information. If he does so without any good excuse, he might be under some suspicion of seeking information to which he has no right. It is, however, the business of the newspapers to publish news; and their reporters, in going to the proper sources to ascertain news, may incidentally collect some news the publication of which is objectionable. Now, if they are told that the publication of that news is objectionable, and they refrain from publishing it, certainly they should not be penalized for collecting it; and it was only for that reason that I specified newspapers.

Mr. OVERMAN. Or some magazine man might want to write a history of the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. This provision in the bill authorizes the President to make and promulgate certain regulations. Now, I can conceive how certain regulations might be adopted which would be subject to the objection which the Senator has in mind. We are conferring here upon the President simply an authority to adopt these regulations. Whether or not they shall be objectionable in character will depend upon the phraseology of those regulations rather than of the pending measure. Do not the Senator's objections—and there is great force in them—apply rather to the regulations which the President may hereafter adopt than to the pending bill?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, I am not particularly objecting to this section, Mr. President. I only rose, in response to the invitation of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], to state what I think is a reason why the mere collection of this matter should not be made a crime. Its collection is incidental; it is natural; it is inevitable. In every leading newspaper office at the present time it is probably known where Balfour is; it is probably known where the French envoys are; but it is not published. It should not be made by any regulation a crime for those newspapers to collect that information.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. KNOX. Is the Senator bearing in mind in his statement that it is not the collection of this information that we seek to prohibit by this provision of the bill? It is the collection contrary to regulations prescribed by the President. We are conferring upon the President of the United States, now that this Government is at war, the power to make certain regulations for the public safety, the power to make certain regulations that will prevent information from being conveyed to the enemy. The reporters may collect all of the information that they see fit, unless they collect it in violation of a regulation covering the particular subject to which it applies.

If the Senator will permit me to add just one sentence, I do not by any means think that the newspapers are the only source through which mischievous information can be communicated to the public. There is the lecture platform and there are a thousand ways by which the most damaging information which had been permitted to be collected contrary to the regulations prescribed by the President might do just as much harm as if circulated through the columns of the most popular newspaper.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have not any idea that the President, by any regulation, could establish a method of collecting this information that could apply to the case. I do not think it is of any vast importance one way or the other; but I can see a reason why it should not be made a crime for perfectly innocent people engaged in a perfectly legitimate purpose to collect information. It is the publication of it that is illegitimate. It is the publication of it that is objectionable. It is the publication of it which should be made criminal; and I think it is going rather too far for Congress to say that it shall be a crime to collect information which is not used afterwards in any detrimental way.

Of course it is possible that the President may be able to draft these rules and regulations which are specified. I have very serious doubts whether that can be done, however. It seems to me we are going into this matter somewhat blindly.

The President will not make these rules and regulations. The making of these rules and regulations will be turned over to some subordinate. We do not know who it will be. He may make rules and regulations as large as a book, and go into details which will establish a new code of criminal law. I think it is rather a dangerous procedure; and certainly I do not believe in incorporating in those rules and regulations, as an offense, something which is an inevitable result of the business of gathering news.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, it seems to me there is one answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania. Subdivision (b) was intended to prohibit the collection of any information with intent that it be communicated to the enemy; so, wherever information is collected in violation of the law to be communicated to the enemy, it is punished by subdivision (b). Subdivision (c), however, makes the collection of information in violation of the President's regulations, whether with any wrongful intent or not, a crime under this act, and the collection of that information might be entirely innocent.

I am as anxious as anyone to give the Government the power, in time of war, to prevent the publication of any plans which will disclose the location of the Navy, or the plans of the Army, or the plans of fortifications, that will be of use or aid to the enemy; but we should not go so far as to make the mere innocent collection of information a crime under this law where there is no intent to use it to the detriment of the country. It seemed to me that the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], which is substantially that of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], covered the dangerous features of this question, and prohibited the use or the collection of such information or the publication of such information which might give aid to the enemy.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] put his finger on the important fact which we ought to consider. We are here conferring on the President the power to make and promulgate rules and regulations, a very broad power. I think we all know, if we will consider the matter, that the making of these rules will very likely be turned over to somebody else—possibly to the censor of whom we have recently heard. I do not say that in criticism of the President. The President can not perform all of the duties that are being daily heaped upon him. He must turn the great bulk of all matters over to subordinates. I should dislike very much indeed to have the censor that we have been told already has been named clothed with this great power or, what is the same thing, permitted to exercise it in the name of the President. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who looked up and smiled genially when I mentioned the censor, probably has about the same vigorous opinion I entertain, because each of us have lived in the same town where that gentleman has in the past resided.

I want to put to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who is a distinguished laywer, and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and to every other lawyer in this body, the question what is meant by the term "shall collect information." If I walk along the street and observe what is transpiring, and my brain records it, I have collected that much information——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I will give a concrete case very near to us. Suppose the naval plans of the Government had been up here in the room of the Committee on Naval Affairs, as they were not, when that man with the jimmy broke open the door and broke in there, and he had taken those plans—he was collecting them, was he not?

Mr. REED. No, sir; he was not "collecting information" within the meaning of this law at all. He was attempting to burglarize a public office.

Mr. NELSON. He was collecting information to pass up to somebody, evidently not to our Government, but to some adverse interest. If the Senator will allow me further while I am on the floor, a man may go to work not only with a jimmy, as in that case, but he may prowl around here, around this Capitol, around the departments, and seek all kinds of information, not, if he is a spy, for the purpose of publishing it in the newspapers—not at all. His purpose is to collect it as secretly as possible and transmit it to the enemy. Now, that ought to be prevented.

Mr. REED. That is covered by the section of the statute to which nobody objects, and is punishable by death. It is already covered.

Mr. NELSON. But sometimes a man may collect information through mere curiosity. Now, it seems to me there is no danger to the newspapers from collecting anything. They need not fear anything. If they collect something and do not publish it, they are not liable.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is the very point.

Mr. NELSON. The collection is a part of the publication. They must collect and publish.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; the Senator is in error. Under the language of the bill the collecting of information is a complete offense. The language is "collect, receive, publish, or communicate." Observe under that language the collection is a crime, the recording is a crime, the publication is a crime, each is a crime. I am not here speaking for the newspapers. I do not think a newspaper has any more business to collect than anybody else. I agree absolutely with my colleague [Mr. STONE] on that proposition.

I think I can briefly reply to the statement of the Senator from Minnesota about the attempted breaking into of the room of the Naval Committee. That man was guilty of burglary; that man was not collecting within the meaning of this section; that man was stealing; that man was a thief, he was not "a collector." If he collected State military secrets for the purpose of transmitting them to the enemy, he would be punishable by death. That is not the question we are now considering. We are putting into this statute this loose language, "whoever shall collect, record, publish, or communicate." The Senator from Minnesota will observe it is in the alternative. It is not stated that "whoever shall collect and publish," but it is "collect or publish." Now, what is meant by "collect"? I come back to that expression.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I am very much in sympathy with the criticism made upon this section by the Senator from Missouri, but in view of his interrogation I suggest to him that the words "shall collect," as used in the sentence, do not imply an act of volition, of purpose, or willful design. I do not mean by the words "willful design" a malicious or evil intent, but a volitional act, to do something in contradistinction to the obtaining of information that may come in a negative way rather than in an affirmative and positive way by some positive and affirmative act of the person obtaining the information.

Mr. REED. It is the Senator's view that if a man were to find out something accidentally he could not be sent to the penitentiary because of the accident?

Mr. KING. But if he sought it.

Mr. REED. But if he sought the information he could be punished. I am not sure of that.

Mr. President, there has not yet arisen any such emergency as to afford any reason for Congress or the country ceasing to employ cool and deliberate judgment. We do not have to revolutionize all our methods of life.

Recurring again to the word "collect," of course, there might be a collection of information entirely innocent, made for the most patriotic motives and purposes, yet such collection might be punished under this act. Now, when does the collection become inimical, if at all? It must be when the information is published to the world at large or published so as to be conveyed to the enemy. If it is conveyed to the enemy the act will be punished under previous provisions of this section. If it is published it will be punished under this section wth the word "collect" left out. If you take the word "collect" out you can still punish any man for publishing anything that will be inimical to the country or violative of the rules prescribed by the President. If you leave the word "collect" in you can punish a citizen for the mere gathering of information. Now, that is a very startling proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. In violation of the regulations.

Mr. REED. In violation of the regulations. I am not very much afraid of this if somebody will guarantee me that the President will sit down and with his own hand write out the regulations. Of course, he can not do that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REED. I am ready to yield the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to ask the Senator from Missouri a question.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. CUMMINS. The whole question seems to be argued upon the hypothesis that we are dealing with the Army and Navy alone. I wanted to get the view of the Senator from Missouri upon this point: Is the section confined to the Army and Navy as it is now? If the word "collect" were inserted it might still be an offense to collect any information relating to the national defense. Now, what are things relating to the national defense under the present view of the country?

Mr. REED. Is that the question?

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask the Senator whether it would not be within the power of the President or anyone whom he may designate to make these rules to say you should not collect any information with regard to the food supply? I can imagine nothing that would be more calculated to aid the enemy than the publication of our condition with regard to our capacity or competency to feed our own people or to feed the rest of the world.

Mr. REED. That question, of course, relates to another phase of this section than the one I was discussing. I was discussing the phrase "collect information" regardless of the use to which it may be put.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; that is in this section also.

Mr. REED. I think I understand what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. CUMMINS. You can not collect any information which relates to the national defense and which might be calculated to help the enemy——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not know how far the phrase "or any other information relating to the public defense" might be construed to go. I do not know who is warranted in telling us. I understand that a proposition is to be brought before Congress proposing to regulate food prices from the farm to the ultimate consumer. If that proposition is advanced, it, of course, will be brought in as a matter connected with the national defense. It would involve in its intelligent discussion, among many other things, a knowledge of the production and consumption of the country, of the amount of food on hand, and the question as to whether it should continue, if it were once adopted or if it should be modified, would involve the same proposition. Therefore it might be quite possible that a man collecting information upon that subject might become liable as a violator of a regulation if some regulation were adopted of an extreme character. I can not answer. It seems to me that we do not need to take the bit in our teeth and run away. This will not be the last day Congress will be in session; this will not be the last session of Congress. We can meet a great many things as they develop. It is not necessary to go further at this time, in my judgment, than to prohibit the publication of information that might be of use to the enemy.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I believe we ought to leave the word "collect" out of the subsection. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will not object to leaving it out now. If we for the present give this authority with regard to publications, we will be going very far. As suggested by the Senator from Missouri, I do not think there is anything better we can do than to stay here right along from now until December, and if any more legislation is required attend to it. We may take an adjournment of 30 or 60 days; but there is a responsibility upon Congress about this work, and for one I am willing to stay here.

I hope we will leave out the word "collect," as it is objected to by a number of Senators, and for the present give the authority to stop publications.

Mr. KNOX. I had not offered that as an amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know that.

Mr. KNOX. It was suggested. I should like to have the Senate understand my position in regard to the collection by anyone of information that would be useful to the enemy. If it is done in violation of orders made by the President during the existence of war, I want the Senate to understand that personally, at least, I regard that as a very dangerous privilege, and I think it is an entirely separate and distinct matter from the crime described in the section which immediately precedes, which was referred to by the Senator from Minnesota. That section, it seems to me, is designed to provide and does provide for punishment with death of anyone who with intent to convey to the enemy, might collect, or publish certain information, making the collection or the publication of it for that purpose punishable by death.

But this is a minor offense. This is an offense against the regulations prescribed by the President, which power we are giving him not merely for the pleasure of endowing him with power but for the purpose of enabling him to protect our country.

Mr. TOWNSEND obtained the floor.

Mr. KELLOGG. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator if he wishes to ask a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania think if the President makes a regulation against collecting any information in relation to our forces, our munition, or war materials by anybody the mere innocent inquiry of a citizen should be punished.

Mr. KNOX. No; I do not. I think any court would construe the words "to collect" as all criminal statutes are construed; that it would construe it strictly; that the court would construe it with a view to the mischief that it was intended to prevent. A mere casual inquiry by an individual as to matters affecting our Military Establishment would not rise to the dignity of the mischief at which this statute is aimed.

I believe there is another answer to the question of the Senator from Minnesota. I can not imagine that the President of the United States would make a regulation in such terms as would catch the private citizen or catch the legitimate reporter or the innocent person legitimately picking up news for a newspaper.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I shall support the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, because it modifies materially subsection (c). I shall be very glad, if opportunity presents itself then, to vote to strike out subdivision (c). I do not believe at this time we are warranted in going further than to deal with those people or institutions whose intent it is to injure the United States. For myself, sir, I can conceive of very much greater good that may come to our Army and to our country through the collection and dissemination of information through the statements of facts by individuals and through the press than can possibly come through their suppression.

It has been true in all the past, and it must continue to be true, it seems to me, that autocratic power to make criminal those undefined acts which are innocent under the statute has resulted in injury to republics, and this committee proposition may be a fatal step away from democracy, and it is one which Congress can not, in my judgment, constitutionally take.

But if we are to disregard the Constitution and say that the present emergency, influenced by excitement and lack of consideration, urges us to go so far as to limit for all time, possibly, those very safeguards for democracy which are brought out through discussion and proper publication, I submit we are in more danger than could possibly come to us through an exercise on the part of our people of the privilege to speak their judgment not only as to the conduct of the war but also as to the movements and dispositions of their loved ones in war. Make your punishments as severe as you like for the criminal acts of traitors, but do not quench the fires of patriotism upon which our final victory must depend. Free speech and a free press are more beneficial to the success of democracy than autocracy, however efficient for the moment.

Therefore, while I am going to vote for this amendment, because it modifies the bill and relieves some of the conditions that seem to me to be dangerous, I shall then feel perfectly free to vote to eliminate the section itself, because subdivision (b) covers all those cases where there is an intent to do wrong and injury to the country, and that is as far as we ought to go at this time. There will be time enough to take another step when its necessity is demonstrated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I move to strike out from section 2, beginning with the word "and," in line 20, page 8, down to and including the word "imprisonment," in line 9, page 9, and to substitute the following.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, beginning with the word "and," in line 20, after the semicolon, strike out all down to and including the word "imprisonment," on page 9, line 9, and insert:

> In time of war the President is hereby authorized to prescribe and promulgate reasonable rules and regulations, not abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, for the purpose of preventing the disclosure to the public, and thereby to the enemy, of information with respect to the movement and disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States or the plans of naval or military operations; and whoever in time of war shall willfully violate any such rule or regulation shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, however, That no such rule or regulation shall apply to the proceedings of the Congress of the United States nor to the debates therein.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think this is an apt time to express my view with regard to the subject covered by the paragraph which has been under discussion for the last day or two. I fully appreciate all the difficulties with which the Committee on the Judiciary was compelled to deal. The committee was confronted with an insoluble problem. It never can be solved to the complete satisfaction of either the Members of Congress or the country. The conflict in government between secrecy and publicity is never ending. I do not know of any way in which all the good or advantage of secrecy, and all the good or advantage of publicity, can at the same time be secured.

The committee gave the subject the most careful consideration, and I have nothing but praise for the faithful work which it did. Nevertheless, I think it assumed a false or erroneous point of view upon the subject now under consideration. I think it failed to recognize the difference between secrecy for the Army and the Navy and for military operations and secrecy with regard to public affairs which may be related to the public defense.

In trying to secure the advantage of secrecy, I think we are in danger of abandoning some of the well-established advantages of publicity. My objection to this paragraph is not to the words "collect" or "publish" or "communicate." While these may be important things to consider, the vital thing is in the breadth and comprehension of the paragraph and in the extent of authority given to the President in establishing the rules and regulations.

While I am not in sympathy with a great deal of the propaganda for the complete suppression of all news with regard to the Army and the Navy and their position, yet I do not feel competent to express a final opinion with regard to that specialized and technical matter.

If Congress desired to give to the President of the United States the right to prohibit anybody from securing any information with regard to the movements of the Army and the Navy, I would not feel disposed to object; but this paragraph—and it is characteristic of the entire chapter, so far as that is concerned—extends the operation of secrecy to every energy of the American people. There is nothing in which the American people can now engage which is not related to the national defense. It is now the supreme duty of the Republic to prepare for the national defense. It is the one thing which consumes and absorbs the thought and the purpose of the American people.

I asked a few moments ago of the Senator from Missouri whether the measures which have been taken or will be taken to provide for a sufficient supply of food, not only for our armies and our navies but for our civilian population, and for our allies in other countries, were not related to the national defense or the public defense. He did not directly answer the question, but I answer it. There is no doubt about it whatsoever. Will any man be heard to say that what Great Britain has done with respect to her food supply or what France has done with regard to the conservation and distribution of her food are not measures relating to national defense or public defense?

I do not, however, need to go so far afield in order to secure illustrations, because this bill itself contains more than one chapter which we are passing in order to strengthen the public defense, and which has no relation whatever either to the Army or the Navy. When we are asked—and I am not now objecting to it at all—to give the President of the United States the right to lay an embargo upon exports from this country to other countries, are we not passing a measure for the public defense? Would it be dreamed by any sane man that a measure of that kind could receive or would receive the slightest consideration in time of peace? No. It is purely a matter relating to the national defense. My objection, or my chief objection, to this section is that it puts within the power or authority of the President all public discussions, all controversy, all information relating to all things that tend to either weaken or to strengthen the national life. There may come a time when I would be willing to give such power to the President, but the time has not come.

I do not believe that we ought to give to any officer of the Government the authority to say what the citizens of the United States shall do or what they shall say with respect to our national affairs, except in so far as the movements of our military forces are concerned—their disposition throughout the country or throughout the world. I do not believe that it is either patriotic or safe to give to any officer the right to say that we shall not receive information and discuss information with respect to the condition of our troops. I do not believe it is safe or patriotic to suppress information with regard to the organization of our troops, whether they be military or naval. I do think, however, that we have reached the time when we can safely say to the President that he may make rules and regulations which will make it an offense to disclose to the public and to the enemy information with regard to the movement of our armed forces and the plans of military operations.

There is no subject in which the enemy is not interested. Germany is at this moment as much interested in knowing what the wheat fields of North and South Dakota and of Kansas will produce this year as she is in knowing where the regiments of our Cavalry or Infantry are; she is as much interested in knowing what copper Utah and Idaho and Montana will produce and what will be done with it as she is in knowing how many ships we intend to build. All these things are brought within the purview of this paragraph when it is extended to embrace all information that relates to the public defense and that is calculated to aid the enemy.

I agree with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] in regard to the interpretation of the word "calculated." I do not think it is a happy word, although it is used very often in this proposed statute; but I have no doubt that it will be interpreted to mean information which in the natural course of things may become useful to the enemy. I do not think it will be interpreted to mean a calculation in the mind of the person who either collects or disseminates the information.

Mr. President, there is a great calm common sense in the people of the United States, and I think that I have not seen that common sense—patriotic sense it is, too—expressed more clearly or impressively than in an editorial recently published in the Des Moines Register, a paper of my own city. I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may read at this point the editorial I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

AN EARLY "DON'T."

Sydney Brooks, who writes with as much authority about English and American relations as anybody, offers in the Independent a series of "Don'ts" for American consideration, drawn from England's first two years of the war.

Among these "Don'ts" is one the authorities at Washington will do well to heed, for if it is not heeded we shall have a lot of trouble muddling through. Mr. Brooks gives it second place in importance:

"Don't establish a censorship of the press for any other purpose than to conceal the naval and military intelligence that would be useful to the enemy. A censorship that is used to cloak official shortcomings, to suppress criticism, and to veil the realities of war from the people is something that no democracy should tolerate."

The hot haste with which all Europe decided to suppress news was, as we can see plainly now, merely an exhibition of panic. Nothing worth while has resulted from the censorship, and probably much damage has been suffered by everybody because of it.

It is easy to understand why important military movements should not be heralded to the world, although it may be questioned whether many things have come unexpectedly in this war on either side. There are too many other ways of knowing what the enemy is doing. But beyond keeping actual war strategy secret why should Americans be deprived of the full knowledge of what is transpiring that they enjoy in times of peace?

It will be easy to do a lot of mischief with an espionage law in this country. The American people are not used to espionage, and it will be hard to convince them from European experience that it is either necessary or desirable that they become accustomed to it now.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I submit, in connection with the extract that has just been read, my analysis of this section. As amended by the proposal of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], the President can make it a crime to publish such information. I assume that he is of my opinion in this respect, that the word "publish" is not confined to the publication by a newspaper. I suppose that if I stand upon the street and make a statement I publish the statement in the sense of the law. If this were confined to the newspapers, it would still be objectionable, but not so objectionable as it is in its present form.

Then, passing over, I read the words:

or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be useful to the enemy.

I hope the Senator from Georgia, upon reflection, will reach the conclusion that the language I have just read is too broad. We ought not at this time to establish a censorship upon all the energy and all the information of America; and all of it is related to the national defense, and would be held to be related to the national defense. I am willing to give the President the authority to deal with the Army and the Navy in the completest possible way, although I think that even with respect to those subjects he may go easily too far.

My amendment provides that—

In time of war the President is hereby authorized to prescribe and promulgate reasonable rules and regulations, not abridging the freedom of speech or of the press—

I do not say that the inclusion of those words changes the effect of the amendment in any manner; but I should like the people of this country to know that we still remember that there is a Constitution, which controls not only our actions but the actions of the President as well.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator believe that an act of Congress would be constitutional that infringed either of the 10 amendments or any part of the Constitution itself?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not.

Mr. KING. Then is it not a work of supererogation to add the words to which the Senator has just referred?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly; but I am fond sometimes of supererogation. I think it would be a precedent that has never yet been established in the Senate of the United States to express the fact desired to be expressed in the fewest possible words. I believe at this time it is wise, in giving power to the President, to say that he is not to use it so as to abridge the freedom of speech or of the press, although I quite agree with the Senator from Utah that any regulation that he might make under the amendment would be void if it abridged either the freedom of speech or of the press.

Now, mark you, I give the President the power to make rules and regulations—

For the purpose of preventing the disclosure to the public—

He is not limited in the methods that he may adopt; he can employ any rightful method for the purpose of preventing the disclosure to the public—and thereby to the enemy, of information—

Information with respect to what? Information—with respect to the movement and disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States or the plans of naval or military operations.

This is the power which I think the President ought to have at this time, and I am not willing to go further.

Not because it is material here, but because it will become material later on, I desire to refer just for a moment to the constitutional aspects of the paragraph. I think no reflecting man will assert that Congress may constitutionally pass a law abridging the freedom of speech or the freedom of the press. I have heard it suggested here that it could be done; but I think, upon further thought, it must be conceded that any law which abridges the freedom of speech or the freedom of the press is forbidden by the Constitution. I am not in sympathy with the idea that the powers that are given in the Constitution for the carrying on of war supersede and override all other powers of that instrument. It was substantially asserted that when the Nation is at war Congress could pass any law that seemed to it essential and necessary for the conduct of the war, without respect to any other provision or prohibition in the Constitution. I do not accept that view of the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose, in time of peace, Congress should prohibit the publication of obscene matter in the newspapers—can it do that?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe the Senator from North Carolina quite caught my statement. I said that Congress has no power to pass a law abridging the freedom of speech or the freedom of the press, but what does abridge the freedom of speech or the freedom of the press is yet to be considered.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would that be the business of Congress, anyhow? Is not that the province of State legislatures rather than of Congress?

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe that any law which is essential and necessary and proper in carrying out the powers of the Constitution, as granted by it, is constitutional. It may be a law which relates to the press, it may be a law which punishes the publisher of a newspaper, and it is still constitutional; but if it abridges the freedom of the press, then it is unconstitutional, as it seems to me. But what does abridge the freedom of the press is a judicial question. I have no doubt at all that if we pass this paragraph as it is, the courts will declare it unconstitutional; but that is not because we may not punish a newspaper or an individual for saying or publishing certain things.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. KING. The Senator has just stated that it is a judicial question whether an act abridges the freedom of speech or the freedom of the press. Does the Senator mean by that that the judge may determine whether a statute abridges the freedom of speech and thus deny to the jury the right of passing upon that question?

Mr. CUMMINS. While it may be unfortunate, I have no doubt that ultimately the Supreme Court of the United States will declare, if the occasion arises, whether this statute does or does not collide with the Constitution; and the only way in which it can determine that question is to ask itself, "Is this legislation an abridgment of the freedom of speech or of the press?"

The Supreme Court of the United States must always determine, as between a statute and the Constitution, which shall prevail. The Constitution itself says it shall be the supreme law of the land. It is, of course, familiar doctrine that the Supreme Court long ago assumed the jurisdiction—and I think it has it properly—to say whether a given law of Congress infringes the Constitution. That is the sense in which I said it was a judicial question.

For instance, if Mr. A is arrested under this section for violation of a regulation of the President of the United States, and he sues out a writ of habeas corpus, the question then is, Is Mr. A lawfully detained? He is lawfully detained, we will assume, if this statute is constitutional, if Congress had the authority to pass it. How is the Supreme Court to determine whether Congress had the power to pass it? It would be claimed in the proceeding that it was an abridgment of the freedom of speech or of the press, and the court would be compelled to answer that claim. It would be compelled to consider and determine whether in passing this law Congress had abridged the freedom of the press. I see no escape whatever from that conclusion.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree with the Senator. The question is, What is an abridgment of the freedom of the press?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. OVERMAN. It comes to that. Now, we have passed at this session a law which some would say is an abridgment of the freedom of the press. We have provided that the mails shall be denied to papers which publish liquor advertisements.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is not that an abridgment of the freedom of the press?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina can not expect me to answer all these legal questions, because they are not material. I do not know that my opinion would be of any great value with respect to that particular statute. I am going to point out in a moment or two why I think this statute is an abridgment of the freedom of the press.

I assume that no one would contend that Congress could pass a law at this moment declaring it to be a crime to publish any newspaper in the United States pending the war. Is there anyone here who claims that that could be done? If Congress thought the public safety would be promoted by absolute silence, both on the part of newspapers and on the part of individuals, on all subjects, does the Senator from North Carolina believe that Congress could pass a law making it a crime for any citizen to speak on any subject or for any newspaper to be published at all?

Mr. OVERMAN. If it was absolutely necessary for the protection of the Government and the Constitution itself? Does the Senator carry it that far—that it was necessary to have silence in the press in order to save the Constitution under which we live and preserve the Government we have? If it was absolutely necessary—I could not assume that it ever would be necessary—but if it was absolutely necessary to save the Constitution, to save our liberties, to save our country, yes!

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, we would not save our Constitution, certainly. We might save our country.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; we would save our Constitution and our liberty, because the Constitution provides that we shall——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator——

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to hold the Senator from North Carolina to that statement—and I have no doubt it is sincerely made, because one who believes that this paragraph is constitutional is bound to believe that Congress could, if it thought the public safety required it, suppress every newspaper in the land, and put every citizen into jail, in order to preserve silence.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to qualify the statement by saying that it must be absolutely necessary, in order to preserve our country, to command silence. Without a country it is of no use to have a constitution, and in order to save the Constitution we must save our country. We can not save our Constitution unless we save our country.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know the time may come when we must override the Constitution.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. The time may come—I hope it never will come—when it will be absolutely necessary for the people of this country to disregard all the learning of former times, and begin anew the conflict with wrong; but no one ought to contend that if that time comes, and if we do begin anew this struggle of life, we will be doing it under the Constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The latter part of the Senator's statement has thrown quite a different light upon the statement that I understood him to make.

Mr. CUMMINS. I mean that would simply be the organization of a new government.

Mr. REED. I agree with the Senator on that perfectly, of course; but I do not agree with the argument that is being made by the Senator from North Carolina and others, that in order to save the Constitution we must rape the Constitution.

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President; the Senator was not here when the Senator from Iowa put his question to me. The Senator said, if it was absolutely necessary——

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I did not say that.

Mr. OVERMAN. If it was absolutely necessary to save the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not. The Senator from North Carolina did.

Mr. REED. I did not so much hear the Senator from North Carolina, but I heard the argument made on yesterday. Some Senator read a letter from Abraham Lincoln without any context, without telling us what the letter related to; and while I do not know, I venture to say that the letter was written at a time when the country was in an absolute life-and-death struggle, and when probably it had relation to the emancipation of the slaves. I do not know; I was just an infant at that time. I deny absolutely that we can set aside a single precept of the Constitution at this time in this country. I assert that there is no necessity to violate the Constitution in order to save it. I assert that the only time the ordinary civil rights of the citizen can be set aside, even in time of war, is when that condition has arisen which warrants the declaration of martial law, which supersedes the civil law, when martial law can be properly declared; and that, under the authorities as far as they have been written up to this time, can be done only when there is an actual condition of war in the country which has proceeded to such an extent as to paralyze the arm of the civil authority.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to say that I agree with what the Senator has said.

Mr. REED. Why, I know the Senator must agree with me.

Mr. OVERMAN. As the Senator referred to me, not having heard what I said in reply to the Senator from Iowa——

Mr. REED. I know the Senator must agree with me. I am protesting—I protested before, and I protest again—against this doctrine which is being taught here in the Chamber of the United States Senate, that we are now to disregard the Constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. If I may suggest to the Senator from Missouri, what gave rise to this colloquy between the Senator from North Carolina and myself was this: I asked him whether he thought it would be constitutional, if a majority of the Members of Congress believed it to be necessary, to pass a law making it a crime to publish anything in any newspaper, and making it a crime for a citizen to speak on any subject. The Senator from North Carolina very logically and very quickly responded that if Congress believed it to be necessary, such a law could be passed in conformity with the Constitution. I do not believe that he is correct in his conclusion.

I had adverted before to the suggestion that ultimately it is a judicial question. Whatever law we pass relating to the public press will ultimately come to the test of a court, and the court will say, and must say, whether the law constitutes an abridgment of the freedom of the press; and if the court declares that it is an abridgment, the law will fail.

I heard it said here yesterday that every part of the Constitution must be subordinated to the war power. The power is given in the Constitution to carry on war. I rose once to ask the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and I now ask those who are here, this question:

Suppose Congress thought it was necessary in order better to carry on the war that Rhode Island, a State of small area, should be represented in the Senate by only one Senator, and that New Mexico, a State of great territory but sparsely populated, should be represented by four Senators. Does the Senator from North Carolina think that we could pass a law for the conduct of the war ignoring the provisions of the Constitution with regard to the composition of the Senate? And, if not, why; if the theory advanced by the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from New Mexico is sound; if every clause of the Constitution must yield to the powers that we undoubtedly have to raise armies and navies and to carry on war?

That thought must be dismissed. There may come a time when all the territory of the United States, or any part of the territory of the United States can be subjected to martial law. That time will come, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri, whenever the courts are not accessible, when events have overridden civilization sufficiently so that neither the citizen nor the Government can appeal to the courts. Then, in the very nature of things, necessarily martial law is substituted for civil law. But that time I hope will never come. At least no one will contend that it has yet arrived, and up to this moment we are living under the Constitution; we are living under the safeguards with which it surrounds the citizen; and we are living under the powers which the Constitution grants to Congress.

Does the Senator from North Carolina—do any of the Senators who believe that the Constitution can be suspended at will believe that we could declare that one who is brought to trial under the very act that we are passing can be tried without a jury? And if not, why not? If the war power is overpowering and overwhelming and sweeps everything before it, and we believe that the sympathies of a jury would prevent prompt conviction, why not declare that the accused can be tried before a judge and convicted of a capital offense and punished for it without the intervention of a jury?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not understand that any Senator has contended on this floor that there is anything in this act which suspends the Constitution, but the argument has been that it is within the Constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true of most of the Senators who have spoken about it, but whenever the subject has been mentioned there has seemed to be an inclination on the part of some Senators to insist that there is no limit to the power of Congress when we are dealing with the question of war. I for one can not accept any such interpretation of the Constitution or any such standard for the duty of a Senator. I believe that the courts, if this statute is passed in the form in which it is now proposed, will declare it to be unconstitutional, because it is an unreasonable and unnecessary abridgment of the freedom of the press.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not differentiate between the act itself as a legitimate exercise of the power of Congress to enact it and the proceedings of the President or the censorship board under the act? That is to say, may not Congress legitimately exercise its power to restrain publications that would be injurious to the military success of the Government and aid the enemy, and yet some person to whom the power might be delegated to formulate and promulgate reasonable rules and regulations under that law might formulate and promulgate unreasonable ones, so that their rule might be held to be unconstitutional, and yet the act itself be constitutional?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can very readily conceive a case such as is put by the Senator from Utah. This paragraph might be very easily amended so as to bring it within the rule which he announces and leave the situation so that if anything fell it would be the regulation of the President and not the law. But, in my opinion, that is not true of this particular phraseology. I think we are committing to the President the power to make a regulation for secrecy upon a breadth of subjects which, in and of itself, is unconstitutional, if the President exercises the power, and if he does not the question could never arise.

Now, I do not agree with some of the analysis or interpretation of the bill submitted yesterday, that it contemplates a board of censors and an effort to prevent publication before the fact; at least, I do not understand the paragraph in that way. We have a board of censors now, and it has been organized for the purpose I assume of preventing the disclosure of information through the newspapers or determining what information shall be given to the newspapers. I have no objection whatever to it. I think it is entirely reasonable and an entirely proper thing to do. If I understand this paragraph it intends to give to the President the power to prescribe general rules and regulations which take the place of law, which are in themselves law, which, being violated, subject the offender to the punishment mentioned in the section.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. If it would not interrupt the Senator, I should like to get his view as to the necessity of subsection (c), because the Senator knows that subsection (b) is in almost the exact phraseology and covers practically every offense that could be committed under a regulation based upon subsection (c), the only difference I see being that in one instance an intent is necessary to constitute the crime, and in the other the intent does not exist. I should like to get the Senator's view as to any necessity whatsoever for subsection (c).

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is right in regard to the construction of paragraph (b). It is in the identical language of the original (c), except that in order to constitute a crime there must be an intent that the information shall be communicated to the enemy, and it does not require the intervention of a regulation prescribed by the President.

In answer to the other inquiry I may be permitted to say this: It is quite likely that there will come a time in the progress of the war when absolute secrecy, without regard to the intent of the person who receives the information or communicates it, shall be preserved. I do not think the time has come. I agree with the sentiment of the editorial which was read at the desk a few moments ago that we ought to advance our espionage, we ought to advance toward the suppression of information in which people are interested, and deeply interested, very slowly. We ought not to provoke animosity on the part of the people, suspicion on their part, by thrusting upon them at this time the rigors of paragraph (c) of this chapter. I think we will do vastly more harm than good. I think we will do our own people more injury in their attitude toward the administration and toward the conduct of affairs than we will do our armies and our navies good by silencing individuals and muzzling the press.

As I think everyone here knows, I favor the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to strike out paragraph (c), first, because I believe it to be unconstitutional, and, second, because I believe it to be unnecessary and a real harm in the progress of the war. I think that the President, through the board which is already constituted, will be able to preserve the vital information concerning the Army and the Navy which ought not to reach the enemy, and I think it will be infinitely better to proceed for a time, anyhow, under that arrangement than to pass this paragraph. But I am assuming that that is not in accord with the majority sentiment of the Senate, and I am endeavoring to point out my reason for offering the amendment which has just been read and which is now before the Senate.

If we pass any law just now, I should like it to be a constitutional law. If we pass any law just now upon this subject, I hope it will be one which will not offend the free-born American citizen upon whose patriotism and through whose enthusiasm the war must be brought to a successful conclusion. I think it will be a great mistake to try at this time to draw the veil of secrecy over everything that may pertain to our public defense. I think we will chill many a glowing heart, and we will instill suspicion into many a generous mind when we attempt to give to the President the power which this paragraph gives him.

My amendment differs mainly from the committee's proposal in this, that it limits the subjects upon which the President can make the regulations of secrecy to the movement of our Army and our Navy—that is, our armed force—and to our plans for military and naval operations. I think the court will hold, if the question is ever submitted to it, that that does not constitute an abridgment of the freedom of the press or an abridgment of the freedom of speech. I think, upon the doctrine that Alexander Hamilton himself laid down so eloquently and conclusively in the somewhat famous libel case which involved Thomas Jefferson, a statute of that kind can be sustained.

But when we advance beyond that and take in or embrace all the things in the country which may relate to the public defense, and when we attempt to close the columns of the newspapers to all information relating to everything which may be interesting to the enemy but which touches the national defense; when we attempt to lay the obligation upon every citizen that he shall not publish or communicate, for there is no difference between the two words in substance; when we attempt to prohibit every citizen from saying anything with regard to the vast multitude of subjects which relate to the public defense, I think we offend the Constitution; I think it is an abridgment of the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press, and I think any court in America to which that question is submitted will declare that such a law followed by such a regulation is unconstitutional, because it is an abridgment of speech and an abridgment of the freedom of the press.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me suggest that if we discover upon an examination of the statutes of the Empire of Germany a provision identical with paragraph (c), would it not be one of the plainest evidences of the autocratic power of that Government because entirely obnoxious to the very spirit of democracy?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true. I heard the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] say yesterday, and I have heard it repeated often, that we ought not in the effort to overthrow inherited power and autocracy in Europe establish tyranny at home, and there is no tyranny so obnoxious as the tyranny of a law administered as this must be administered.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. In this connection I would like to ask the Senator from Iowa if the doctrine of necessity laid down by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] with respect to the Constitution does not savor of the doctrine laid down by the German Imperial Government, that necessity justifies her breach of international law? That has been her defense.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am glad the Senator from Oklahoma has interposed that suggestion. While the Senator from North Carolina is one of the most patriotic Senators in this body and one of the most esteemed citizens of the Republic, the doctrine which he has announced is the doctrine of despotic, autocratic power, unrestricted, untrammeled power, sustained only by the thin veneer of necessity. That is the very thing that it is our mission to overthrow in this wicked world, and I am sorry to begin the first great war to enforce these righteous and everlasting doctrines of human right by overthrowing in our own country the most priceless heritage bequeathed to us from the valor, the courage, and the patriotism of former years.

Mr. THOMAS. Necessity is always the plea of tyrants.

Mr. CUMMINS. Senators, it is not necessary that we do a thing of this sort at this time. If the time ever comes that was gloomily anticipated by the Senator from North Carolina, and if we can not prosecute the war under the Constitution, if we have to abandon all these safeguards, throw aside all the work of our forefathers, and call the people of this country together to organize another government of a different character, let us deal with the problems of that situation when it arises.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I understood the Senator to say, and I am very glad to hear him assert, that the Congress has, in his judgment, the power to legislate upon this subject; that is, to prevent information from getting to the enemy concerning the movements of troops, and so on, and that without abridging the freedom of the press.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think there is a field in which it can legislate.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator enunciate for us the principle which would enable us to differentiate between that information and——

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no principle.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not the principle of necessity?

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not within the power of Congress to legislate so far as is necessary in order to do that?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. WALSH. And is not that the test?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so. But it can not determine what is necessary.

Mr. WALSH. Who can?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Supreme Court of the United States will ultimately determine that question.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, it must determine it upon some rule. I want the Senator to give us the rule.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have given the rule, when the Senator was not here; that is, I discussed that phase of it.

Otherwise, the first amendment of the Constitution of the United States means nothing. If Congress can determine for itself whether a given law is an abridgment of the freedom of the press, then there is no merit or protection in the first amendment; then we have arrived at a construction for which the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has been so long contending, namely, that it was an impertinence for the courts to attempt to determine whether a given law of Congress was within or without the constitutional powers.

Mr. WALSH. I have certainly not heard any of the advocates of this measure insist that Congress is the final arbiter. Certainly I have not asserted anything of the kind. I have endeavored to lay down some rule which would differentiate that which falls within the power of Congress from that which falls without the power of Congress. I have not heard it asserted by anyone upon this floor that Congress may pass any law that it sees fit to pass upon this matter and that it is the final arbiter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly not. I asserted what I did in order that the Senator from Montana might understand the course of my argument. I assume that the first amendment means something; that it means that Congress shall not pass a law abridging the freedom of the press. Now, some one must ultimately determine whether a given law passed by Congress does abridge the freedom of the press, and I know of no other authority save the courts of the United States which can determine that question.

Mr. WALSH. Neither does "the Senator from Montana" know of any other method, but Congress is obliged to form its own judgment about the matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; it must exercise its own judgment in the passage of the law, and I suppose that the provision of the Constitution as well as any law that we may pass upon any subject must be finally tested in the crucible of reasonableness. I know the word I have just used is indefinite, but there is no other test whatever. It can not be said that any law which may affect the character of the information which a newspaper publisher may give in his columns is an abridgment of the freedom of the press. I can not accept that as the proper interpretation of the amendment. Nor can I go to the length others have gone here to-day, that any statute which we might pass in our desire to defend the country or in the exercise of our war power is not an abridgment of the freedom of the press. I asked the Senator from North Carolina before the Senator from Montana came in, and I would like to put the question to him, whether he thinks that a law passed at this moment prohibiting the issuance or publication of any newspaper during the period of the war and commanding absolute silence on the part of every citizen during the same period on every subject would be constitutional?

Mr. WALSH. That is very simple. I should say not.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Montana thinks it would not be constitutional?

Mr. WALSH. I think it would not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I do not see how there could be any doubt about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. If not, it must be because, among other things, it would abridge the freedom of speech and abridge the freedom of the press. There might be other reasons also for striking down a law of that kind. I quite agree with that.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to know of the Senator from Iowa, because I should like to vote advisedly upon his amendment, what the significance is in his amendment of the language "not abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." He proposes that the President shall be authorized to make regulations, not abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.

Mr. CUMMINS. I answered that also in response to an inquiry put by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], but I am very glad to answer it again. The only significance which those words have is to remind the people of the United States that we still remember that there is a Constitution, under which we make our laws.

Mr. WALSH. It is educative in character.

Mr. CUMMINS. Educative and psychological.

Mr. GORE. And reminiscent.

Mr. CUMMINS. We are in danger of forgetting that there is a Constitution. There was much said here yesterday that would furnish proof for the charge that we were indifferent about the Constitution or cared not whether we had one or not, and believed that we could supersede it and suspend it whenever we thought the public necessity required. I inserted those words to preserve in the minds of the people the thought that we were still enacting legislation under the Constitution.

Mr. WALSH. I trust the Senator did not draw any inference from anything said by "the Senator from Montana" on that subject.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am interested, Mr. President, in the scope of the substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa. It authorizes the President to prescribe and promulgate reasonable rules and regulations for the purpose of preventing a disclosure to the public, and thereby to the enemy, of information with respect to the movement and disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States or of the plans of naval or military operations. I ask the Senator what is the necessity of conferring upon the President that power. Does he not already have that power as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Why the necessity, then, of the amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. If the purpose is not obvious, I am afraid I can not make it clear. I assume that the President can, in so far as his supervision goes, prevent the disclosure by the several departments of information relating to the Army and the Navy; but suppose it is disclosed to individuals or to the newspapers, then the President's power ceases and the individual who communicates or the individual who publishes can not be punished. The purpose of this paragraph is to inflict punishment upon the person who in violation of the rules of the President discloses to the public the information. I think that is the only object.

Mr. President, I have occupied the time of the Senate much longer than I intended. My only apology, so far as the latter part of my observations is concerned, is that the constitutional inquiries which have been raised respecting this part of the bill will be raised again, not in the exact form in which we have been considering them but in other forms as we approach later chapters of the measure; and I wanted to put on record my dissent from what seems to be the view of many who favor this legislation—that there could be no unconstitutional enactments under the war power.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, there seems to me to be very little difference between subsection (c) in the pending bill as it is proposed to be amended and the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], with the exception of the words "not abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." The question seems to have been very fully discussed during this debate as to whether or not subsection (c) should be adopted. It seems to me as a layman, and not as a lawyer, that we are standing on technicalities and that we should not at this time give so much attention to a merely technical question as to the constitutionality of a bill or an amendment as we should to the real need of such legislation for the benefit of the country.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], for whom I have the greatest respect, had read into the RECORD during his remarks an editorial from one of the Iowa newspapers, expressing what he said was his view very completely or in a concrete manner on this subject. I read in the Washington Post this morning an editorial entitled "The Government's war power." That editorial expresses my views on this question so thoroughly and completely that I will ask that the Secretary read it into the RECORD at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE GOVERNMENT'S WAR POWER.

Much valuable time is wasted in discussing the question whether Congress has the constitutional power to regulate the press for the purpose of preventing publication of information which might be of value to the enemy.

If legislators and others considering the subject would merely bear in mind that a state of war exists, their doubts would be cleared.

The people in forming this Government intended it to endure forever, and therefore they gave it the power to defend itself. The Government may do anything necessary to prevent its own destruction. It may regulate or hold in abeyance many rights which can not constitutionally be violated by Congress in time of peace.

The laws of war are not made by Congress. Yet the United States can enforce those laws. When a state of war is declared the President and Congress are endowed with extraordinary powers, superseding in many points the powers they possess in a state of peace. Their war powers are just as constitutional as their peace powers; otherwise the Constitution would contain within itself incompatible provisions.

The framers of the Constitution discussed the question of war powers, and wisely decided to leave the Constitution silent as to details. They did not wish to tie the hands of the Government in any struggle it might have to maintain its own existence. If necessary, Congress and the President can suppress free speech, regulate the press, deprive men of life without trial by jury, take property without due process of law, and do many other acts which are prohibited by the Constitution. Abraham Lincoln clapped men in jail, suppressed newspapers, suspended the writ of habeas corpus, and finally swept away $400,000,000 worth of property without due process of law, all in strict obedience to his constitutional power and duty. He could not have done this in time of peace.

John Quincy Adams, discussing the war power, said in Congress:

"Sir, in the authority given to Congress by the Constitution to declare war, all the powers incidental to war are, by necessary implication, conferred upon the Government of the United States. Now, the powers incidental to war are derived not from their internal municipal source but from the laws and usages of nations. There are in the authority of Congress and of the Executive two classes of powers, altogether different in their nature, and often incompatible with each other—the war power and the peace power. The peace power is limited by regulations and restricted by provisions prescribed within the Constitution itself. The war power is limited only by the laws and usages of nations. This power is tremendous; it is strictly constitutional, but it breaks down every barrier so anxiously erected for the protection of liberty, of property, and of life."

Another great authority said:

"The sovereign and almost dictatorial powers—existing only in actual war; ending when war ends—to be used in self-defense, are, while they last, as lawful, as constitutional, as sacred, as the administration of justice by judicial courts in times of peace. They may be dangerous; war itself is dangerous; but danger does not make them unconstitutional. If the Commander in Chief orders the Army to seize the arms and ammunition of the enemy; * * * to stop the press from aiding and comforting the enemy by betraying our military plans; * * * the pretension that in so doing he is violating the Constitution is not only erroneous, but it is a plea in behalf of treason. To set up the rules of civil administration as overriding and controlling the laws of war, is to aid and abet the enemy."

Another statement of the matter is as follows:

"It has been said that 'amidst arms the laws are silent.' It would be more just to say, that while war rages, the rights which in peace are sacred, must and do give way to the higher right—the right of public safety—the right which the country, the whole country, claims to be protected from its enemies, domestic and foreign."

Thus it can not be doubted that the power to regulate the press is a constitutional war power of Congress. The extent of regulation necessary and the method of enforcing it are the questions that should engage the attention of Congress.

Mr. REED. I desire to ask from what the article just read is taken?

Mr. BRADY. I stated it was published in this morning's Washington Post.

Mr. President, this discussion has necessarily been carried on largely by the lawyers in the Chamber. For that reason I have requested to have this editorial read as expressing my views. The conclusion of the editorial is:

Thus it can not be doubted that the power to regulate the press is a constitutional war power of Congress. The extent of regulation necessary and the method of enforcing it are the questions that should engage the attention of Congress.

Mr. President, after listening to this discussion, it seems to me that it has been conceded that under the Constitution Congress has the right, as a war power, to regulate the press. That being the case, all that we can do at this time is to decide for ourselves, so far as we can, how far we can go along the lines of regulating the press. It seems to me that the question to be decided is whether or not there is a necessity for this legislation at this time, and, if it is necessary, we should speedily enact it into law, so that we may go on with other necessary and useful legislation.

I believe that we should give the press the largest possible scope in the way of publicity. I believe that the editors of this country are just as loyal a class of men as can be found within the confines of our Nation. While we are regulating every other class, even under the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa, I see no reason why we should not put a reasonable regulation upon the press, which they are ready and willing to have placed upon them. The only time when these prohibited acts will be punished will be when they are committed in a manner which is in violation of the rules and regulations laid down by the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy. I believe that we have a right to confer upon the President the power to make these regulations. That right is conceded in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, for his amendment, in line 1, reads:

In time of war the President is hereby authorized to prescribe and promulgate reasonable rules and regulations.

If the President has that right—and every amendment which has been offered proposes to confer that right upon him—let us not handicap him by placing in this proposed law anything that will be injurious in any way to the plans that we must necessarily carry out if we are going to win this war.

We are to-day facing the greatest crisis that this Nation has ever faced, and the emergency demands that each and every citizen do his utmost for his country and for his country's cause. For that reason I am willing to give and take. In our committee work, on which we have been very busy for the last three or four weeks, I have said time and time again, and I repeat it, what I want to do is to forget partisanship and to work hand in hand with every man who is willing to do anything which is necessary to be done to strengthen our country in this war.

It seems to me that we can do nothing better than to enact subsection (c) as modified by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. Then we shall be in a shape to go on and pass the bill and take up another measure, which I believe is of even greater importance. When that measure shall have been passed, we can then commence the preparation which we must commence for a long and hard struggle and contest.

Let us not presume for one single minute that this war is going to be won easily; let us not presume for a moment that any preparations that we may make are going to stop the advance of the German Army whenever it can make an advance. They do not understand or appreciate the strength of this country. Their people are not allowed to understand or to know the conditions in this country nor what the entrance of this country into the war at this time means; nor do I believe that all of our citizens have awakened to a realization of the fact that we are actually at war with the most powerful military nation on earth; nor do I believe that all of our American citizens realize what this war means. In my opinion it means either the triumph or downfall of democracy; it means that our people must make great sacrifices and endure great hardships; must raise large sums of money; must fight real battles; it means that every man will be called upon to do his full part.

The young men whom we are going to call to arms, the boys from 19 to 25, who will fight the battles of the country, as the boys of past generations have fought the battles of the Republic, are not going to stop and ask whether any particular act is constitutional; they are not going to lie down and rest while somebody decides or asks the Supreme Court to decide whether it is right for them to go ahead or stay where they are; they are going to shoulder their guns and do their duty as they see it.

What we need in this country to-day is fighting men. We have voted $7,000,000,000 for war purposes; we are going to lend the allies $3,000,000,000 of this money, which is right and proper, and which I strongly favor; but, at the same time, let us not make a display of vulgar wealth and stand back and ask others to go to the trenches. Mr. President, it seems to me that to-day, in this hour of trial in our country, what we need is fewer constitutional lawyers and more fighting men; and I do hope that we may agree on and enact into law a measure that will enable us to go on and make the preparations that we must necessarily make for the great struggle with which the Nation is face to face to-day. Let us stop quibbling over technicalities. Let us speed up the legislation necessary to meet this emergency, and place power and authority where it can be used effectively for protection, efficiency, and beneficial results—more power and authority than we would give in times of peace, but these are not times of peace. Therefore we should place our country on a war footing and do it at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I merely want to occupy the time of the Senate for a few moments; I am going to discuss a constitutional question notwithstanding what my good friend, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], has said.

The very distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has challenged the constitutionality of paragraph (c). I can not agree with him, and briefly I want to state my reasons why. I think everyone who has read what has been contained in the press of the United States for the last year or two will agree that many things have been printed in some few papers which, if they were not treasonable in character, were very near the border line, and if some of the articles had been printed in some of the countries of the Old World the publications in which they appeared would have been suppressed and the editors would have been lined up against a stone wall and shot. The papers of that character are very few in number, but they have spread poison in many localities.

I am not unmindful of the great blessings that freedom of speech and of press afford to this country, and as between a restricted press and an unbridled press, I prefer the unbridled press; but this provision in the bill has been discussed largely with reference to its effect as an abridgment of free speech and of a free press. It applies no more to one than it does to the other, and I want to call attention to one or two sections of the Constitution which I think justify the passing of this bill.

Before I do that, however, I think we can all agree upon one or two principles of construction: First, that in order to pass a law we must either find the power in the express language of the Constitution or it must be incidental to the exercise of the expressed power; second, I think we will all agree upon the principle of construction that where two subjects matter are treated of in the Constitution the provision in respect to them must be so construed as to give full force and effect to both. The one must not be so construed as to destroy or paralyze the other.

Now, our friends who have taken the position that paragraph (c) is a violation of the first amendment of the Constitution because it is an abridgment of the freedom of the press and of free speech have overlooked, it seems to me, the third section of Article III of the Constitution on the subject of treason; and I desire to call attention expressly to its language. It defines treason as follows:

Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

That is very comprehensive language. That is the one crime which is defined by the Constitution itself, but Congress has not been left without some power with respect to treason. I do not think that Congress can either add to or subtract from the constitutional definition; but we have power with respect to treason, because in the next paragraph Congress is expressly given power to declare the punishment of treason. Under that provision we can make that punishment death or imprisonment or fine.

During the Civil War the Congress enacted section 5332 of the Revised Statutes, defining treason and providing that one who was found guilty of this crime could be punished by death or could be fined and imprisoned. Clearly they had in mind then, as the constitutional fathers had, that there were different varieties of treason to be dealt with in different ways, according to the enormity of the offense. So the committee in charge of this bill has provided different penalties for different classes of acts; and in this particular section they say that the President shall have the power to adopt certain regulations, and that a violation of those regulations shall be punishable by fine or imprisonment. In other words, we have the right to say that certain treasonable acts shall be punishable by death, certain others by imprisonment, certain others by fine; and this provision of this bill, in my judgment, is nothing more than a determination of the classes of treason that shall be punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both. I do not think that when we pass this bill we are going beyond the power that is conferred upon the Congress by this section of the Constitution I have referred to.

A good many Senators who have been discussing this bill have debated it as if it applied only to the privileges of the press. They have forgotten that some of the printed matter or other information which might be circulated would of itself constitute a treasonable act. I do not think that anyone would claim that freedom of the press or free speech should be regarded as a shield behind which acts of treason could be committed against the Government of the United States.

Information at one time may be perfectly innocent; at another time it might be fraught with the gravest consequences if put in circulation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, assuming that the Senator's position is the correct one, does he think that we have the power by an express statute or by providing for Executive regulation to create a system of offenses out of acts therein designated without regard to the intent with which those acts were committed?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator has asked a very comprehensive question. I do not know that I can have in mind all of the acts which he may have, but——

Mr. THOMAS. Well, I have——

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will allow me just a moment, I was going to discuss the limits which might hedge this legislation.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, what I had in mind was paragraph (c). The very acts against which the penalties are provided bring them into activity and make them effective, no matter how innocent or ignorant the perpetrator of the offense may have been.

Mr. POMERENE. I can not accept the construction which the Senator makes.

Mr. THOMAS. I think, if the Senator will read it, he will find that, regardless of intent, regardless of knowledge, regardless of everything, the commission of the offense at once invokes the statute and makes the person committing it subject to its penalties.

Mr. POMERENE. With all due respect to the Senator, when he makes that statement he forgets the further provision, first, that this must be information which might be of use to the enemy; secondly, that the power here conferred upon the Presi- of free speech have overlooked, it seems to me, th third sction

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to say that I do not forget any of those things. On the contrary, I have them in mind.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not think the Senator has given to them the force and effect to which they are entitled when we are considering the pending bill.

Now, allow me to say I concede—as every Senator must concede—that regulations might be prescribed which would be unconstitutional; but it is not to be presumed that any such regulations will be made. I am not claiming that the President has, or that he ought to have, arbitrary power, or that he could arbitrarily exercise this power here. Whatever he does by virtue of this provision of the bill, if it becomes a law, must be within the scope of the Constitution itself. And now, as I have taken the position that the constitutionality of this bill could be defended under the treason section, I want to suggest further that we have a broad and comprehensive definition of treason. It may consist in levying war, or it may consist in adhering to our enemies, giving them aid or comfort.

What would aid and comfort be? The constitutional fathers did not attempt to define those words; Congress has not attempted to define them, except perhaps as it is contained in this bill; and we are here seeking only to give a congressional construction to the definition of treason as contained in the Constitution itself.

If I am right in my position that the authority for this bill is contained in Article III, section 3, of the Constitution, no regulation could be adopted by the President or by the Congress which would not be embraced within the definition of treason. There is no power under the Constitution here which would give us the right to declare a thing treasonable which is not within this definition.

So it seems to me that while we all want to be very careful about trespassing upon the rights of a free press, or upon our people in the exercise of the freedom of speech, we must at the same time be careful lest men, while pretending to exercise the freedom of the press or the freedom of speech, may, in fact, be committing acts which are treasonable in character.

I believe, also, but I will not take the time to discuss it, that we have the power to confer upon the President this authority under the war power. As I say, however, I do not care to discuss that now.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, twice I have taken the floor to protest against the doctrine which has been announced directly or indirectly by several Senators, that because we are at war the Constitution of the United States is suspended. In connection with those statements, we have had read by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] a letter from Mr. Lincoln to the effect that he had felt justified, on one occasion, in disregarding the Constitution.

Some Members of the Senate apparently believe that the Constitution ceases to be of any force when we engage in a war, or at least that the war power of the Government immediately supersedes or dominates the Constitution.

Mr. President, if that doctrine had not been announced here so often, I would not take the time of the Senate to discuss it. I do not intend now really to discuss it. I do, however, intend to put once more in the RECORD a decision of the Supreme Court that never ought to be forgotten. I refer to Ex Parte Milligan, reported in Fourth Wallace. After I have called attention to certain parts of the opinion I hope we will not hear any further talk in this Chamber about disregarding the Constitution.

Milligan, a citizen of Indiana, was on the 21st day of October, 1864, arrested and brought before a military commission convened at Indianapolis by order of Gen. Hovey, commanding the military district of Indiana. He was afterwards tried before a court-martial, summoned by Gen. Hovey, and found guilty of conspiracy against the Government of the United States—affording aid and comfort to the rebels against the authority of the United States, and so forth. Milligan was sentenced to death, and the sentence approved by the President. He thereupon sued out a writ of habeas corpus before the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana. That court dividing in its opinion, the cause was brought direct in the Supreme Court of the United States. The opinion is by Mr. Justice Davis.

It is interesting to know that at this time a writ of habeas corpus had been suspended by the act of March 3, 1863, but that act also made provision for the trial of persons charged with crime against the United States. Milligan claimed the right to a trial before the civil tribunals, seeking shelter under the provision that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on presentment by a grand jury except in cases arising in the land or naval forces or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger, and so forth. The court declared:

No graver question was ever considered by this court, nor one which more nearly concerns the rights of the whole people, for it is the birthright of every American citizen when charged with crime to be tried and punished according to law.

Referring to the clause just quoted, and to the clauses providing for trial by jury and to be informed of the nature of the charge, and so forth, the court declared:

Time has proven the discernment of our ancestors; for even these provisions, expressed in such plain words that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, are now after the lapse of more than 70 years sought to be avoided.

Continuing, Mr. Justice Davis said:

Those great and good men foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint, and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper; and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril, unless established by irrepealable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances. No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it, which are necessary to preserve its existence; as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority.

Then, discussing the question of what constitutes a trial within the meaning of the Constitution, and declaring that a military tribunal is not a judicial tribunal within the meaning of the Constitution, the court proceeded to say——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator kindly tell the Senate who wrote that decision?

Mr. REED. Mr. Justice Davis.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator, I will ask if he will not put the entire syllabus in the case in the RECORD as a part of his remarks?

Mr. REED. I shall be very glad to do so.

The syllabus is as follows:

EX PARTE MILLIGAN.

1. Circuit courts, as well as the judges thereof, are authorized, by the fourteenth section of the judiciary act, to issue the writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of commitment, and they have jurisdiction, except in cases where the privilege of the writ is suspended, to hear and determine the question whether the party is entitled to be discharged.

2. The usual course of proceeding is for the court, on the application of the prisoner for a writ of habeas corpus, to issue the writ, and on its return to hear and dispose of the case; but where the cause of imprisonment is fully shown by the petition the court may, without issuing the writ, consider and determine whether, upon the facts presented in the petition, the prisoner, if brought before the court, would be discharged.

3. When the circuit court renders a final judgment refusing to discharge the prisoner, he may bring the case here by writ of error; and if the judges of the circuit court, being opposed in opinion, can render no judgment, he may have the point upon which the disagreement happens certified to this tribunal.

4. A petition for a writ of habeas corpus, duly presented, is the institution of a cause on behalf of the petitioner; and the allowance or refusal of the process, as well as the subsequent disposition of the prisoner, is matter of law and not of discretion.

5. A person arrested after the passage of the act of March 3, 1863, "relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," and under the authority of said act, was entitled to his discharge if not indicted or presented by the grand jury convened at the first subsequent term of the circuit or district court of the United States for the district.

6. The omission to furnish a list of the persons arrested to the judges of the circuit or district court as provided in the said act did not impair the right of such person, if not indicted or presented, to his discharge.

7. Military commissions organized during the late Civil War, in a State not invaded and not engaged in rebellion, in which the Federal courts were open, and in the proper and unobstructed exercise of their judicial functions, had no jurisdiction to try, convict, or sentence for any criminal offense a citizen who was neither a resident of a rebellious State nor a prisoner of war, nor a person in the military or naval service. And Congress could not invest them with any such power.

8. The guaranty of trial by jury contained in the Constitution was intended for a state of war as well as a state of peace, and is equally binding upon rulers and people at all times and under all circumstances.

9. The Federal authority having been unopposed in the State of Indiana, and the Federal courts open for the trial of offenses and the redress of grievances, the usages of war could not, under the Constitution, afford any sanction for the trial there of a citizen in civil life, not connected with the military or naval service, by a military tribunal, for any offense whatever.

10. Cases arising in the land or naval forces or in the militia in time of war or public danger are excepted from the necessity of presentment or indictment by a grand jury, and the right of trial by jury in such cases is subject to the same exceptions.

11. Neither the President nor Congress nor the judiciary can disturb any one of the safeguards of civil liberty incorporated into the Constitution, except so far as the right is given to suspend in certain cases the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus.

12. A citizen not connected with the military service and resident in a State where the courts are open and in the proper exercise of their jurisdiction can not, even when the privilege of writ of habeas corpus is suspended, be tried, convicted, or sentenced otherwise than by the ordinary courts of law.

13. Suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus does not suspend the writ itself. The writ issues as a matter of course, and on its return the court decides whether the applicant is denied the right of proceeding any further.

14. A person who is a resident of a loyal State, where he was arrested, who was never resident in any State engaged in rebellion, nor connected with the military or naval service, can not be regarded as a prisoner of war.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I will state that the petitioner in that case was represented in the Supreme Court by two of the greatest lawyers of their generation—Jeremiah S. Black, of Pennsylvania, and James A. Garfield, of Ohio, subsequently President of the United States.

Mr. REED. Since the question was asked about who wrote the decision, I will state that the result was concurred in by Mr. Justice Wayne, Mr. Justice Swayne, and Mr. Justice Miller, although they did not agree to all of the language of Mr. Justice Davis. The case has never been challenged as law. It will not be challenged now by any man who has any reverence for the Constitution.

The court continues discussing this military tribunal, and states:

They can not justify on the mandate of the President, because he is controlled by law and has his appropriate sphere of duty, which is to execute, not to make the laws; and there is "no unwritten criminal code to which resort can be had as a source of jurisdiction."

Now I come to a point which I think will interest the Senate, because it is very pertinent just now:

But it is said that the jurisdiction is complete under the "laws and usages of war."

It can serve no useful purpose to inquire what those laws and usages are, whence they originated, where found, and on whom they operate; they can never be applied to citizens in States which have upheld the authority of the Government, and where the courts are open and their process unobstructed. This court has judicial knowledge that in Indiana the Federal authority was always unopposed, and its courts always open to hear criminal accusations and redress grievances; and no usage of war could sanction a military trial there for any offense whatever of a citizen in civil life in no wise connected with the military service. Congress could grant no such power; and to the honor of our national legislature be it said it has never been provoked by the state of the country even to attempt its exercise. One of the plainest constitutional provisions was therefore infringed when Milligan was tried by a court not ordained and established by Congress—

And so forth.

Milligan was charged with conspiring against the Government in time of war. The court had this to say as to the doctrine of necessity:

If it was dangerous, in the distracted condition of affairs, to leave Milligan unrestrained of his liberty, because he "conspired against the Government, afforded aid and comfort to rebels, and incited the people to insurrection," the law said arrest him, confine him closely, render him powerless to do further mischief; and then present his case to the grand jury of the district, with proofs of his guilt.

The court further proceeds:

Another guaranty of freedom was broken when Milligan was denied a trial by jury. The great minds of the country have differed on the correct interpretation to be given to various provisions of the Federal Constitution; and judicial decision has been often invoked to settle their true meaning; but until recently no one ever doubted that the right of trial by jury was fortified in the organic law against the power of attack. It is now assailed; but if ideas can be expressed in words, and language has any meaning, this right—one of the most valuable in a free country—is preserved to everyone accused of crime who is not attached to the Army, or Navy, or militia in actual service.

Later the court used this language, which I commend to the attention of those who treat the Constitution lightly, particularly the Senator from Idaho, who thinks that "what we need now is fighters and not constitutional lawyers":

This privilege is a vital principle, underlying the whole administration of criminal justice; it is not held by sufferance and can not be frittered away on any plea of State or political necessity. When peace prevails and the authority of the Government is undisputed there is no difficulty of preserving the safeguards of liberty, for the ordinary modes of trial are never neglected and no one wishes it otherwise; but if society is disturbed by civil commotion—if the passions of men are aroused and the restraints of law weakened, if not disregarded—these safeguards need, and should receive, the watchful care of those entrusted with the guardianship of the Constitution and laws.

I commend that to every Senator who advanced to yonder desk and took the oath to sustain and defend and protect the Constitution of the United States. I look with astonishment—I am using the mildest word possible to employ—upon any Senator who thinks there is not sufficient time to pause in this Chamber and discuss the constitutionality of any act.

I continue reading:

In no other way can we transmit to posterity unimpaired the blessings of liberty consecrated by the sacrifices of the Revolution.

I commend the advocates and believers in martial law to this statement of the court:

It is claimed that martial law covers with its broad mantle the proceedings of this military commission. The proposition is this: That in a time of war the commander of an armed force (if in his opinion the exigencies of the country demand it, and of which he is to judge), has the power, within the lines of his military district, to suspend all civil rights and their remedies, and subject citizens, as well as soldiers, to the rule of his will.

Some people to-day believe that power is vested in Congress. Some people in 1864 believed it was vested in the military governor of a military district in the State of Indiana. I do not so believe. I believe that all power is primarily vested in the people and that the power which Congress possesses is only such power as the people by the Constitution have conferred upon Congress. Congress being compelled to look to the Constitution for every vestige of its authority, can not possess the power to nullify, suspend, or abrogate any part of the instrument from which its existence is derived. Congress can no more suspend the Constitution than could the military governor of a military district in Indiana.

I continue reading:

And in the exercise of his lawful authority can not be restrained, except by his superior officer or the President of the United States.

If this position is sound to the extent claimed, then when war exists, foreign or domestic—

We have a foreign war now—and the country is subdivided into military departments—

That has not taken place yet—for mere convenience, the commander of one of them can, if he chooses, within his limits, on the plea of necessity, with the approval of the Executive, substitute military force for and to the exclusion of the laws, and punish all persons, as he thinks right and proper, without fixed or certain rules.

The statement of this proposition shows its importance; for, if true, republican government is a failure and there is an end of liberty regulated by law. Martial law—

We ought to have this read every morning—

Martial law established on such a basis destroys every guaranty of the Constitution and effectually renders the "military independent of and superior to the civil power"—the attempt to do which by the King of Great Britain was deemed by our fathers such an offense that they assigned it to the world as one of the causes which impelled them to declare their independence. Civil liberty and this kind of martial law can not endure together; the antagonism is irreconcilable; and in the conflict one or the other must perish.

This Nation, as experience has proved, can not always remain at peace, and has no right to expect that it will always have wise and humane rulers sincerely attached to the principles of the Constitution. Wicked men, ambitious of power, with hatred of liberty and contempt of law, may fill the place once occupied by Washington and Lincoln; and if this right is conceded and the calamities of war again befall us, the dangers to human liberty are frightful to contemplate.

A paper war up to date, and already men are found in the Senate Chamber talking about disregarding the Constitution!

Not one of these safeguards can the President or Congress or the judiciary disturb except the one concerning the writ of habeas corpus—

Which, under certain circumstances, of course, can be suspended.

Now, Mr. President, I call attention to just one further sentence:

So sensitive were our Revolutionary fathers on this subject, although Boston was almost in a state of siege, when Gen. Gage issued his proclamation of martial law they spoke of it as "an attempt to supersede the course of the common law, and instead thereof to publish and order the use of martial law." The Virginia Assembly also denounced a similar measure on the part of Gov. Dunmore "as an assumed power which the King himself can not exercise, because it annuls the law of the land and introduces the most execrable of all systems—martial law."

Now, Mr. President, I commend this doctrine to my associates here.

I want in a word to state my own position.

We are engaging in a conflict the end of which we can not see; a conflict which may happily be soon over, but which may unhappily last for many years. It may pass us by without material injury. It may, before it is concluded, drain the veins of our manhood of their red tides. I want to do everything within my power to strengthen the Nation, to render it safe, invincible against attack, and resistless in attack.

But to my mind the best way those things can be accomplished is for every man to keep his judgment cool, to act with deliberation, to proceed within the four corners of the Constitution, remembering constantly that the thing for which we contend is after all the liberty of our own people. For those who see danger in this legislation I have the utmost sympathy, and yet I do not agree with them in all respects. But in whatever we do let us not lose our heads. Let us not resort to extreme measures when extreme measures are unnecessary. This will not be the last day of Congress. Emergencies can be met as they arise; that is, certain emergencies. There are certain others that must be met immediately. There is no great occasion for division of opinion. There is no cause for Members of Congress to undertake to force upon their associates matter that is unsound or that is unnecessary at the present time. We had better try and arrive at harmonious agreements. We should attempt nothing which intelligent men may regard as an invasion of the Constitution. Let us understand in all we do that we are proceeding under the Constitution; that the declaration of war against Germany did not operate to annul the American Constitution; that it is a living thing; that it is the pillar of fire which still blazes and will continue, I trust, to give forth its light through the darkest hours of the struggle which lies ahead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to inquire for a moment whether the amendment of the Senator from Iowa or the amendment which I previously offered is in order. There are three pending amendments to the section, as I understand the situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There can be only one pending amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. I have reference to my own amendment, the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], and the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought as the amendment of the Senator from Colorado was in part covered by the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, when that was adopted he had withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from South Dakota withdrew his amendment, and I understood that the Senator from Colorado asked to have his amendment lie over until the other amendment was acted upon.

Mr. THOMAS. I agreed to the suggestion of the Senator having the bill in charge that it might be laid over, but it is now in order and it is before the Senate, as I understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. I ask that the amendment be read.

Mr. GALLINGER. Pending that I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Myers	Shields
Borah	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Brady	Hitchcock	New	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Hughes	Norris	Smoot
Broussard	James	Overman	Sterling
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	Owen	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Swanson
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Thomas
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Thompson
Fall	Kendrick	Pittman	Townsend
Fernald	Kenyon	Poindexter	Vardaman
Fletcher	King	Pomerene	Wadsworth
France	Kirby	Ransdell	Walsh
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Reed	Warren
Gallinger	La Follette	Robinson	Watson
Gerry	Lodge	Saulsbury	Weeks
Gore	McCumber	Shafroth	Williams
Gronna	McKellar	Sheppard	Wolcott

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] on official business, and also to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] on account of sickness.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN] is detained from the Senate on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have been requested to announce that the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. OVERMAN. Through a misunderstanding I called for the yeas and nays. I understood the Chair to announce "The 'ayes' appear to have it" on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, when he stated "The 'noes' appear to have it." I therefore withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it. The Chair again makes the announcement that the noes seem to have it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. The motion which I made yesterday to strike out paragraph (c) and certain words in paragraph (b), if I understand the parliamentary situation, is the first thing to be considered, and if so, then I want to demand the yeas and nays on that amendment. I have modified the amendment by confining it entirely to paragraph (c), and I think we should take the vote upon that amendment before voting upon the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair was not at the time the Senator from Colorado offered his amendment in the chair. The Senate has proceeded to vote upon the amendment of the Senator from Iowa and is now taking the vote upon that amendment. The yeas and nays have been called for and the call sustained. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that it be read once more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Strike out, beginning with the word "and," in line 20, page 8, down to and including the word "imprisonment," in line 9, page 9, and in lieu of the words to be stricken out insert:

In time of war the President is hereby authorized to prescribe and promulgate reasonable rules and regulations, not abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, for the purpose of preventing the disclosure to the public, and thereby to the enemy, of information with respect to the movement and disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States or the plans of naval or military operations; and whoever in time of war shall willfully violate any such rule or regulation shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, however, That no such rule or regulation shall apply to the proceedings of the Congress of the United States nor to the debates therein.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope it will be voted up.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. HALE's name was called). I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. He is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when Mr. LANE's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LANE] is detained from the Chamber by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. THOMPSON (when Mr. LEWIS's name was called). I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and to state that if he were present he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], I vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). Although I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] on almost all questions, we have agreed that it shall not apply to any war measure and each of us is at liberty to vote in the absence of the other. I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I announce for the day that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] is absent and is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. That Senator is absent. I transfer my pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness and that he is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and to state that if present he would vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I inquire whether the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I withhold my vote, being paired with that Senator, and he is absent from the Chamber.

Mr. HARDING. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—34.

Borah	Gore	La Follette	Sutherland
Brandegee	Gronna	Lodge	Thomas
Calder	Harding	New	Townsend
Cummins	Hardwick	Norris	Vardaman
Curtis	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Warren
Fernald	Jones, Wash.	Reed	Watson
France	Kenyon	Sherman	Weeks
Frelinghuysen	King	Shields
Gallinger	Knox	Smoot

NAYS—40.

Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Simmons
Brady	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Smith, Ga.
Broussard	Kellogg	Pittman	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Poindexter	Sterling
Fall	Kirby	Pomerene	Swanson
Fletcher	McCumber	Ransdell	Thompson
Gerry	McKellar	Robinson	Wadsworth
Hitchcock	Myers	Saulsbury	Walsh
Hughes	Nelson	Shafroth	Williams
James	Overman	Sheppard	Wolcott

NOT VOTING—22.

Ashurst	Hale	Martin	Stone
Bankhead	Hollis	Newlands	Tillman
Colt	Husting	Penrose	Trammell
Culberson	Lane	Smith, Ariz.	Underwood
Dillingham	Lewis	Smith, Md.
Goff	McLean	Smith, Mich.

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Senator yield to me to make an announcement?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I announced a while ago that I would call up the Army bill as soon as the pending chapter was disposed of. The Senator from North Carolina consented to lay the bill temporarily aside after the conclusion of the chapter, but I understand that that will probably take all the afternoon. I will therefore state that to-morrow after the morning hour I will move to take up the bill for the increase of the Army, instead of making the motion this afternoon.

Mr. THOMAS. I now renew my motion by confining it to paragraph (c). It is to strike out all of paragraph (c) beginning with the word "whoever," on page 8, line 20, and ending with the word "imprisonment," on page 9, line 9. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the paragraph as it has been amended be read before the vote is taken.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator from Colorado insists upon a vote on his amendment, will he permit me to perfect the paragraph as it stands by a slight amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move to insert on page 8, line 21, before the word "regulations," the word "reasonable."

Mr. OVERMAN. I will accept that. That is what it really means.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that would be a mistake. The question would be whether a regulation has been violated. If it is a plain violation of the regulations the question could be raised whether the regulation was reasonable or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the paragraph be read as it is now amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Subsection (c) with the connecting words, which it is now proposed to strike from the bill, as amended reads:

And (c) whoever, in time of war, in violation of reasonable regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall publish any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be useful to the enemy, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado demands the yeas and nays on agreeing to his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, the Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ASHURST answered in the affirmative.

Mr. WALSH. We have not the information at all as to the question. The request was that the entire subsection be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Montana that the request was——

Mr. GALLINGER. There has been an answer to the roll call.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Secretary did not read the entire subsection.

Mr. WALSH. I want to know what I am going to vote on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the pending question is to strike out subsection (c); and the Secretary has just read subsection (c).

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WALSH. I want the information before I can vote.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Regular order!

Mr. WALSH. I rise to a question of information. The Secretary was requested to read the subsection, and he has not read the proviso, which constitutes a part of the subsection.

Mr. THOMAS. It does not cover that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair informs the Senator from Montana that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado does not propose to strike out the proviso, and the Secretary has read the portion proposed to be stricken out, which the Chair understood to be the request. The roll call having been begun, the Secretary will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is absent. Because of that I will withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. THOMPSON (when Mr. HUSTING's name was called). I again announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and state that, if present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I desire to make the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as on the last vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement concerning my pair and its transfer which I made upon the last call of the roll, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and to state that if he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING. Repeating the same announcement of the transfer of my pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—33.

Ashurst	Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Thomas
Borah	Gallinger	Norris	Townsend
Brandegee	Gore	Page	Vardaman
Calder	Gronna	Reed	Warren
Cummins	Johnson, Cal.	Shafroth	Watson
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Sherman	Weeks
Fall	Kenyon	Shields
Fernald	King	Smoot
France	La Follette	Sutherland

NAYS—43.

Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Brady	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Smith, S. C.
Broussard	Kellogg	Phelan	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Pittman	Swanson
Fletcher	Kirby	Poindexter	Thompson
Gerry	Knox	Pomerene	Trammell
Harding	McCumber	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Hardwick	McKellar	Robinson	Walsh
Hitchcock	Myers	Saulsbury	Williams
Hughes	Nelson	Sheppard	Wolcott
James	New	Simmons

NOT VOTING—20.

Bankhead	Hale	McLean	Smith, Md.
Colt	Hollis	Martin	Smith, Mich.
Culberson	Husting	Newlands	Stone
Dillingham	Lane	Penrose	Tillman
Goff	Lewis	Smith, Ariz.	Underwood

So the amendment of Mr. THOMAS was rejected.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, lawyers differ; some of us have our own ideas about legal phraseology, and particularly with reference to legislation. I had no opportunity of explaining why I cast my vote as I did upon the amendment which has just been rejected. I have that opportunity now.

I desire to say that I should have voted for the amendment had it not been amended on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska, which, in my judgment, with due deference to the great legal knowledge of the other Senators, stultifies it and makes it ridiculous. I therefore could not by my vote assist in placing it upon the statute books.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments to this chapter? If there be no further amendments——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, has the committee amendment, on page 9, line 16, been adopted?

Mr. FLETCHER. That question has been answered several times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the Secretary that the first proviso on that page has been adopted, but not the second proviso; that the second proviso was withdrawn by the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment at the end of the subsection, and I desire simply to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the fact that, as it now reads, even though the President himself might give out any information with reference to the number of soldiers sent to any portion of the country or as to where they were destined, still it would be a criminal offense to publish such information. Inasmuch as we have placed in the hands of the President the authority to promulgate rules, which rules shall become law, the violation of which will subject the violator to imprisonment or death, it seems to me that we ought to give to the same head of the Army the authority to give out information that will not be injurious. Therefore I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the subsection:

Provided further, That the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, may, from time to time, give out for publication such information concerning such operations, measures, and movements of the Army and Navy as may not, in his opinion, be incompatible with the interests of the country, and the publication of such information shall not be a violation of this section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, let the amendment be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 14, after the word "same," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided further, That the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, may, from time to time, give out for publication such information concerning such operations, measures, and movements of the Army and Navy as may not, in his opinion, be incompatible with the interests of the country, and the publication of such information shall not be a violation of this section.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not understand precisely the meaning of this amendment; but, as I gathered it, it is permission upon the part of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States to give out, in his judgment, any information with reference to the movement of forces. I think that is very vital, indeed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator who is the author of this amendment if this is an attempt to provide for a legal censorship—if that is the real object—to provide a censorship that will give permission to newspapers to publish certain things?

Mr. BORAH. The beauty of this amendment, to my mind, is that the censorship at this time is in Congress; that Congress is granting the permission to the President to give out information with reference to the forces of the United States, of which he is Commander in Chief.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator regard that as necessary?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, allow me to state just what the amendment means.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. I asked the Senator from North Dakota a question. Certainly I yield to him.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator repeat his question?

Mr. REED. It is so long I dislike to do it; but I simply wanted to know whether or not it was the purpose of the Senator from North Dakota by this amendment to confer upon the President authority to establish a censorship which would tell the press of the country what they might publish?

Mr. McCUMBER. The bill as now drawn prohibits the publishing of any information, whether permissible or otherwise, and fixes a very severe penalty for publishing any of these facts or anything that is covered by the regulations of the President. It does seem to me that, having conferred that enormous power upon the President of the United States, we ought to find some relief for those who might publish facts which the President himself might see fit to give out.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. As the bill now reads there is no relief from the penalty that will be prescribed for a violation of any of the rules promulgated by the President.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator now yield to me for a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has the floor.

Mr. NELSON. Suppose the President, in the rules which he prescribes, should make an exception as to himself, what then?

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, suppose he does not; what then? One question answers the other. Suppose he says that it will be a crime punishable by death if a paper publishes the fact that 10,000 men have been sent from Minneapolis to the State of Washington; he publishes it himself; but if a paper publishes it, the penalty may be imprisonment. What then? Is there any relief? I have not myself favored the amendment that gives this enormous power to the President.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield in a moment, Mr. President. I should have been in favor, as I stated the other day, of so drawing the law as to declare what information the newspapers might publish and what they might not publish.

Mr. KNOX. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. And then providing conditions and limitations, but we have not seen fit to do that. We are now passing a bill carrying with it the authority on the part of the President to make a law from day to day in the form of regulations and promulgations and providing a punishment for the disobedience of those rules and regulations. We have made him an absolute dictator on that proposition. I do not want to take away all of his powers; but I am in favor, if we are going to give him this enormous power, that at least when the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy sees fit, as has been suggested, he might call in from day to day the representatives of the newspapers and state what information was proper to send out. If he did that, after making and promulgating a declaration that the newspapers could not publish such a thing, at least that would relieve them from the penalty. Now I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I only desire to answer the question that the Senator from North Dakota pressed upon the Senator from Minnesota in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota that the President might protect himself by excluding himself from the operation of these regulations. The Senator from North Dakota, as I understand, replied "but suppose he did not," having, I have no doubt, in mind the safety and protection of the President. I think if it had occurred to the Senator from Minnesota he would have replied that perhaps the President would have pardoned himself, as he has the pardoning power.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think there is an indication that an effort is being made to make fun of this matter; and I, therefore, move to lay the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the next chapter, if there be no further amendments to Chapter II.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, do I understand that we are going to proceed to the next chapter?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair informs the Senator from Ohio that all amendments which have been offered to Chapter II have been disposed of. The Chair asked some time ago whether there were further amendments.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I was engaged at the time. I have an amendment here which I desire to offer to that chapter. I offer it as a separate section to the chapter just under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. At the end of Chapter II it is proposed to add a new section, to be known as section 12, and to read as follows:

SEC. 12. When the United States is engaged in war or is threatened with war, insurrection, or invasion, upon an affidavit being made before any United States commissioner or United States district judge stating that affiant has probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed, or is about to be committed, against the laws, proclamations of the President, or Constitution of the United States, the said judge or commissioner shall issue subpœnas in the usual manner for such person or persons as the district attorney may approve for an inquiry as to the matter set out in the said affidavit. The right and authority is hereby given the several commissioners and judges to administer oaths to affiants and to witnesses under this section.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, just a word in explanation. This matter was called to my attention by the office of the United States district attorney for the southern district of Ohio. Their experience has indicated that there are many occurrences reported which ought to be investigated. I realize that the power proposed to be conferred might at times be invoked when it would cause hardship; but I think that the amendment is sufficiently guarded in that it requires an affidavit to be filed either before a district judge or a United States commissioner, and that it must have the approval of the United States district attorney. The purpose is only for investigation; and I think that it is very necessary that there be some provision of this kind embodied in the law during a time of war.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will ask that the amendment be again stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, it seems to me that the amendment is entirely unnecessary. If a crime has been committed, the machinery of the law to-day is sufficient for its investigation and prosecution, and it is not necessary to create a dragnet to enable any United States commissioner to issue subpœnas to inquire whether a crime has been committed. I should like to know what kind of an investigation could be made of a case where it was alleged somebody intended to commit a crime? That is going beyond any investigation that I ever heard of, and it seems to me that the amendment is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, of course if there is a grand jury in session witnesses can be called. I have in mind one instance now to which it might be well to refer. In a certain city in the United States arms were accumulated by persons whose loyalty, at least, was suspected. This information got to the authorities. Of course, they could apply for a search warrant if that were deemed advisable and their information was sufficient to justify it; but it seems to me that no harm could come by giving to the proper officer the right to make inquiry and to get information of this character during a period of war. I would not advise this for one moment in time of peace, but I do feel that at this time there ought to be some such authority as this granted to United States district judges or to United States commissioners. The facts may be such as not to warrant arrest but to require most searching investigation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator as to what his judgment would be about the operation of the proposed amendment? The amendment provides that—

When the United States is engaged in war—

That would be easy to determine, of course, but the next proposition is—or is threatened with war, insurrection, or invasion.

Who would determine that question, and how would it be decided?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think the question which the Senator asks is very pertinent, and I can realize that there might be some difficulty in determining when war may be threatened. I assume, of course, if the language were left as it is, that that would be determined by the judge or by the commissioner; but I mean simply to reach the present situation. I have, however, no objection to that language being stricken out of the amendment, so as to make it apply only in time of war. I ask that that be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator indicate the language he desires stricken out?

Mr. POMERENE. I ask to have stricken out the words "or is threatened with war, insurrection, or invasion."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator modifies his amendment as indicated by him.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. After the party who is suspected of being about to commit an offense "against the laws, proclamations of the President, or Constitution of the United States," has been haled before the judge and some witnesses have been examined, what then?

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator understands it is not proposed to hale the suspected party before a judge or commissioner. If one appears to make complaint he executes his affidavit, and, if it has the approval of the United States district attorney, then witnesses may be subpœnaed simply for the purpose of inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I see nothing in the amendment as printed about the United States district attorney.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What I read is this:

When the United States is engaged in war or is threatened with war, insurrection, or invasion, upon an affidavit being made before any United States commissioner or United States district judge stating that affiant has probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed, or is about to be committed, against the laws, proclamations of the President, or Constitution of the United States, the said judge or commissioner shall issue subpœnas in the usual manner for such person or persons as the district attorney may approve for an inquiry—

That is, the judge simply summons as witnesses such persons as the district attorney may indicate.

Mr. POMERENE. True.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But, after the judge has examined the witnesses, what happens then?

Mr. POMERENE. They have simply acquired certain information with which to guide their future action.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What future action could they take?

Mr. POMERENE. Why, possibly——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not finished the question. What future action could they take if the testimony were to disclose that somebody had in the past contemplated the commission of some crime, but had abandoned any such intention? What is to be the outcome of the inquiry?

Mr. POMERENE. If the evidence shows that a crime has been committed, then, of course, a further affidavit would be filed before the judge or commissioner charging the proper party with the offense, and the matter could be investigated.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is it a crime at some time in the past to have considered the commission of a crime?

Mr. POMERENE. Not at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not understand that this would be of much, if any, benefit, except as a piece of moral suasion or a contemplated star-chamber inquiry, if you please, hanging over everybody. Everyone would be liable, upon the affidavit of one person, to be haled before a United States commissioner or judge and have a lot of witnesses give testimony as to what he might have intended to do at some time in the past.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not think that the language of the amendment justifies that criticism. At the present time when a grand jury is in session an investigation of this character may be had. The situation is such that it may be a grand jury would not be in session, and it might be wise to have some investigation made for the purpose of securing the information when the grand jury is not in session.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is it not within the power of the judge always to summon a special session of the grand jury?

Mr. POMERENE. That is very true.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I only want to say, in regard to the amendment presented by the Senator from Ohio, that it is not an unusual thing, so far as the experiences in our State are concerned, to have this power. As I understand, the power intended to be conferred is to some extent an inquisitorial power in the prosecuting officer to determine whether or not sufficient cause exists to bring the matter before the grand jury when it meets. We have for a long time had such a statute as that in my State, and the power has been exercised by the attorney general when occasion has arisen.

I speak of this more particularly to call the attention of my colleague to the matter. My present colleague has been attorney general of the State, and has doubtless many times exercised the power given by that statute. I will ask him if it is true that such a statute exists in our State, authorizing the prosecuting officer to examine, prior to the meeting of the grand jury, into questions of alleged criminality which come to his knowledge, to determine whether or not they shall be presented to a grand jury?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, that is true. Such power has existed in the State of Delaware for a period, I should say, of 15 or 20 years, anyhow. There is a statute of that State which authorizes the attorney general or any deputy of his to issue his own subpœna, upon his own motion. It is not even required that an affidavit shall be filed before him charging any one with crime, or even suggesting the possibility that crime has been committed. If the attorney general hears or himself suspects that an offense has been committed the statute of the State authorizes him, as I say, upon his own motion to issue a subpœna, and attach to it a duces tecum clause requiring the production of records, documents, and so forth, that he may want to use. I think it fair to say that there has been no complaint in the State since that statute has been in operation against any attorney general or any deputy attorney general for abuse of the power conferred. We regard it as a very salutary statute, and one that lends strength to the prosecuting arm; and so far as our experience in Delaware is concerned, it is not at all a novel thing.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is an excellent lawyer, and he doubtless prepared this amendment with a good deal of care. It strikes me, however, that it has some very unusual features, and consequently should not be adopted as an amendment to this bill without full consideration of just what it would accomplish if it became a law.

It provides that—when the United States is engaged in war or is threatened with war, insurrection, or invasion, upon an affidavit being made before any United States commissioner or United States district judge stating that affiant has probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed—

Now, let me stop there for a moment. Under the law as it is to-day the power exists to file an affidavit before a United States commissioner at all times, whether the grand jury is in session or not, alleging that an offense has been committed; and when the affidavit is filed it is the duty of the commissioner to issue his warrant, which, when served upon the person named, gives him jurisdiction to inquire into the probable cause. There is nothing new about that anywhere. It is a part of the criminal procedure of all the States in the Union, as well as of the United States; and, consequently, we need no additional law to enable the authorities to inquire whether an offense has been committed when the charge is made to proper authority concerning it.

That being a general provision of law, applicable in times of peace as well as in war, the Senator's amendment would be entirely superfluous; but it does not stop there—or is about to be committed—

If the affiant has probable cause to believe that a crime is about to be committed, then—the said judge or commissioner shall issue subpœnas in the usual manner for such person or persons as the district attorney may approve for an inquiry as to the matter set out in the said affidavit.

I think the Senator from Ohio will concede that that is a most extraordinary proposition. If I have probable cause to believe that my friend the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is about to commit an offense against the proclamations of the President or the laws or Constitution of the United States, I may go before a judge of the United States court or a commissioner and make affidavit to that effect, whereupon the district attorney will approve the issuance of subpœnas in the usual manner for witnesses, from whom he will inquire whether the Senator is about to commit such a crime. He is not required to be there. Perhaps he may not be permitted to attend. We then have the institution, in effect, of a star-chamber investigation, not for the purpose of determining whether a crime has been committed, but whether a crime is about to be committed.

Mr. GORE. And make that the basis of an injunction.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; it might be made the basis of an injunction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to Senators that they address the Chair.

Mr. THOMAS. I am discussing this matter seriously. But apart from the unusual—I do not want to comment too severely—apart from the unusual proceeding involved in that process, the pertinent question is asked by the Senator from Connecticut what the outcome will be.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Suppose that as a result of the case I have imagined—for illustration, the commissioner should decide that the Senator was about to commit a crime—what is he going to do about it? Is he going to issue an injunction against him, as was suggested, or commit him without bail? The amendment does not enlighten us.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I was going to ask the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Or will he then notify the Senator that he is about to commit a crime and that the fact has been inquired into and determined in his absence? What process will be brought into operation to circumvent the nefarious designs of the Senator or in anywise to make the finding effective? It is true that it may be said that under such circumstances the public would receive knowledge of what the testimony elicited, and that might be a moral restraint upon the Senator, thus keeping him within the bounds of the law and preventing his contemplated breach of the statutes or of the proclamation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Supposing that in the opinion of the witnesses whom the district attorney designates to testify I am about to commit a crime, but supposing that I assert most positively that such an idea never entered my head at all, what is the judge to do about it?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield to the Senator from Ohio to answer that question. I can not answer it.

Mr. POMERENE. Of course we can have a little amusement, if we desire, about a serious problem.

Mr. THOMAS. I beg to assure the Senator that I am discussing this amendment in good faith.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well; I shall discuss it in good faith, too. In the first place, I do not need to say that the Senator from Colorado would hardly charge the Senator from Connecticut with committing or intending to commit any offense.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, I used that merely as an illustration.

Mr. POMERENE. Just a moment; I understand that thoroughly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I accept the apology.

Mr. POMERENE. Then my good friend the Senator from Connecticut asks another question: If some witness should express the opinion that somebody was about to commit an offense, then what? I take it that opinion evidence would not be accepted. These witnesses would be called for the purpose of testifying to facts.

Let me give an illustration. Down in the park there are certain soldiers now guarding bridges. Suppose that a district attorney had information that John Jones had a supply of dynamite in his possession, and he had further positive information that John Jones had said that at a given time he was going to blow up a bridge at a given place. Would not an officer of the law feel justified in making every investigation possible? Suppose he had information only of a character which would put him on inquiry, and he knew that somebody else had this information. Is there anything wrong about investigating it? Must you first file a complaint?

It seems to me that this is a matter as much in defense, as much in protection of the one who may be under suspicion, as it would be of assistance to the officers in making the investigation. It is a pretty serious matter to charge anyone with crime and have him arrested unless you have some evidence to produce; and I believe this plan would be resorted to only when the officers were not certain about the situation and would not want to file a complaint charging an individual with having committed a crime. It is simply for the purpose of inquiry—nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think I understand the Senator's position perfectly, and I want to reassure him that I have the most unqualified respect both for his opinion and for any amendment or any bill for which he may be sponsor. Consequently, I am impugning neither the motives nor the purposes which the Senator has in view in proposing the amendment; yet I think the instances which he has cited indicate how unnecessary the amendment is, even from his own point of view.

There are in the pending bill provisions which would cover, in my judgment, the illustrations to which he has called attention. There can be no question but that under this bill, if it becomes a law, information such as he suggested would be a proper basis for a search warrant, and then the service of the warrant would disclose the truth or falsity of the report. And of course rumors of threatened crime may always be investigated by the police authorities. But fundamentally, Mr. President, I think we can not, without doing violence to the spirit of our laws, give a judge of the United States court or any other court the power, upon the filing of the affidavit of a citizen that an offense is about to be committed, authority to hold an ex parte inquiry upon that subject; and that is what may be done here. It might not be done in every instance, but it may be done under the provisions of the proposed amendment. It does not require the issuance of a warrant for the accused. It does not require his presence. It is fundamental law in this country, even in civil matters, that every citizen must have his day in court; yet, under the provisions of this amendment, not even that boon is vouchsafed to the suspected party.

I have no question that under a provision of this kind citizens like the Senator would be incapable of abusing it; but has the Senator considered the extent to which this act might become an agency, in the hands of unscrupulous men, perhaps for the undoing, certainly for the vexatious annoyance, of citizens of the United States?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. We know what human nature is, and how prone some elements of it are to take advantage of situations like the present, and of amendments like the one proposed, for the purpose of gratifying long-entertained animosities toward their fellow men.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I agree with the Senator that there should not be any legislation which would unduly harrass any citizen.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, I knew the Senator would.

Mr. POMERENE. But the purpose of this was to aid the officials who were charged with the enforcement of the law. Now, if anyone could go promiscuously and file an affidavit without the approval of any official, then, it seems to me, there would be some foundation for the fear that seems to enter the mind of the Senator. But here we have first an affidavit to be filed before the judge or the commissioner, and this must have the approval of the United States district attorney before the subpœna can be issued; and I felt that it was reasonably guarded against just such evils as the Senator has in mind.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator's purpose is commendable, but I do not think he has guarded it in the language which he has used. Upon the filing of the complaint the judge or the commissioner—shall issue subpœnas in the usual manner for such person or persons as the district attorney may approve.

He is not to approve the filing of the affidavit, but this approbation goes to the witnesses. If an affidavit of that sort is made by John Smith against Richard Roe, and a list of witnesses accompanies it, as it probably would, then the district attorney runs his pencil through or he approves the names of these witnesses, and the subpœna shall issue in the usual manner for such persons as the district attorney may approve. That to some degree might be a protection, but at the same time it does not do away with the necessity of holding this examination, and holding it ex parte; and I think, Mr. President, we can not too often remind ourselves that in the effort to safeguard the country now we should not by measures such as these assail the foundations, or any of them, of our structure of government and so involve the rights of the citizens and the liberty of the people. Of all times, this is the time to be careful, lest we do things which will return to plague us.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. If the objection is that this entire proceeding is not to be subject to the approval of the United States district attorney——

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, that is one objection.

Mr. POMERENE. I shall be quite well satisfied to accept any amendment to this language which will give that protection.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, I am satisfied that the Senator would; but the objection I have is fundamental. Of course, this is a matter which can be cured by a change of phraseology, but I deny that in this country any man can be subjected to proceedings in his absence, whether the proceedings are approved by the district attorney or the district judge, or both, whereby inquiry is to be made regarding his criminal purpose or intention concerning an act that is in futuro. It is utterly irreconcilable with our notions of criminal jurisprudence and must necessarily carry with it many very serious consequences.

Mr. President, we have already provided, by a paragraph of the section last adopted, that the doing of certain things with the most innocent purpose, with no regard to the intent which prompted their doing, constitute or may constitute crimes subjecting the citizen to very serious fine and deprivation of personal liberty. Now, if to that astounding situation we add a proceeding whereby whoever may be suspected of probably being about to commit a crime is to be the subject of ex parte investigations, I am unable to conceive what further step we can take toward the goal of political absolutism.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the efforts of Senators to preserve the fundamentals of American liberty are, of course, in the very highest degree commendable, but I can not escape the conclusion from the comments upon this measure that many of us are very unduly alarmed.

If I understand this simple little amendment aright, it is simply to put the process of the court in the hands of the district attorney, in order to enable him to do his duty. Senators talk about star-chamber proceedings, about crimes that have not been committed and that are going to be committed. Why, Mr. President, every district attorney in the United States is conducting these star-chamber proceedings to-day. He is sitting in his office. He learns that a man is suspected of having committed a crime, or being about to commit a crime, and he immediately proceeds, as his duty requires him to do, as his oath charges him to do, to get all the information he can about that crime having been committed or about that crime that is about to be committed. He can not perform his duty without doing these things. Now, how is he fixed?

He invites people to come into his office. They come voluntarily. They tell him what they know. They tell him about some one else who may know something about the matter, and he says, "Go and get that man and bring him in here." The man, however, says he will not come, and so the district attorney is denied that information. All that this statute means is that when the district attorney is in that situation he can go before the judge of the court and say: "These things are represented to me, and I want a subpœna to bring this man into my office and hear what he has to say and see if I can not get the truth out of him." How are the fundamentals of liberty imperiled by any such proceeding as that?

I was particularly surprised at the query addressed to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]: "Suppose some one said that he was guilty of a crime, but he denied it?" Why, Mr. President, the person who is suspected of having committed the crime, the person against whom the accusation of crime is made, is not there at all. The district attorney simply calls into his office the fellows whom he thinks can give him some information about it; and if they are unwilling to come, or if he would rather get them in that way, he can go in to the judge and represent the facts to him and get process.

The amendment is nothing more nor less than a measure to put into the hands of the district attorney the process of the court, in order more fully and completely to get information concerning crimes perpetrated or threatened.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

The amendment was rejected on a division.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask for the adoption of the chapter under the unanimous-consent agreement. I do not know whether the present occupant of the chair knows it or not, but there is a unanimous-consent agreement that we shall adopt these chapters as we finish their consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to adopting the chapter as amended?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just one moment.

Mr. REED. I simply wanted to inquire, before the chapter was agreed to, whether that would preclude any further amendments to the chapter in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. OVERMAN. Probably the Senator was not here, but there was a unanimous-consent agreement that the bill should be adopted chapter by chapter. That does not preclude a Senator from offering amendments to any chapter when the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. REED. When it gets into the Senate?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair decides that when in Committee of the Whole a chapter is agreed to further amendments to it will not be in order.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, I shall not object, because I think I can offer whatever amendments I have when the bill is in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the chapter is approved.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not intend to make any further controversy about this chapter at this time, but I would much prefer that the question of the adoption of the chapter be put to a vote. I would not want to be put in the position of having it adopted without objection.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Chair did put the question and the chapter was adopted.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Oh, no!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated that if no objection was made the chapter would be adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask for a vote. I do not ask for a roll call, but I do not want——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As many as favor agreeing to the chapter will vote "aye."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, one moment. I wish to ask whether subsection (c) remains in the chapter?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does, as amended.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, Mr. President, I move to strike out that subsection.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That has already been voted on.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It has? Very well; I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As many as agree to the chapter as amended will vote "aye." [A pause.] Those who are opposed to the chapter as amended will vote "no." [A pause.] The ayes have it, and the chapter is agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to offer three amendments to section 1 of chapter 7, and I ask that the section as amended by these three amendments be printed for the use of the Senate to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to sections 1 and 2 of chapter 7, which I should like to have printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the bill now before the Senate be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] may take up his bills, and I desire, after they are disposed of, to move an adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, that will be done.

On motion of Mr. OVERMAN, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. 2) be reprinted showing in roman the amendments so far adopted and the committee amendments proposed in italics.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives.

NAVAL BILLS.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles:

H. R. 1771. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to the Fleet Naval Reserve;

H. R. 2008. An act to provide for the extension of minority enlistments in the naval service;

H. R. 2338. An act to authorize the detail of additional officers to the Hydrographic Office;

H. R. 2339. An act to increase the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy until September 1, 1918; and

H. R. 2340. An act to increase the age limit for persons appointed as officers in the Naval Reserve.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that all five of these bills be considered at this time. The Senate bills have been reported unanimously by the Naval Committee in a form almost precisely similar to these and are now on the Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that the House bills be considered at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the House bills have not been even printed. They just came over to-day.

Mr. SWANSON. The bills are precisely similar in every particular. The Senate bills have been printed for some time and are now on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will suspend for just a moment, please. The Chair is compelled to hear the proceedings, in order to determine the questions as they arise.

Mr. SWANSON. It is very important that these bills should be passed at once.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator if the Naval Affairs Committee has reported the Senate bills from that committee?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I will state to the Senator that they have reported unanimously Senate bills exactly similar to these. They were introduced jointly in the House and in the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. The Senate bills have been on the calendar for two or three days.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2338) to authorize the detail of additional officers to the Hydrographic Office.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read at length first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to detail such naval officers as may be necessary to the Hydrographic Office during the continuance of the present war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask the Senate to consider the bill (H. R. 2339) to increase the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy until September 1, 1918.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let us hear the bill read first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in addition to the number of midshipmen now authorized by law, there shall be appointed during the period from the date of passage of this act until September 1, 1918, one additional midshipman for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress. Nominations shall be made for these vacancies by the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates concerned for any regular or special examination that may be ordered before that date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Virginia what becomes of these young men when the date is reached.

Mr. SWANSON. The appointments are simply made up to that time, and if they are appointed they continue in the Academy until they graduate.

Mr. GALLINGER. They do continue until graduation?

Mr. SWANSON. The appointments cease with 1918.

Mr. LODGE. It is only one more appointment for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate to increase the classes between now and 1918. They go into different classes.

Mr. GALLINGER. That appeals to me, but I did not so understand the bill as it was read.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask if there will be sufficient accommodations for this increased number.

Mr. SWANSON. There will be sufficient accommodations. Last year we made an appropriation for this purpose that will take care of the additional number.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2340) to increase the age limit for persons appointed as officers in the Naval Reserve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the maximum limit of age for officers of the Naval Reserve of the Naval Reserve Force on first appointments as such therein be, and it is hereby, increased from 35 to 50 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1771) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to the Fleet Naval Reserve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the clause in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes." which reads as follows: "The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to assign any member of the Fleet Naval Reserve to active duty for training on board ship, upon the application of such member," etc., be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking therefrom the words "on board ship."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2008) to provide for the extension of minority enlistments in the naval service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter any enlistment for minority in the Navy or Marine Corps may be extended as is provided by law for extending an enlistment for a term of four years, under similar conditions and with like rights, privileges, benefits, and obligations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the five Senate bills on the calendar of like title to those which have passed will be indefinitely postponed. The Chair hears no objection, and the Secretary will state the numbers and titles.

The SECRETARY:

A bill (S. 1534) to provide for the extension of minority enlistments in the naval service;

A bill (S. 1536) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to the Fleet Naval Reserve;

A bill (S. 1587) to increase the number of midshipmen in the Naval Academy;

A bill (S. 1537) to increase the age limit for persons appointed as officers in the Naval Reserve; and

A bill (S. 1538) to authorize the detail of additional officers to the Hydrographic Office.

STEAM YACHT "OWERA."

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the calendar the bill (S. 1845) to authorize PETER GOELET GERRY to enter into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States, for the use of the steam yacht Owera, and to put it on its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 4, after the words "Rhode Island," to insert the words "having offered to the Government for the period of the war the use of his yacht hereinafter named"; in line 8, after the word "use," to strike out the word "of" and insert the word "by," so as to read: "for the use by the United States"; in line 10, after the word "period," to strike out the words "and consideration," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That PETER GOELET GERRY, a Senator of the United States from the State of Rhode Island, having offered to the Government for the period of the war the use of his yacht hereinafter named, be, and he is hereby, authorized to enter into a contract or agreement with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States, for the use by the United States of the steam yacht Owera, owned by the said Senator, for such period as may be mutually agreeable to the parties to the contract or agreement herein authorized.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of sections 114 and 115 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," and any other laws or parts of laws inconsistent herewith, be, and they are hereby, declared inapplicable to the said PETER GOELET GERRY and the Secretary of the Navy, or such other officer or officers of the United States as shall, on behalf of the Secretary of the Navy, enter into the aforesaid contract or agreement for the purposes and to the extent set forth in section 1 hereof.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

USE OF RIFLES.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the calendar for immediate consideration the bill (S. 995) to authorize the issue to States and Territories of rifles and other property for the equipment of organizations of home guards. This is a bill which authorizes the Secretary of War to loan to States arms which are not used in the military service for the use of the home guard or other military forces of the State.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 995) to authorize the issue to States and Territories of rifles and other property for the equipment of organizations of home guards, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 2, line 1, after the word "regulations," to insert "and upon furnishing such bonds or security," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to issue from time to time to the several States and Territories for the equipment of such home guards having the character of State police or constabulary as may be organized by the several States and Territories, such rifles and ammunition therefor, cartridge belts, haversacks, canteens, in limited amounts as available supplies will permit, provided that the property so issued shall remain the property of the United States and shall be receipted for by the governors of the several States and Territories and accounted for by them under such regulations and upon furnishing such bonds or security as the Secretary of War may prescribe, and that any property so issued shall be returned to the United States on demand when no longer needed for the purposes for which issued, or if, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, an exigency requires the use of the property for Federal purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEEKS. On line 7, page 1, after the word "Territories," I move to insert the words "and District of Columbia," and in line 12, before the words "accounted for," to insert the words "Commissioners of the District of Columbia and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WEEKS, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the issue to States and Territories and the District of Columbia of rifles and other property for the equipment of organizations of home guards."

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 21, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 21, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in all our enterprises as a Nation we pray that we may undertake nothing that can not be done in Thy name; that we shall undertake nothing that is not a spiritual enterprise; we pray that we may have the virtues which arise out of the contemplation of great spiritual enterprises. Do Thou guide and direct us along the loftiest lines of human endeavor, that patriotism may be a sacred passion to us, and that it may be so closely allied to the final and eternal destinies of men as that it may be holiness to the Lord. We pray Thee to guide us to this end. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Chicago (Ill.) Club, praying for compulsory military service, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Board of Trustees of the International Sunday School Association, in session at Atlantic City, N. J., and of the Philadelphia County (Pa.) Medical Society, praying for national prohibition during the period of the war, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Sacramento (Cal.) teachers, praying for the enactment of legislation to permit school districts to secure money from the sale of their bonds to the postal savings bank, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Commission on Temperance of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, of New York City, N. Y., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD resolutions of the Delaware Branch of the National Woman's Party passed at their State convention in Delaware a few days ago and which I have been requested to have introduced in the RECORD by the State chairman, Mrs. Florence Bayard Hillis.

There being no objection, the resolutions were orderd to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the question of woman's enfranchisement is fundamental and of paramount importance; and

Whereas in the present national crisis women together with men share the burdens of taxation, responsibility, and horrors of war: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Delaware Branch of the National Woman's Party, in convention assembled, call upon our Senators and Representative in Congress to give their favorable support to the immediate passage of the Federal amendment known as the Susan B. Anthony amendment; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to Senator SAULSBURY and Representative POLK with a request that they be read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the Senate and House and also be sent to the President of the United States.

Mrs. M. P. DERICKSON BRINGHURST.
Miss ELIZABETH P. SPEAKMAN.
Miss PAULINE TOWNSEND.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented 13 telegrams from citizens and business firms in the State of Michigan, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented nine telegrams from citizens and business firms in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against volunteer enlistment, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Dental Society of Genesee County and the Dental Society of Kalamazoo County, in the State of Michigan, praying for the adoption of certain changes in the universal military training bill affecting dentists, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the faculty of Albion (Mich.) College, praying for taxation rather than bond issues for the payment of war expenses, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of the faculty of the West Texas State Normal College, of Canyon; the Rotary Club, of Houston; the Chamber of Commerce of Austin; the Battle of Flowers Association, of San Antonio; of George C. Greer, of Dallas; of sundry citizens of Rockport; of the Credit Men's Association, of Austin; of the Retail Merchants' Association, of Austin, all in the State of Texas, and of the Chamber of Commerce of Texarkana, Ark.-Tex., praying for compulsory military service and pledging support to the President, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Claude, Tex., and N. E. Shands of San Marcos, Tex., remonstrating against conscription.

He also presented petitions of the congregation of the Hyde Park Christian Church, of Austin, Tex.; of the Sedalia Presbytery, of Bunceton, Mo.; and of the Presbytery of West Jersey, of Woodbury, N. J., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COLT presented a petition of 25 citizens of Providence, Natick, Edgewood, and Arctic, all in the State of Rhode Island, praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of Local Lodge No. 64, Sons of Herman, of Crookston, and of sundry citizens of St. James, in the State of Minnesota, pledging support to the President, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Hennepin County Woman Suffrage Association, of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the further manufacture of liquor from grain, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a telegram from the commander of the Navy recruiting office, Minneapolis, Minn., stating that 15 boys enlisted in the Navy from Alexandria, Minn., showing the spirit of patriotism prevalent in that city, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Bar Association of Norfolk County, Mass., pledging support to the President, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 282) making an appropriation of $200,000 for the acquisition of a tract of land known as Great Piece Meadows, New Jersey, for a target range and camp ground, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 29) thereon.

Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1873) to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 30) thereon.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 1006) authorizing the county of Morrison, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said county, and I submit a report (No. 28) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was, in line 6, after the words "Mississippi River," to insert "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Morrison, in the State of Minnesota, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation in section 8, township 127 north, range 29 west of the fifth principal meridian, and section 32, township 39 north, range 32 west of the fourth principal meridian, in the State of Minnesota, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INCREASE OF FOOD CROP.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. From the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report back favorably with an amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 31) to increase food crop in the United States, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the joint resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes an amendment, after the words "directed to," to strike out the remainder of the joint resolution and insert, so that it will read:

That the President is authorized and directed to procure, or aid in procuring, such stocks of nitrate of soda and other fertilizers and fertilizer ingredients as he may determine to be necessary and find available for increasing agricultural production during the calendar year 1917 and to dispose of the same, on credit or otherwise, at cost in such way as he deems best to facilitate the purpose. For carrying out the purposes of this resolution there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and the President is authorized to make such regulations and to use such means and agencies of the Government as in his discretion he may deem best. The proceeds arising from the disposition hereunder of fertilizers and fertilizer ingredients shall go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I understand unanimous consent is asked to consider the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to have it considered at this time. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to call attention now to the necessity for this legislation and give the reasons for the action of the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was going to suggest, Mr. President, that this proposition is clearly an appropriation bill, and could not originate in the Senate, and it ought not to be considered at this time, when there are so many questions pending affecting the subject of agricultural preparedness. There are very many propositions brought forward to increase agricultural products in the United States, and the subject ought to be considered comprehensively. It should be considered promptly. We are all in favor of doing what can properly be done in this direction, but here it is proposed to inject an appropriation of $10,000,000 for one particular item, when all Senators, I have no doubt, have suggestions which have been made which are absolutely vital—at least, the people think they are vital—to the communities in which they live. It seems to me it is an improper thing to consider such a measure by unanimous consent in the morning hour. However, I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from South Carolina if he wishes to make an explanation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let me state to the Senator that the proposition in the joint resolution is that there shall be a sale. This is not an appropriation which means a loss or an expenditure on the part of the Government, because dollar for dollar it will be covered back into the Treasury. The President is authorized to make that disposition and cover it back into the Treasury.

I should like to say to the Senator and to the Senate that the entire Atlantic seaboard is dependent at this time upon a diffusible stimulant for the grain crop. In the last 15 years the crop of the entire Atlantic seaboard has been more than quadrupled by the application of nitrates in the form of nitrate of soda. Within a few miles of my own home the record corn crop of the world was made on one acre of land by the now famous Jerry Moore—232 bushels—by the proper application of concentrated nitrates.

The only sources of supply of these nitrates, or of a sufficient amount to meet the absolute need of the entire Atlantic seaboard, are Argentina and Chile, the blood coming from Argentina and the soda from Chile. On account of the vessels having been taken out from the carrying trade incident to the European war there has been a scarcity of vessels available.

May I have order, Mr. President?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wanted to have a chance to object to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go to the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina if there is a report of the committee accompanying the joint resolution? If so, I should like to have it printed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have submitted no written report from the committee, the joint resolution being so self-explanatory. At the proper time I shall call it up and the Senate will have an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina whether the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry considered a couple of bills which I introduced looking toward the utilization of the public lands of the United States for the growing of crops without any expense to the Government?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. We will have a meeting at 10.30 a. m. Monday, at which time, I am informed, the bills the Senator refers to will be discussed.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON INTEROCEANIC CANALS.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back Senate resolution 45, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 45, submitted yesterday by Mr. SHIELDS, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fifth Congress to send for books and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if there is any reason why the resolution should be passed now. Has the committee an idea of holding hearings at once?

Mr. THOMPSON. The committee has been holding hearings relative to a bill now before the committee. It has been taking testimony.

Mr. SMOOT. At the present time?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], the chairman of the committee, submitted the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course if it is necessary, I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

BILLS AND A JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRADY:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) for the relief of James L. Cardwell; to the Committee on Public Lands.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. GRONNA submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1796) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, and September 7, 1916, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

Mr. CUMMINS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. STERLING submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1873) to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

THE COMMITTEE ON COAST AND INSULAR SURVEY.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 46), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Coast or Insular Survey, or any subcommittee thereof, appointed by said committee be, and it hereby is, authorized and directed to investigate, ascertain, and report upon the advisability of acquiring and improving the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, in accordance with the provisions of Senate bill 1872, first session, Sixty-fifth Congress, or otherwise; with authority to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page; and to sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate. The expenses of said investigation to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

WASHINGTON RAILWAY & ELECTRIC CO.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, a few days ago, on the passage by the Senate of a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate the street railroad strike in the District of Columbia, the Chair was good enough to honor me with a place on that committee. At a meeting of the committee, which was held this morning, it developed that the membership is not in harmony as to the program to be followed. The chairman of the committee is insistent upon construing the order of the Senate to require an immediate investigation.

I do not find it consistent with my duties at a time like this, when such important matters are pending before the Senate, to give the requisite time to make a thorough investigation of the street railway strike. I have not wished to be a barrier to the investigation. Insomuch as the Senate has made this order, and insomuch as the chairman of the committee is insistent upon the investigation proceeding at once, and taking into account my own inability to serve either with credit to myself or with fairness to the Senate and to the parties to the investigation, I ask the Chair that I may be excused from service on the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is excused.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I also had the honor of being appointed to the committee to which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] has just referred, and should ordinarily have been very glad to serve; but for the reason which has been stated by the Senator from Ohio as the reason for which he can not serve, I am compelled also to ask that I may be relieved from service.

The Army bill is coming on, I suppose, and during the coming week everyone who is interested in the affairs of the Nation will, I think, require all the time of the morning hours for study of the very important measures which will be presented for solution. This, with the ordinary work which every Senator has, makes it utterly impossible for me to now give the time required for this investigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is excused. If it be possible for the Chair to find Senators on the Republican side of the Chamber who can find time to serve on this committee, the Chair will fill the vacancies, but they will not be filled until the Chair has had an opportunity to talk with Senators on the subject.

RAILROAD FREIGHT RATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to Senate resolution 44.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from the preceding day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 44), which had been submitted by Mr. SMITH of Georgia yesterday, as follows:

Whereas the railroad companies of the United States have applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a flat increase of 15 per cent on all freight charges amounting to $400,000,000 annually, in spite of the fact that within the past three years the railroads in the central division have been given an increase on freight rates of 5 per cent, and the railroads in the western division an increase amounting to between 5 and 10 per cent, and the railroads in the southeastern division an increase amounting to between 15 and 20 per cent, and the gross freight revenues of the railroads for the six months ending January 1, 1917, amounted to $1,356,039,797, and the net revenues for said six months of the railroads earning over a million dollars annually amounted to practically $700,000,000, the same being 3½ per cent for six months on the book value of these railroads; and

Whereas the applications for increase of rates if granted would place a great additional charge upon the cost of living and are based largely upon the alleged increase of expenses caused by the Adamson Act which has been variously estimated at between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Committee be requested to investigate fully the facts and report the same with their recommendations to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I regard the pendency of this application for an increase of 15 per cent flat on the cost of carriage of freight by the railroads of the country as a serious menace to the business of the country, certainly serious if it is not suspended. I wish to call attention merely to a few facts, which I have gathered hurriedly, for the entire accuracy of which I can not vouch, and it is for that reason that I desire that the resolution, at least in part, shall be passed.

There is an application for a flat increase of 15 per cent on all freight rates pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has been presented by the railroads of the country. The revenue of the railroads for the last six months of 1916 was $1,356,039,997. That was an increase over the last six months of 1915 of $159,647,173, which was the largest revenue that they have ever made. For 12 months this would have paid a revenue of $2,712,079,594. Fifteen per cent gross increase would be $406,000,000. So this application is practically a request to put upon the business of the country an additional transportation burden of $406,000,000 annually.

Mr. LODGE. Let me ask the Senator a question merely for information. Are the profits which the Senator has stated exclusively from freight earnings?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The profits are from all business. The figures of revenue are freight earnings, as I understand. I have had but a limited opportunity to pick out the facts, and I may be inaccurate; but I think I am right.

In 1914 an increased rate was given to the central group of railroads; that is, those north of the Potomac and east of the Mississippi, of 5 per cent. Since then an increased rate has been given to the western group, which is west of the Mississippi, of between 5 and 10 per cent.

Last year an increase was given to the southeastern group—east of the Mississippi and south of the Potomac—of between 15 and 20 per cent. The increase was given practically without a hearing to the shippers. The shippers have been allowed to come in and to contest certain of the charges, and their contests are now pending as to that increase.

For the last six months of 1916 the net profits of the railroads earning incomes above a million dollars annually were $698,666,628. At the same rate for 12 months the net earnings would be practically $1,400,000,000.

The book value of their properties as claimed by the railroads—my statements are all made with the qualification that my investigation has been very hurried and has been conducted in a very limited time—the book value of their property as claimed by the railroads is about $20,000,000,000. So that on the basis of income for the last six months, accepting their properties at their book value, which students of the subject universally challenge as excessive, their net income is 7 per cent. Now, with a net income of 7 per cent and with the apparent tendency to increase of business, it is proposed to levy an additional tax upon transportation of $400,000,000 annually.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is that revenue upon the water and all such elements as that in the stock?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is upon the book value as given by the railroads. I can not say as to the water in the stocks. It is simply termed "estimated book value."

Now, Mr. President, I believe the Senate of the United States was intended to carry a responsibility in the performance of its public obligations concerning those agencies created by the Congress. The Senate of the United States is constitutionally charged with a responsibility connected with appointments. It is declared that appointments are to be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It is supposed that nominees are selected under the advice of the Senate. Perhaps that is a violent supposition; but yet it is in the Constitution. It is undoubtedly true, however, that they must be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I think it behooves us to know what is going on. I think it was contemplated by the Constitution that the Senate, a continuous body, was to watch and guard matters of administration and have a voice in them and, where the administrative work becomes unsatisfactory, to see that something is done to guard the rights of the people.

My resolution is not extreme. It only asks that the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate investigate this question, find the facts, and report to us with their recommendations. I bring the subject before the Senate and take your time for a few moments to call attention to what seem to be startling facts. Are we to have $400,000,000 additional charge put upon the transportation of freight in the United States when the carriers are now making 7 per cent on the book value of their property and when they are receiving more than they ever received before? I have referred to pending status before the Interstate Commerce Commission as an application for an increase of $400,000,000 annually. Really, the railroad companies have filed schedules of new rates making increases of fifteen one-hundredths, and these increases will become effective unless suspended by the commission.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator if 7 per cent on the book value of these properties does not comprehend a very much larger percentage upon the actual investment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, much larger. Nobody questions that the book value is beyond the actual investment.

Mr. President, I understand that one of the reasons assigned for the proposed increase of rates to the railroads is the Adamson law; but nobody has claimed that the Adamson law would impose a charge on the railroads of over $60,000,000, and $30,000,000 is the figure usually recognized, and it only lasts for 12 months.

It has been suggested that coal prices have risen. Why, Mr. President and Senators, every mechanic, every washerwoman, every household must bear as an incident to the war an increased price of coal. Is it to be increased still further to save the common carriers from their part of the burden? I think the proposition is shocking.

My own section, the southeastern section, from the Mississippi to the Potomac, is staggering now under an additional freight charge of between 15 and 20 per cent, put on last year without a hearing from the shippers. Fifteen per cent more would carry it to between 30 and 35 per cent.

I ask that the Interstate Commerce Committee investigate this question, give us the facts, and that we, representing the people, have a voice in what is going on.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator's resolution provides that the matter shall be investigated by the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. By the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate. It is the Senate, representing the people, I want, through its Interstate Commerce Committee, to look into this matter.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the Interstate Commerce Commission has not made any order with reference to this matter at all; that it is merely in the status now of a proposal by the carriers, and that the commission do not propose to make any order until they have made a full investigation and accorded a full hearing to the shippers as well. That is the situation now, as I gather, that it is simply a proposal on the part of the carriers, which the commission will go into thoroughly, and give a hearing to all the shippers before there is any action taken on the proposal.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Which they may go into or they may not go into. They refused to suspend an increased burden of from 15 to 20 per cent on the southeastern section last year without hearing the shippers.

Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a telegram from large shippers in Atlanta, and also a telegram from large shippers in Jacksonville, Fla.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., April 18, 1917.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

Advised that Interstate Commerce Commission may, on Friday, grant railroads 15 per cent advance in rates without hearing from the shippers. Please communicate with the commission and urge that no action be taken until shippers can be heard, and also arrange for hearing. Shippers and public here strongly oppose advance, which is not justified and would prove disastrous.

J. K. ORR,
SAM D. JONES,
C. H. KELLEY.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., April 20, 1917.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

Interstate Commerce Commission have tentatively granted 15 per cent general advance in freight rates, effective June 1, without hearing from the shippers. We protest against this summary action and request that you intervene with the commission, asking that shippers be given an opportunity to be heard before any advances are permitted.

GEORGIA-FLORIDA SAW MILL ASSOCIATION (INC).

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Georgia takes his seat, I should like to ask him a question. This is a subject which I have from time to time investigated with some care and interest, and my views are fairly well known with regard to the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say that as the Senator from Iowa was not in the Chamber, I had a telephone message sent expressing the hope that he would come, because I wanted to hear his views.

Mr. CUMMINS. What I should like to know is what is in the mind of the Senator with regard to a subsequent proceeding? Under the law the railway companies file their tariffs, and at the end of a prescribed period they go into effect, unless they are suspended by the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and then a proceeding arises which is tried out under the law. Suppose the Interstate Commerce Committee investigates under the resolution of the Senator from Georgia and reports that, in its judgment, the proposed increase is not warranted, what action, then, could the Senate take, or what action does the Senator from Georgia propose that it shall take in order to correct any action which the Interstate Commerce Commission may take?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not undertaking to suggest a course to the committee; but it occurs to me that perhaps it might be well by law to provide that no increases shall go into effect without a hearing. I do not think it fair to the shippers to let the railroads file their applications for increases, certainly not under such circumstances as now confront us, and allow those increases to go into operation without a hearing by the shippers.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Georgia knows that it has been proposed to the Senate, at least twice since I have been a Member of it, that rates should not be increased without hearing and without the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and each time the Senate has voted down the proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And, Mr. President, I think the startling situation that confronts us now emphasizes the wisdom of the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, and I think we may now be able to obtain action which heretofore we have not been able to obtain.

I believe the Senate to-day will support legislation which will prevent this $400,000,000 from being effective until the fullest hearing is had by the commission, and until the commission declares the same to be just and reasonable.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Georgia takes his seat, let me ask him if he has any information as to what the passenger earnings of these carriers are?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In the limited time that I have had I only have looked up these freight figures.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator's statement that these figures represent 7 per cent profit upon the book value of the property of these companies is, of course, based upon their freight earnings, exclusive of their passenger earnings.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; that was not my statement. My statement generally was that their entire earnings, as shown by certain reports to which I had access, indicated a total net profit. That applied to both passengers and freight.

Mr. THOMAS. I wanted that particular matter clarified before the Senator was through.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I understand it, that 7 per cent grows out of freight and passenger earnings, both.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator has looked into this matter, I have no doubt, with much care. Can the Senator state, for the information of some of us, what proportion of the railroads of the country are now in the hands of receivers?

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know; but I do not think the fact that a few ill-advised or mismanaged railroads or wrecked railroads are in the hands of receivers would justify us in putting an improper burden upon all transportation; and I know the Senator from New Hampshire would not think so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would not. I quite agree with the Senator on that point. I asked for information, because I have seen it stated at a percentage that was sufficiently large to rather startle me. I do not recall the percentage of railroads now in the hands of receivers, but I assumed that many of them were not ill-managed or wrecked railroads, and I thought the Senator might be able to give me the information; that is all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I could give the Senator information about one railroad in my State which in the past few years has been in the hands of receivers. That is the only one of which I have any personal knowledge.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I know that such railroads exist. They are not entirely confined to the Senator's section, either.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No. The particular one I mention was improvidently built; it was built into a territory that was not prepared to sustain it in competition with existing through lines, and, much overbonded, it failed as a necessary consequence. I would feel that no justification for the balance of the roads charging excessive rates could grow out of such a failure. I would want them to have fair compensation. It is not a matter of prejudice at all, but I am just shocked at the proposition of putting $400,000,000 more as a burden upon transportation, after what we have done, and with this record of profits.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] rose first.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator from Georgia a question without raising an issue as to the object to be attained. Noting the sentence conveying the resolution, I wondered if it would not be more seemly to ask this information at the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. HARDING. Because it is the Interstate Commerce Commission which has the regulation of railroad rates in hand, and all these questions must necessarily be understood by that commission. Would it not be much more seemly to secure the information from that body, and then have the recommendation of the Senate committee?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I reply to the Senator, no. What I desire is to see the Senate carry its part of the responsibility for official conduct. What I propose is for the Senate committee to make an investigation and give us the exact facts.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I have only made the suggestion because it seems rather a ridiculous thing that the Federal Government should have a commission in charge of railway operations and rates and then that a committee of the Senate should undertake to furnish this body information which ought to be in the possession of that commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Ohio see that it would be highly improper to ask the Interstate Commerce Commission to send to the Senate a statement of what its decision will be in a proceeding now pending before it?

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from Iowa misconstrues my question. I can see no impropriety in asking the Interstate Commerce Commission for the information in its possession. It would be a very strange thing if the creation of this body were to make it exempt from the right of inquiry on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. How would it send the facts until the case was tried before it?

Mr. HARDING. I do not know what the Senator means by the inquiry which he makes; but it is easily conceivable to me that every particle of information on this subject ought to be in the possession of the Interstate Commerce Commission, else that commission is very much of a failure, and ought to be abolished.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have sometimes quarreled with the commission, but I think the Senator from Ohio does it an injustice. The Interstate Commerce Commission has not the facts upon which the case will be decided. The law provides that the railroad companies shall file their tariffs with the commission. The railroad companies, as I understand, have filed their tariffs tentatively with the commission. Then the commission, if it desires to do so, suspends the operation of those tariffs until a case can be filed. Thereupon an issue is made. The railroad companies introduce their testimony, and under the law the burden of proof is upon the railroad companies to show that the proposed increases are fair and reasonable. Then those who are opposed to the increases come in and introduce their proof. I venture to say that before the case is submitted there will be a great flood of testimony introduced, just as there has been in times past. I think in the highest degree it would be improper to ask the Interstate Commerce Commission to anticipate the facts which may be laid before it in the proceedings and attempt to send them to the Senate.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I only want to make this observation: Surely the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has interstate traffic under its direction, must of necessity be possessed in detail of all the information which is set forth in the preamble of this resolution. Of course it is not intended, and I have not in mind the thought, that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall submit to us the complaints of the shippers; and yet, if the Senate contemplates going into an investigation of a rate increase, it seems to me the practicability of maintaining an interstate commerce commission is challenged.

I am not raising an objection, understand, to the proposition at which the Senator from Georgia aims, but I want to know of the Senator if this great commission, in charge of interstate commerce, is utterly without the information which this resolution seeks? If at a later date the committee or the Senate wants to take upon itself the investigation of rate increases and pass upon the justice of those rates that is an entirely different matter; but surely the maintenance of an Interstate Commerce Commission becomes ridiculous if we can not turn to that body and get the exact information which this resolution seems to contemplate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the resolution is passed there will be nothing to hinder the committee from sending to the Interstate Commerce Commission or any of its employees in possession of information and asking to have that information laid before the committee in so far as the commission may have it. There will be nothing, either, to deter the committee from gathering information from other sources. I take it that the purpose of the resolution is, in part, to determine by an independent investigation, through one of our own committees, the broad question as to the whole freight situation. The Senator who offers the resolution has offered very substantial reasons for an investigation; but let me call attention to an additional ground which the Senator, of course, had in mind but I think did not express, and that is that it is not only the duty of the Senate to see that executive officers perform their duties, but it is peculiarly the duty of the Congress or of either branch of Congress in this case, because primarily it is the business of Congress to itself regulate rates, to itself make the rules under which the railroad business of the country may be conducted, and Congress has simply seen fit to create an agency to relieve it in part of that duty. The duty, nevertheless, rests upon Congress to see and know that the agency by it created at all times performs its full duty. It will not do to stand in the Senate and say that an agency created by the Senate and the House of Representatives is too holy a thing for the Senate or House of Representatives to ever dare investigate any subject that may have been turned over to such an organization.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. HARDING. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if anyone has made such an intimation as that?

Mr. REED. Why is the Senator from Ohio agitated by my remark? I addressed nothing to him.

Mr. HARDING. I presume it is not extraordinary for me to become agitated. At least a new Senator has a right to a little agitation at times.

Mr. REED. Why, certainly; new or old, we have that right; but I do not know why the Senator is taking exception to my remark.

Mr. HARDING. I was only seeking, Mr. President, to question what seemed to me the consistency of the Senate seeking information on its own account which ought by all reason to be in the hands of a commission created by this body. I have not at any time questioned the propriety of the Senate making recommendations or changing the interstate-commerce laws in any way.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator, I think. I still do not understand why the Senator seems to think I was addressing my remarks particularly to him. I am addressing my remarks to the proposition that this body—which, in connection with the House of Representatives and the President, created the Interstate Commerce Commission—is charged at all times with the primary duty of seeing that the railroad rates in the United States shall be fair and just to the people and to the companies alike.

Mr. President, I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that I think this investigation is very necessary. I think it will not do any harm to know just what the Interstate Commerce Commission is doing. There is a rumor abroad—whether it is well founded or not, I do not know—that this enormous increase of rates is, in whole or in part, about to be permitted. I do not undertake to vouch for the accuracy of that rumor; but I do know what our duty is, and I think it would have been well if we had in the past kept much more closely in touch with the situation than we have.

I am in favor of the resolution.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have no objection to authorizing the Interstate Commerce Committee to proceed with this investigation. Of course it means a very great deal of work, and I question somewhat whether the committee has the facilities, the machinery, and the means for making an investigation such as ought to be made in order to be thorough and full and satisfactory. The Interstate Commerce Commission undoubtedly has that machinery and is able to make that investigation. The fact that it will impose a very great work upon a committee of the Senate is no argument against undertaking it, I admit.

I received this morning telegrams similar to those offered by the Senator from Georgia, and I called at the office of the commission. I was assured that no order had been made granting any increases; that no action would be taken upon this tentative order or this proposal to the carriers until the shippers had a full opportunity to be heard; and I was advised so to communicate to those who had sent me the telegrams. That is the information I have upon the subject, to which perhaps, under the circumstances, the Senate is entitled, and therefore I am justified in referring to it.

As to the resolution itself, as I say, I have no objection to the Senate committee undertaking this work if it is desirable to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in view of the fact that this matter is properly before the Interstate Commerce Commission, it strikes me that the resolution is anomalous and unnecessary; and yet I know it will pass, and I do not propose to delay its consideration.

I rose particularly to say that it is refreshing to me to have an announcement made here that the legislative branch of the Government at this late day is going to assert itself in matters of legislation. I had feared of late that the legislative branch had been swallowed by another branch of the Government, and that we had no disposition to assert our rights as a coordinate branch of the Government of the United States. As I say, it was refreshing to me to have an utterance from the distinguished Senator to the effect that it was time that the Senate asserted its rights, and that this was an opportunity for it to make an assertion of that kind.

As I say, Mr. President, I do not think this matter ought to be taken out of the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission at this early stage of the consideration of the matter; but I have no idea that any opposition that might be made by me or by any other Senator on this floor would prevent the passage of the resolution, because it is fashionable nowadays for us to go into the investigation of every conceivable thing that can be devised. I apprehend that if this investigation is gone into by this committee it can result in very little else than an embarrassment to the great commission that has the matter in charge at the present time; and I feel sure that if this committee reaches a conclusion and reports it to the Senate, that will probably be the end of it, and that no good result will come, unless, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] suggested, we may legislate so as in some way to restrain the Interstate Commerce Commission from exercising the functions that they now exercise under the laws that we have passed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I realize that if this investigation takes place it is going to be at the expense of a good deal of time, labor, and money, and it is a very important question, but I see no reason why the resolution should not take the usual course. I therefore move that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I am constrained to make this motion for several reasons—first, because that is the usual parliamentary course; second, there is no intimation even here, so far as I have heard it discussed—that is, no authoritative intimation—that this increase is going to be granted. I should doubt it very seriously. I say that, not knowing anything about the subject of rates. The commission has not yet acted upon this matter.

There is another reason. Last July Congress passed a joint resolution providing for the appointment of a joint committee consisting of five Senators and five Representatives. who were appointed "to investigate the subject of the Government control and regulation of interstate and foreign transportation, the efficiency of the existing system in protecting the rights of shippers and carriers and in promoting the public interest, the incorporation or control of the incorporation of carriers, and all proposed changes in the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the act to regulate commerce," and so forth.

I am satisfied that this language is broad enough to justify the joint committee in taking up this subject, if it seems necessary to take it up. If the resolution were now to be adopted—and I do not say that it ought not to be adopted upon a proper consideration and a report by the committee—we would have then an investigation authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission, a second investigation which could be taken up by this joint committee and which until very recently was holding hearings upon this subject matter, and now a third investigating committee.

Without passing judgment upon whether there should or should not be any increase in rates, it does seem to me the Senate ought to have the judgment of the Interstate Commerce Committee as to whether under all the circumstances it is wise to take up a third investigation at this time. For that reason I make the motion.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, a few days ago I had occasion to go down to the Interstate Commerce Commission with some persons representing some large interests in our State who were very much interested in this question of the increase of rates, and we were assured by the chairman of the commission, just as the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has mentioned, that the commission has reached no decision with reference to the question at all; that it would not reach any decision in regard to the suspension or putting into effect of the rates until after those interested, the shippers and freight payers, would have an opportunity to be heard and present their protest against the putting into effect of the rates without an investigation.

I was informed this morning by one of the parties who went down with me that on yesterday he was given a hearing by the commission, that he was given an opportunity to protest against the putting into effect of the rates before a full investigation had been had. So, apparently the commission is gathering information upon which to determine whether or not it will suspend the going into effect of the rates, or permit them to go into effect.

Mr. President, I have my own opinion that the rates should not be permitted to go into effect until a full investigation has been had.

Mr. REED. I am not sure that I understand the Senator's statement in reference to what the commission had assured him would be done. Are they simply gathering some information by inquiring from individuals here and there, or are they proposing at this time to actually open the case and invite in the shippers so that they can have a formal hearing?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I do not understand that they are going into the question of determining whether rates should be increased or not, but they are giving the shippers, those who are opposed to the increase in the freight rates, an opportunity to file their protests with the commission against the taking effect of the proposed rates and their requests for a suspension of the rates until a full hearing can be had. In other words, as I understand it, it is a good deal like presenting reasons generally why action should not be taken until after a formal hearing has been had, and they are going to determine upon the showing made as to whether or not they will suspend the rate until a full hearing is had, or whether they will let the rates go into effect and then hold the hearing. If a reasonable showing is made for a suspension, I have hopes that the commission will suspend them.

Mr. REED. As I understand the Senator, then, the situation is just this: The Interstate Commerce Commission is now, by inquiry from individuals, about to determine without any public or formal hearing whether it will permit an increase of 15 per cent, according to the information we have, to the amount of $400,000,000 a year, to be made without suspending the rate and requiring proof before it goes into effect. Does not the Senator think that before any such enormous increase as that is permitted to go into effect there ought to be a formal hearing of the most solemn character?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so; and I think the commission are going to take that into account in determining whether or not they will suspend the rates. I agree with the Senator, and I was just proceeding to state that I do not think this increase ought to be permitted without a thorough investigation. As I understand it, under the law, whenever the railroads propose to increase the rates they must file their applications, and then 30 days' notice is given for a showing by the interested parties to the commission as to whether those rates should be put into effect without a hearing or not. That, I take it, the commission in a way have to do under the law we have passed, and I was told by the chairman they have required the railroads to give the statutory 30 days' notice. That gives everybody an opportunity to file a protest with the commission. These protests the commission expect to consider, and consider very carefully, and I have no doubt they will take into account the propositions which have been suggested here.

So it looks to me like we might be in this situation: We order this hearing. The 1st of June is the date, I understand, when the commission expects to act. The railroads will give the statutory notice. The protests will come in. The commission will determine then the question of suspension. If it is determined that the rates shall not go into effect, and they are suspended, the committee, it seems to me, would have nothing to do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Could not the committee do this with great propriety? If the commission are seriously considering allowing $400,000,000 added under these facts to the burden of transportation, do you not think it might occur to the committee to report to the Senate an amendment to the law providing that they should not grant this increase at any time until a hearing has been had and the carriers have shown that the increase was reasonable and proper?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I think we ought to do now. I think the Senator ought to introduce a bill to prohibit in all cases the increase of rates without a hearing and not investigate a particular case in order to determine the general policy, on which I think our minds are made up.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My hope from this resolution is that the committee may promptly come back with a few concrete facts growing out of this situation and an amendment of the law, so that increases shall not be made until after a hearing.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course. if that is the purpose of the Senator, I have no objection. I am heartily in favor of action of that kind.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought I had an occasion which would attract the attention of the Senate and the country, and cause the committee to consider that question. So far as the facts that they have to investigate are concerned, they can do that in a couple of days. They can get up the facts I have handled roughly to show that the carriers are now making 7 per cent on their book valuation, and are proposing an increase of $400,000,000, and that as the law stands this increase will go into effect unless it is suspended by the commission. The shippers must then, item by item, try to pick their commodities out from under this 15 per cent increase. I think the rule ought to be that hearings should be had fully, and the burden should be upon the carriers to justify an increase before it takes place——

Mr. JONES of Washington. There is no disagreement between the Senator and myself.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope the Senator, then, will help adopt the resolution just as it is.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not want it understood that I rose in opposition to the resolution, but I did want to call attention to these facts and to make a suggestion as to the propriety of this action.

It occurs to me, Mr. President, that we are liable to discredit the commission. I think some things have happened in the past which have weakened the confidence of the people in the Interstate Commerce Commission. Congress has acted upon this matter. We have declared by law that the commission shall investigate these matters, and we have given to it the discretion as to whether or not it will suspend proposed increases until after a full hearing or whether it will let them go into effect.

As the Senator from Iowa said awhile ago, the Senate has voted upon this question two or three times and it has expressed its legislative will to the contrary. By legislative action we have given to this commission the power to suspend rates or not. We have acted upon the theory that sometimes the rates should be suspended and that sometimes they should go into effect without delay, and we have authorized the commission to determine this. My opinion, as I stated a moment ago, is that we should not allow these increases until after full hearing. I think we ought to pass a law prohibiting them from increasing rates until after a hearing has been had and they have reached a conclusion upon all the facts with reference to the question.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JONES of Washington. In just a moment. What I feared was that if we take legislative action at this time it would have a legislative influence upon a body that we have created and given power, in the exercise of which I do not believe either the Executive or the legislative ought to interfere any more than we would think of interfering with the Supreme Court of the United States in its consideration of a case. It seems to me that acts of this kind are likely to discredit the Interstate Commerce Commission and destroy the confidence of the people in it. That is the only reason why I would have any hesitation about voting for the resolution. This commission sits as a judicial body, and if its decisions are to command the confidence of the people its decisions should be made without Executive or legislative interference.

I am inclined to think the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is rather wise, that the resolution should be referred to the committee for its consideration, and when it comes back here, if the committee recommends its passage, I would be glad to vote for it without any hesitation whatever. If the real purpose of it and if the effect of it would be only what the Senator from Georgia has suggested and would lead to legislation along the lines that I believe in, I would very heartily welcome it.

The only matter which makes me hesitate at all is the influence that it is apt to have upon a body in which the people of this country have heretofore had the utmost confidence and a body that was created for and that has acted in the interest of the people of this country as between them and the transportation lines of the country. I do not want to discredit this commission. I do not want to weaken the confidence of the people in it by legislative action and interference.

I have no doubt but that it will take into account all these suggestions and facts, and that on the 1st day of June it will announce that it will not permit these rates to go into effect until after a full hearing. If the committee should not have acted before that time and the commission should put the rates into effect, then we could not interfere; they would be in effect under the law. So I see many embarrassing circumstances; but I simply wanted to make the suggestion that I really think it is better to have the resolution considered by the committee, who have especially qualified themselves for a wise judgment on matters of this kind.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to ask the Senator where this body got the power to issue an edict equal in dignity and power with the Supreme Court of the United States? Is not the commission simply an agency of Congress?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Created for the purpose of carrying out the will of Congress according to the rules laid down by Congress?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; Congress has laid down the rules.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is all they are.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator will propose now to lay down some rule for their conduct there will not be the least objection on my part. That is what I would like to see done. I should like to see a bill passed which declared a rule for the commission.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is comparing this commission with some great body above Congress.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is my opinion. The Senator may not agree with me.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator agrees with me that it is nothing but an agency of Congress, like a committee of Congress.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We can take away the powers of many of the courts of the land. They are created by Congress. The Constitution gives to Congress the power to create courts of various kinds.

Mr. OVERMAN. Under what power did we create this commission?

Mr. JONES of Washington. We created it under our constitutional power, of course.

Mr. OVERMAN. We gave it the power to regulate rates, a power which was in Congress. We finally concluded that we could not regulate the rates and that therefore we would create an agency of Congress under certain rules, and we provided that it should regulate rates. That is all the power it has.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say this: That if the course is followed that is suggested by the Senator from North Carolina the confidence of the people in the Interstate Commerce Commission is absolutely gone, and it simply becomes an agency that is controlled and dominated by whatever influence may be brought to bear upon it. I do not have that opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission or of what Congress wanted it to do. Congress has invested it with great and important powers and duties under certain rules. Acting within those rules it is supreme until Congress changes the rules. Of course, we have the right to lay down the rules that shall govern it. That is what we ought to do. But when we do lay down the rules by which it shall be governed we should either allow it to act free from influence from us along the line of those rules or we ought to do away with the commission or change the rules under which it is to act.

That is what I should like to see done in this case, to change the rule that permits proposed increases without a hearing and require in all cases a full hearing before increases go into effect.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Ohio rose awhile ago.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish again to call the attention of the Senator from Washington as well as the Senator from Georgia to the language of the joint resolution authorizing the appointment of a joint committee. If the Senators have in mind simply the investigation as to whether or not there should be changes under this act, then we have already provided a commission to make such a report. This is the language. They are authorized to investigate "all proposed changes in the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the act to regulate commerce."

Mr. JONES of Washington. So the purpose really suggested by the Senator from Georgia is already met by that provision?

Mr. POMERENE. It is already provided for. This commission is in session; at least it was sitting a few weeks ago.

Mr. REED. When was it created?

Mr. POMERENE. July 20, 1916. Then early in the last session, about the first of the year, we passed a resolution, I believe, continuing its jurisdiction for another year.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

Mr. REED. If the commission has been in existence for nearly a year, I want to ask the Senator what assurance he has that it will bring us any report before the rate has been raised?

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator has this provision in mind he will observe that it has a vast field for investigation. The question suggested by the pending resolution was only presented to the Senate on April 20. Now, this matter can be presented by those who are interested in it to the committee, and have a report upon it. That is one way to get at it.

Mr. REED. Can the Senator tell us when the joint committee held its last meeting?

Mr. POMERENE. I have the same knowledge on the subject which the Senator from Missouri has—I do not know.

Mr. REED. I thought that was about the state of mind the Senator was in; in other words, like myself, he knows nothing about what the committee is doing.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is a member of that committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I could not hear very clearly the statement of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], but I hope he did not in any way disparage the joint committee.

Mr. REED. In substance I stated, since the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] had said that he had about the same knowledge that I had on the subject, that I suspected that was the fact; and that being the fact, neither he nor I knew anything about what the committee was doing.

Mr. POMERENE. On that one particular subject. I do not claim to have the same knowledge which the Senator from Missouri has on many subjects.

Mr. REED. I understand that fully; and I am not excepting to the qualification which the Senator makes. I accept it in the very spirit in which it is intended; but on this particular matter we are entirely ignorant; and I ask the Senator from Iowa, with the permission of the Senator who has the floor——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I ask the Senator from Iowa if he can tell us how long it has been since this joint committee has had a meeting?

Mr. CUMMINS. The joint committee ceased to hold meetings when this session of Congress began, and I hope it will never hold a meeting during the sitting of Congress. It is simply absurd to expect Members of Congress, constituting a committee, to carry on an investigation of the character prescribed by the resolution while Congress is in session and the presence of Members is absolutely demanded upon the floor. I do not believe that any criticism can justly be made upon the action of the committee in that respect.

I have no authority to speak for the committee; I am only an humble member of it; but I desire to say that the subjects submitted to it for investigation would, in my opinion, require six months of continuous and uninterrupted work. It is required to investigate the entire system of regulating railways, common carriers; to inquire into the operation of the present law; to determine whether or not we ought to have a Federal incorporation law, under which all railways shall be organized. Furthermore, we are required to investigate the subject of Government ownership of railroads, and to determine and to report upon the propriety of the United States acquiring the railroads and the other public utilities of the country. I hope that Members of Congress will not become impatient with regard to that committee, for if it does its work in a way that will entitle it to any confidence whatsoever it will require a long time to do it, and the report will not be before Congress for many months to come.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa if he does not think it would be utterly impracticable to refer this resolution to the joint committee?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would be a farce, so far as this resolution is concerned. With all due deference to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], I do not believe the subject matter is within the scope of the joint resolution known as joint resolution No. 60, unless it is within the intent of the Senator from Georgia to ask a report as to an amendment or a change in the interstate-commerce law. I understood the resolution of the Senator from Georgia to ask the committee to inquire whether the proposed increase in rates was justified and also the facts and circumstances that would justify the increase. If that be the meaning of the resolution, then it is not within the scope of the investigation of the joint committee.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will have to ask the Senator to wait. I am going to conclude if I get an opportunity. I want to say to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that that is apparently the scope of the resolution. The Senator from Georgia has suggested that the real object is to get the facts upon which the committee may base a recommendation for legislation, and to direct the commission not to permit these rates to go into effect until after investigation.

Mr. CUMMINS. We do not need any investigation in order to reach a conclusion on that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I agree with the Senator. I do not speak for other Senators, but I think the Senate has information sufficient upon which to make up its mind as to whether or not it wants to establish a general rule under which the Interstate Commerce Commission can not put increased rates into effect until after investigation. I am myself ready to vote on that proposition. I will agree to unanimous consent being given this morning to pass legislation of that character. That is what I think we really ought to do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator this question: How does the propriety strike the Senator of adding to the resolution the following?—

Resolved further, That the committee be requested to report a measure preventing the increase of freight rates until after full hearing the increases are found by the Interstate Commerce Commission to be just and reasonable.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That strikes me very favorably.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I propose to add that to the pending resolution and have the resolution referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee for action at once.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should be very glad, indeed, to have that done. I would vote without hesitation for the resolution with that provision in it. If a bill to that effect were introduced, however, we might get early action.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to have the views of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] on that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the United States is at war, and there are measures pending before the Senate absolutely essential to place this country in a proper condition of defense. The matters which are now being discussed are all very interesting, and there is not anything probably more interesting to the American people than the question of the amount that they are compelled to pay for transportation, but we shall not have any transportation, Mr. President, if this war becomes general and we have not an army and have not the laws necessary to protect us in that emergency. I do hope, therefore, and suggest as modestly as I may, that this discussion may be disposed of and that either the bill of which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has charge or one of the other bills with reference to increasing the Army may be taken up for discussion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, under the rules, I believe, until 2 o'clock we may proceed with this matter. I propose to add to the resolution:

Resolved further, That the committee be requested to report a measure preventing an increase of freight rates until after a full hearing the increases are found by the Interstate Commerce Commission to be just and reasonable.

I ask for a vote on that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to refer the resolution to the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have been impressed, as other Senators have been, with the thought that the Interstate Commerce Commission might permit the raising of freight rates at this time by 15 per cent. I can not believe, however, that that will be done. It seems to me that whatever may be the merits of the request of the railroads, this is a most unusual time to ask for such an increase. Railroads, as well as individuals, in the United States should be willing to bear their proper share of war burdens and the embarrassments which come as a result of war; but up to date, since the war occurred, the railroads have been benefited rather than injured by the war. Congress last August placed a burden upon the carriers, and a tacit agreement was made that this burden should be met by increased rates; but the 15 per cent asked is much in excess of the extra cost incurred by increased wages.

I agree with the Senator from Washington, however, that this will be—he did not use that term, but it occurs to me—that this will be a vain thing, so far as good results are concerned, and it may result in actual injury not only to shippers but to the country as well.

As has been stated, the Interstate Commerce Committee, through a subcommittee of five members, who are perhaps as active as any other five members on that committee, in conjunction with a like membership from the House, are engaged in the investigation of another matter of the greatest importance, and which received the attention of the joint committee until the duties of Congress compelled us to leave them or to postpone them for the time being. Those five members of the joint committee representing the Senate—and the same is true of the House members—are interested not only in the work of that committee but in the work of this Congress. I can not conceive of the possibility at this crucial time of getting a majority of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate together to consider seriously the questions which are involved in this resolution. I speak for myself. I know it to be impossible for me to take on any more work than I already have, and which has been placed upon me by the Congress.

The Interstate Commerce Commission should not be criticized too severely; its burdens are greater than it can successfully carry. Nothing should be done to discredit it. While I think mistakes have been made—and I have felt like saying so, and have said so—yet I believe that it is a great commission and that it is trying to do its work under the law. The law permits the commission to suspend the operation of proposed new rates without hearing, if need be, or with hearing if it so elects. I think I can, without betraying any confidence, say that the proposed increase of 15 per cent in rates is not going to be permitted without a full hearing, and that the commission is going to determine that question only after a full hearing. I can not, therefore, imagine anything which the Congress can do or which the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate can do at this time which would result in anything else but embarrassment to the situation. An attempt to forestall the action of the commission would seem to me like unwarranted interference.

If the discussion which has occurred on the floor of the Senate shall be taken cognizance of by the Interstate Commerce Commission, as indicating that the Senate, or at least many Members of the Senate, are not willing that this proposed increase shall be permitted without hearings, then this discussion shall not have been without some benefit; but for the Senate to delegate to the Interstate Commerce Committee a duty which they can not perform would be a vain thing. It can not perform it. In this I speak from experience on that committee. It has been difficult for us to get a quorum to do the ordinary business of the committee. A few members have attended, and attended with great regularity, and have tried to perform all the duties which have been assigned them, but many have been conspicuous only by their absence.

The joint committee, consisting of five members of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and five Members of the other body, have already started upon the investigation committed to them; they have been at it for weeks; their program is marked out, and the scope of its inquiry does cover, in my judgment, the very question which the Senator from Georgia has in mind, namely, whether we shall suggest to the Congress a proposition to change the interstate-commerce law.

The Senator from Georgia will remember that one of the things that was debated here when we created the joint committee was whether we should do that—whether we should make changes in the law affecting the operations of the Interstate Commerce Commission or not. That, I say, is one of the things that we are now considering.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will it interrupt the Senator for me to ask him a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I will be very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has the Senator a view, which he would be willing to express, as to the advisability of providing that the schedules calling for increases of rates filed by the railroads shall not go into effect until after full hearing and until after a determination that they are just and reasonable?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have always supported that proposition. I have contended that when it is proposed to make a general increase in rates, or when a proposition is submitted to that effect, that that change should not take effect until after full hearing. It seems to me also——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it embarrass the Senator's position if we should take up that single proposition and act upon it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think it would; but I want to suggest to the Senator from Georgia, with the situation as I have described it before the Interstate Commerce Committee, would it not be better to accede to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio and allow this resolution to go to the committee, and see if we can take it up—if the committee itself can do the work which the Senator proposes it shall do? Otherwise, I repeat, it would be a vain thing, and I think would embarrass rather than benefit the thing we all desire.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, following the suggestion of the member of the committee, I desire to add to the resolution the provision which I read a few moments ago, and which I think the Secretary has.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can modify his resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will then consent to send the entire resolution to the committee, and in the meantime I will see if I can not draft a short bill upon that subject. I think we ought to pass such a bill within the next 30 days, or before the 1st of June is reached. If the commission does not protect the public, we should do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is now closed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to consider the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether his motion is in effect a displacement of the unfinished business, which comes up at 2 o'clock?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not a displacement of the unfinished business. The unfinished business comes up at 2 o'clock.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course I will not object at the present time to the consideration of the matter, but I shall object to the displacement of the regular unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President. I think there are many Senators who want to listen to the Senator from Oregon when he opens the discussion on this subject, and I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Borah	Gore	New	Smith, S. C.
Brady	Gronna	Norris	Smoot
Brandegee	Hale	Overman	Sterling
Chamberlain	Husting	Owen	Stone
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Sutherland
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Poindexter	Swanson

Fernald	Kenyon	Shafroth	Vardaman
Fletcher	King	Sheppard	Wadsworth
France	La Follette	Smith, Ariz.	Warren
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Smith, Ga.

Mr. THOMPSON. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] on account of official business. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained on official business.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan]. He has a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. NEW. I desire to announce the absence from the city, on public business, of my colleague [Mr. WATSON]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] is absent for the day because of important business.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. LANE] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Fifty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time, PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE—FOOD PRODUCTS.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, since the Senator has been interrupted, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the hour of 2 o'clock arrives that will be done.

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought the hour of 2 o'clock had arrived, and since the Senator had been interrupted I did not desire to interrupt him again a minute later. It is 2 o'clock by that clock, anyway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Army bill is very much more important than that bill right now, and I ask unanimous consent that it be temporarily laid aside in order that we may proceed with the Army bill.

Mr. THOMAS. If this request is made next Monday I shall not object to it, but the pending bill contains a chapter, Chapter VII, which we were just about to reach, covering a subject that is of as much importance as any other subject which can possibly be a war measure. I shall therefore object to laying aside the unfinished business to-day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that notwithstanding the objection the Army bill be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1871.

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Borah	Hitchcock	New	Smith, S. C.
Brady	Husting	Norris	Smoot
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Sterling

Gallinger	La Follette	Shafroth	Walsh
Gronna	Lodge	Sheppard	Warren
Hale	McCumber	Shields	Weeks
Harding	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.	Williams

Mr. OVERMAN. My colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] has been called from the city on important business.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am certainly actuated by no desire to unduly postpone the consideration of the Army bill. I think I can say with perfect truth that I am as anxious to have it considered as any one within the hearing of my voice. If the statement which has been in part made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs required for its conclusion the displacement of the unfinished business, I should make no objection; but, of course, it is not necessary since his statement can be continued quite as well under the rules of the Senate under one pending bill as another. As I stated when I made the objection to the displacement of the unfinished business, I would not interpose if the request were made for next week, as early next week as the Senator might say.

Mr. President, we have at present under discussion one of the most important bills that can possibly receive our consideration at this extra session of Congress. It is one which in some respects is more exigent than any other bill now or hereafter to be placed upon the calendar.

We are just about to reach and consider what I believe to be the vital chapter of the bill. I refer to Chapter VII, which is designed to control exports in time of war. It is general, but its main purpose is to enable the administration to control the food supply of the country without which both combatants and noncombatants may be helpless at some critical period in the course of this war.

Mr. President, we all are painfully conscious of the tremendous pressure, of the demand upon our food supply. We are made conscious of it every time a grocery bill is contracted, every time a necessity of life is secured. Prices for the actual necessities of life are higher than they ever were in this country and they are still soaring, partly through the operation of natural causes, but largely through the fact that those who can do so are taking advantage of existing conditions to exact from the pockets of the people every possible cent of tribute that the necessities of life will bear.

Indeed, it was only yesterday when it was announced by the Secretary of Agriculture, or at least with his official sanction, that he deemed it necessary to come before the Congress and ask for legislation whereby the food products of the country could be commandeered for the common benefit, whereby prices may be regulated by law and enforced if necessary by the armed powers of the country—a scheme of legislation which we can not consider too soon.

Now, then, what is this chapter—and I shall occupy the attention of the Senate a very short time? It provides that—

> Whenever the United States is at war and the President shall find that the public safety or welfare shall so require, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export any article or articles from the United States, except at such time or times, and from such place or places, and under such regulations and orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

I am informed by the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], whose attention I request, that in the matter of exports we are to-day losing about 20,000,000 cans, which are containers of food products that are being exported from this country, in consequence of which we are face to face with a shortage of containers.

Here, Mr. President, is an exigency the mere statement of which is sufficient to arrest the attention of the country. Twenty million cans a day means 600,000,000 cans a month. We have no supply of the material for the construction of these containers since the war has placed its limitation upon that, and there is a shortage of tin and of the articles constructed from tin or of which tin forms an essential part.

Now, then, is it possible that the consideration of the Army bill, when we stop to reflect that the statutes now contain a number of laws upon the subject, some of them of recent origin, should set aside this tremendous, this vital, and this all-important subject?

Mr. President, let us at least dispose of Chapter VII and get it in proper shape for enactment before we take up anything else. It is for that reason, Mr. President, and for that reason only, that I am interposing this objection, in the hope that we may dispose of this chapter and at least get it in position so that next week the remainder of the bill may be postponed, if necessary, to the consideration of what the Senate may determine to be a more important subject.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, some days since I introduced a bill covering practically the same lines that are covered in Chapter VII. It is true that, in my judgment, it is the most important measure that will come before the Senate this session. This measure has to do with the food product of the country. While it is necessary to raise money by means of bonds to carry on the war, and it is necessary to raise and mobilize an army to carry on the war, yet the most important part is that we have food to feed the Army and to feed our own people and to feed the allies, whom we must feed in the coming conflict.

The canned goods packing houses of this country from Maine to California are, many of them, closed down for the want of tinplate to make the cans which they use to fill with the products now being grown and taken from the sea and field at this time.

I am opposed to displacing this bill. I want to discuss this particular chapter, and I want to do it now. There has been in almost every daily paper of the country for the past few weeks something bringing this matter to the attention of the people and of Congress, yet for the last four days we have been discussing sections of this bill, splitting hairs on the constitutionality of the proposed law as to whether we should protect or punish the newspapers for anything they might say derogatory to the Government.

Every Senator here knows that any man who has attempted to insult the flag or the American people or the American Nation has been dragged into the police court and sufficiently punished, and I suppose they will continue to be so treated until the war shall have ended. But here is something that has to do with the people of the country. This part of the bill has to do with the feeding of the people. If the plants that are shut down to-day were in position to get tinplate to make containers they would be producing 20,000,000 cans a day, sufficient to furnish one can for every family in the United States in time of peace.

Now, when we come to the war and have 500,000 soldiers it will be necessary to conserve all the food product which we have. Every banker in the country has brought this matter to the attention of his customers. It is familiar to every man who knows anything about the conservation of food products from Mr. Armour down to the smallest packer in the United States. Let me say that I heartily agree with the suggestions that it is a splendid thing to have little gardens in the cities around and it is possible, I suppose to furnish a small supply of foodstuffs for a few weeks in the summer, but nobody would contend that from these gardens we would be able to feed an army or supply the people of the country. The food must come from the sources from which it has been coming and that is from the farms; from those who do farming as a business.

I wish to quote from Mr. Armour, one of the largest packers in the United States, who was in the city last week, and who produces more than $500,000,000 worth of canned foods every year. The following dispatch from Chicago embraces his statement:

CHICAGO, April 12.

Unless immediate steps are taken for Government control of food, with one or two meatless days a week, the United States before the year is out, will be as short of provisions as any of the European nations. This is the warning voiced here by J. Ogden Armour, millionaire packer, and one of the biggest dealers in food in the world.

"Unless the United States wishes to walk deliberately into a catastrophe," he declared, "the best brains of the country under Government supervision must immediately devise means of increasing and conserving our food supply."

Armour advocated Government control of all provisions, including a Federal guaranty to the farmers of $1.50 a bushel for wheat, increased crops, meatless days, Government supervision of fertilizer prices to bring greater yields, strict economy in all households, and cultivation of every available acre.

"The food shortage," he said, "is world-wide. The European production is cut in half. Argentina has suffered droughts. The question of food supply is the most pressing and important before us. We have entered the war. Our first duty is to see that both our own people and our allies have food. Government control will bring objections from firms whose profits will be cut, but whose individuals must suffer to benefit the mass."

I think we can all agree that somebody, somewhere, somehow ought to have authority to retain in the Government the supplies needed to care for the food products.

I am going to take a few moments right now, Mr. President, because I have been waiting for a long time to discuss the provisions of this measure. If I may be permitted, I wish to state the real facts as they exist in the country to-day.

Mr. President, we are now in war, and have no time for consideration of theories. And I believe it to be my duty, as well as that of every patriotic citizen of this Republic, to render such service to our country as will enable it to carry on this war with least resistance, with greatest safety to our people, and with most positive assurance of a speedy and successful conclusion.

The time for speculation as to our policy as a Nation has passed. The time for criticism of our Army and Navy, our Congress, or our President has ceased; and now, a patriotic and united people, we should, individually and collectively, regardless of race, color, religious or political preferences, under the banner of freedom, strain every nerve, bend every effort, and with all the zeal and energy we possess help to maintain the honor and dignity of our country and preserve the inalienable rights for which our fathers fought and for which we, their sons, are ready to defend even at the cost of our lives.

In this great struggle each can do his part and must render service along lines for which he is best fitted. My life work has been along business lines—a conserver of foods—and, naturally, my attention is focused in this direction. As ex-president of the National Canners' Association, and up to the time of entering this body a member of the executive committee of that association, also a member of the committee of scientific research, I have been in touch with purveyors of food products in all parts of the country; and as early as January, anticipating a declaration of war, I began to acquaint myself with conditions that speedy and reliable information might be transmitted to Congress, and I believe the time has come when such information should be submitted.

There are three methods of preserving food in a large and general way, and only three. One is by cold storage, one by drying, and the other by the process of canning, or hermetically sealing. Each performs the function for which it was devised with great benefit to the people. The canning process, however, is much the larger, and any failure on the part of the canners to produce a medium-size or normal pack this present season would prove a great hardship and be most disastrous to the country. In fact, the canning industry is so extensive and has developed to such proportions that the best judges, or those who are in position to estimate, claim that 30 per cent in value of food consumed in this country is packed in tin cans; and on inquiry of three large wholsale grocers of New York, Chicago, and Boston the reply was that more than 40 per cent of their business was in canned food products.

From these statements you will gain reliable information as to the magnitude of the canning business. In fact, the output of our canneries in 1914, according to the census report, was 3,626,572,956 cans—figures so large that they startle our imagination and are almost beyond comprehension—and recent figures made up from information collected by the Department of Commerce show that in 1916 this was increased by over one-fourth; and in 1917, according to the estimates of the can makers, it will be increased by over one-half.

There are 12 tin-plate mills in this country whose combined output, according to the census of 1914, is 2,084,536,669 pounds, requiring 20,845,366 boxes of tin plate.

More than one-half of all the tin plate used in this country is used in manufacturing containers for food products. The export of tin plate last year was 5,200,000 boxes; of these 1,300,000 boxes were shipped to Canada. Large shipments of tin plate are made to Asia, used extensively in the oil business, and for many other purposes.

The export of tin plate has been constantly increasing, and in 1916 was nearly three times greater than in 1915, having increased from 179,000,000 pounds in 1915 to 516,000,000 pounds in 1916. The exports of tin, including tin cans and miscellaneous tinware have doubled in the last two years. The export of tin plate during the eight months ending February of this year amount to 319,000,000 pounds, and at this rate promise to equal, by the end of the current fiscal year, the exportations in 1916.

The imports of tin in bars, pigs, etc., for the eight months of the current fiscal year amounted to 83,000,000 pounds, and apparently for the full fiscal year will show a decrease as compared with 1916.

It is readily to be seen that the increase in export of tin plate and the decrease in import of pig tin causes a scarcity of tin containers which is of great seriousness at this time; and it is of vital importance that some relief be given immediately.

Tin plate has advanced from $3.50 to more than $7.50 per box within a few months—but you could not buy a pound of plate at this price at the present time—and cans of all sizes in the same proportion. I know of no can manufacturer who dares to contract for any considerable number of cans at any price this season.

The necessity for containers for food products is of as much importance as the product itself.

The annual convention of canned-food packers of the United States was held at Cleveland, Ohio, early in February. Representative packers from every, or nearly every, State in the Union were present, and although the gravity of the situation had not become so acute as at present there was a pessimistic feeling that shortage might occur, and packers were reluctant about accepting orders for future delivery even at advanced prices.

After the Cleveland convention the attention of the secretary of the association was called to the embargo which had been laid by the railroads on canners' supplies. This included seeds, tin plate, empty cans, and shipping boxes. Several times the office of the National Canners was informed that can factories were not running full capacity because of the inability to get tin plate. The trouble was first thought to be caused by the railroad embargo, and personal representations were made by the association to the American Railway Association. It was also taken up in a personal way with a number of the traffic managers of individual roads.

By the direction of the financial committee of the association the attention of Dr. Alsberg, Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, was called to this matter, and it was shown him that while the embargoes were serious, the lifting of these would but temporarily relieve the situation, for in the meantime it developed that there was an actual shortage of tin plate. Dr. Alsberg brought this to the attention of Secretary Houston, and he in turn to Secretary Redfield. The matter was taken up vigorously by a special committee consisting of Dr. Alsberg, representing the Department of Agriculture, and Dr. Pratt, representing the Department of Commerce. A letter was addresssed to the American Railway Association, signed by the two Secretaries, asking that the embargoes be lifted. At their request Chairman Willard, of the National Defense Committee, sent personal wires to the traffic managers of all the principal railroads of the United States, urging that canners' supplies be included in the preferential list, and to the credit of the railroads I want to say that their prompt response to this appeal was of great assistance, and as satisfactory as could be expected. A further or extended embargo on seeds at that time would have been so serious that its effect could not be estimated, and would have caused an advance in food products the coming season which would make them unattainable by those of moderate means and an expensive luxury for the wealthy.

The extent of the seed business may be better understood when I tell you that one county in my own State, the most northerly of the country, shipped 4,000 carloads in 1916, and will probably increase the shipments this season. These were sent to nearly every State in the Union. This raising of seed in some particular locality and shipping to other States is a very general practice, and it is of the greatest importance that no barriers should interfere with transportation. I am confident that seed for immediate use has been shipped, and that there will be no further trouble along these lines for the present, and for planting the 1917 crop.

After satisfactory arrangements had been made for transportation of seed the point was made that there was an actual shortage of tin plate. The two Secretaries called a meeting of the tin-plate manufacturers, which was held in Washington on Friday, March 23. This meeting was well attended, and practically represented the entire tin-plate industry. The tin-plate manufacturers nearly all stated that they were working their mills to full capacity, but that there had been an unusual demand for tin plate. Secretary Redfield, who presided over this meeting, requested Sir Richard Crawford, of the British Embassy, to come before the meeting, and the question of pig tin was discussed with him.

It should be borne in mind that all the pig tin which is used for the manufacture of tin plate comes from Singapore, or nearly all. These mines are controlled by the British Government, and the supply of tin allotted to each country in proportion to its supposed needs. Shipments of pig tin are made from the Straits to English ports and there reassigned to the different countries.

During the interview with a prominent English official now in this country it was stated that if a single shipment of pig tin was destroyed the tin-plate mills would have to shut down, at least for a time. This shows conclusively that there is no surplus of pig tin in this country.

The request was made that future shipments of pig tin be made by way of Pacific coast ports, and this matter is being investigated.

The two secretaries have addressed a letter to all manufacturers of tin plate, which is to be distributed among the employees, urging that in every possible way they speed up the output of the mills. A letter was also addressed to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy asking that when requisition for steel for the manufacture of ammunition and other war supplies was made that a request should accompany the same urging that the supply of steel needed for tin plate should not be interfered with, and there is no doubt but that this request will be observed.

In summing up the situation it seems that the only thing possible in order to conserve the interests of the canning industry is the temporary suspension of the use of tin plate for other purposes than that of making containers for food until a surplus is accumulated in the hands of can manufacturers.

To give a clearer idea of the importance of withholding exports of tin plate, a few figures concerning the tin industry and the use of tin in this country will not be at this time out of place. In the eight months from July, 1916, to February, 1917, inclusive, we imported into this country over 83,000,000 pounds of pig tin, valued at more than $31,000,000, as detailed in the following table:

Imports of tin in bars, pigs, etc., into the United States, by months, during the period from July, 1916, to February, 1917, inclusive.

[1]Estimated.

Already the Government and the canners are making an effort to conserve tin plate by reducing to a minimum the packing of all nonperishable foods. Of course, they will continue to pack a certain amount of this because of its convenience, but it shows the earnest manner in which this whole subject is being approached by the Government officials and the canning industry.

"In the multitude of counselors there is safety," so said King Solomon; and its truth is just as apparent to me to-day. I have endeavored to get information and advice from all reliable sources, and to make a somewhat exhaustive research, that I might present to you the exact conditions which exist.

The reports and figures submitted were rendered in times of peace. The great demand in times of war will, of course, immeasurably increase the need for containers; and prompt and imperative action must be taken. Our farms must be made to produce abundant food, not only to supply our own people, but to succor the famished millions of Europe. It were better for us to supply food for those who are fighting battles for democracy abroad than to send an army to multiply the horrors of blood-soaked battle fields. Our industrial establishments must be kept in operation; but it is of far greater importance that our food supply shall be maintained to an extent adequate to the needs of all our population. A shortage of food has proven the greatest danger to the countries of Europe in the present conflict, and unless quick and decisive action be taken the same conditions will prevail in our own country, to say nothing of the great increase in the cost of living.

The British food controller has ordered that, beginning April 15, in hotels, restaurants, boarding houses, and clubs, there shall be one meatless day weekly. They have also ordered that no potatoes shall be allowed except on meatless days and on Friday. The order imposes restrictions on the quantity of meat, sugar, and bread. Germany has long since restricted her citizens to the most meager and stinted allowance, and it is a matter of common knowledge that should there be anything but a full and complete harvest in Germany this season she would be obliged to surrender in despair, without the discharge of a single gun. The blockade of both England and Germany is for the purpose of starving the people into submission.

The lack of food in Belgium has been frightful, but perhaps the most painful and distressing experience that any people were ever subjected to was that of little Poland, where children were compelled to share the meat of mice and moles with the family cat until, overcome by the anguish of famine and starvation, they were relieved only by insanity or death. O cruelty unspeakable! A sunless, agonized country, where no child under 12 years of age has survived, and those of older years, whose lives have been spared, mutilated and crippled, mentally and morally robbed. The history of the world records no crimes so heart-rending and atrocious.

It is not expected that our country will approach such conditions of suffering and disaster; but that food supply may be ample, that our people may not entertain the possibility of distress, we should exert every effort and all the energy we possess to the one cause of success in this great conflict.

With righteous indignation for the insult and injury perpetrated by the German Government upon our people, let us act, and act promptly. Let us pass this bill now under consideration, which will, I am sure, give to the conserver of foods the assurance that he will secure sufficient containers for his products and stop immediately the advancing price of foods, which has been soaring for months, until now even the common necessities have almost passed beyond the reach of the people.

The prompt enactment of this bill will hold the tin-plate in our own country until a sufficient surplus is reserved to supply our needs. It will give renewed courage and assurance to the packer, and with this assurance the tiller of the soil, who can do more than armed forces to win this great battle for the rights of man, will on every hillside and in every valley and from the great plains of the fertile, mighty, and magnificent West garner a harvest so full and abundant that no single American shall suffer from hunger or want. And this Nation, thus provided for through the wisdom of her citizens, shall emerge triumphant from this titanic struggle and shall not perish from the earth.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to ask if Senate bill No. 2 is now the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That bill is the unfinished business at present, but the pending motion is a motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1871.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator from Oregon will allow me three minutes in which to discuss one matter in relation to the pending bill, I certainly shall not then object to its being displaced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is debatable.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, yesterday I offered an amendment to the bill which is now the unfinished business. That amendment was designed to protect the publishers of newspapers from the dire penalties provided in the proposed law against the publication of information, providing such information was obtained from proper sources. I wish to call attention to two or three remarks which were made at the time concerning the proposed amendment. Mr. President, my hearing is not very acute and I often fail to catch every word that is said in debate. Possibly that may sometimes be advantageous, or at least tend to the orderly decorum of the Senate, for there might be occasions on which, if it had been more acute at the time, I might overstep the proprieties of the Senate Chamber in debate and say things that I would not say after a more mature deliberation. I find the following in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD concerning my amendment. First, by the Senator from Missouri:

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator who is the author of this amendment if this is an attempt to provide for a legal censorship—if that is the real object—to provide a censorship that will give permission to newspapers to publish certain things?

In the light of the amendment which I offered I can hardly comprehend the meaning of that question. It has not the slightest relation in any respect whatever to the amendment which was proposed. Therefore, if I still fail to understand its meaning, I hope that I shall be pardoned.

Again, the Senator from Idaho said:

Mr. BORAH. The beauty of this amendment, to my mind, is that the censorship at this time is in Congress; that Congress is granting the permission to the President to give out information with reference to the forces of the United States, of which he is Commander in Chief.

I then stated:

Mr. President, allow me to state just what the amendment means.

* * * * * * *

We ought to find some relief for those who might publish facts which the President himself might see fit to give out.

Again, in discussing this matter, the Senator from Minnesota asked:

Mr. NELSON. Suppose the President, in the rules which he prescribes, should make an exception as to himself, what then?

And, again, there appears the following statement by the Senator from Pennsylvania:

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I only desire to answer the question that the Senator from North Dakota pressed upon the Senator from Minnesota in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota that the President might protect himself by excluding himself from the operation of these regulations. The Senator from North Dakota, as I understand, replied "but suppose he did not," having, I have no doubt, in mind the safety and protection of the President.

Mr. President, it never occurred to me that my attitude upon the many subjects in the Senate had been such as to justify my brother Senators in the assumption that I had traveled so far along the road of age that leads to final senility as to propose an amendment to protect the President from making a regulation against himself, and in failing, in the confusion which prevailed, to fully comprehend what some of these Senators were saying I think I paid them a compliment in assuming on my part that they had not traveled sufficiently far along that road as not to be able to comprehend the clear purposes and intendment of that simple amendment.

Now, Mr. President, I want to show how very apt and how proper was that amendment. In the first place, the amendment was not intended to refer, and did not refer, to any proclamation which the President might make or to any rules he might promulgate. We had adopted at that time a proposition which, if enacted into law, would make it a crime, punishable by death or by imprisonment for not less than 30 years, for any publisher to state the number of the Army at any point or any movement of the Army or the Navy. Now, Mr. President, let me read just what we propose to enact into law. I will eliminate all but the principal propositions. I read from section 3, on page 8:

(b) Whoever, in time of war, * * * shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, * * * any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, * * * shall be punished by death or by imprisonment for not less than 30 years.

That does not relate to a proclamation which the President may make. When that becomes a law, without reference to what rules the President may promulgate, any editor who inserts in the columns of his paper a statement as to the movements of the Army or the Navy or of our aircraft, or any other arm of our Military Establishment, if convicted, will be punished by death or imprisonment for 30 years.

I supposed that every Senator would understand that when that was enacted as a direct provision of law it was not dependent at all upon any proclamation of the President. It would be a crime to publish such information even though the President himself had given it out, and therefore there ought to be some provision that would relieve a publisher should he publish information which the President himself might give out. Therefore I offered the amendment as one which would be very appropriate and which would follow the line the President would be most likely to take. My amendment read:

Provided further, That the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, may from time to time give out for publication—such information concerning such operations, measures, and movements of the Army and Navy as may not, in his opinion, be incompatible with the interests of the country, and the publication of such information shall not be a violation of this section.

That means for publication in the press, of course—

Mr. President, I confess I fail to understand how any of the idle remarks I have quoted could be applicable to the proposition which was made at that time. I am aware that the provision of the bill uses the words "with the intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy." But every lawyer understands that every person is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his action, and therefore if in publishing a statement of the movement of our Army or of our Navy the enemy might naturally secure such information the one publishing the information would be guilty of the offense charged. I was therefore surprised, Mr. President, that the remarks which were made so appealed to the jocular nature of my friend from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] that he felt disposed to move to lay the amendment on the table without giving me any opportunity to explain it to those Senators who had not even listened to the reading of the amendment and who based their remarks upon a conclusion derived without any knowledge of the wording of the amendment or what it really was designed to accomplish.

I felt, Mr. President, in justice to myself, that I should give this explanation at this time, which I was cut off from giving by the motion to lay the amendment on the table, the only motion to lay an amendment on the table which has been offered to the bill. The amendment offered by me, I want to assert right now, is one of the most important amendments offered to the bill, and was designed solely for the protection of the press and the liberty of the publisher.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. OVERMAN. I had no intention of cutting the Senator off in the middle of his speech. I thought he had concluded.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. I repeat, I thought the Senator was through with his remarks, and, as some Senators were disposed to make light of the matter, therefore, without objection on the part of the Senator—for if he had wanted to discuss the amendment I would have withdrawn my motion—I moved to lay the amendment on the table. I had no idea, I repeat, of cutting him off; but, as the Senator knows, certain Senators were making fun of the matter, and I concluded that it would be well to make the motion I did.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not imagine how any Senator who listened to the amendment could fail to comprehend its importance and the purpose for which it was offered.

Mr. OVERMAN. I repeat, I had no thought whatever of cutting off the Senator, because I thought he had discussed the amendment at length and had concluded.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is an important amendment. It is important to-day. I am not going to press it at this time; but when we by law declare absolutely that the giving out of certain information by the press, without reference to any regulation by the President or the War Department, shall be a crime, there ought to be some provision that when the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy sees fit to give out information the press may publish it, whereas, as the bill now stands, the fact that the Commander in Chief gives out this information will not operate to excuse anyone who publishes it from prosecution under the provisions of this proposed law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, while the bill is still before the Senate I desire to submit two amendments, which I will offer at the proper time. I ask to have them printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I hope my motion will now be put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1871.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Hale	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Husting	New	Smoot
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Sterling
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Sutherland
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Swanson
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Thomas
Fernald	Kellogg	Pomerene	Thompson
Fletcher	Kenyon	Reed	Townsend
France	Kirby	Robinson	Trammell
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Shafroth	Vardaman
Gallinger	Lodge	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Gore	McCumber	Shields	Warren
Gronna	McKellar	Smith, Md.	Weeks

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having responded to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1871.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NEW (when Mr. WATSON'S name was called). I announce the absence from the city of my colleague [Mr. WATSON]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. If my colleague were present and free to vote, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BECKHAM. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is unavoidably detained on business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence on account of illness of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], but I understand that he would vote as I did. I am therefore relieved from the pair.

Mr. FALL. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]. In his absence I am unable to vote.

Mr. WEEKS. Has the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has not.

Mr. WEEKS. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is detained on official business.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 5, as follows:

YEAS—53.

Ashurst	Gore	Myers	Smith, Md.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to offer for printing—I should also like to have it printed in the RECORD and lie on the table—an amendment intended to be proposed as an additional section to the Army bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. JONES of Washington to the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, viz, add a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed during the present war to do everything by him deemed necessary to prevent, within the limits hereinafter specified, prostitution, fornication, or lewdness, and to suppress and prevent the keeping or setting up of houses of ill fame, brothels, or bawdy houses within 10 miles of any military camp, station, fort, post, cantonment, training or mobilization place, and any person, corporation, partnership, or association violating any order, rule, or regulation issued to carry out the object and purpose of this section shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table, and also be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SHIELDS to the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, viz:

On page 5, line 10, strike out the word "nineteen" and insert "twenty-one" in lieu thereof; and strike out the word "twenty-five," in line 11, page 5, and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty," so that the sentence contained in lines 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12 and 13, on page 5, amended, shall read:

"Such draft shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act."

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to submit the views of the minority on the pending bill, and ask that they be received and printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[Senate Rept. No. 22, pt. 2, 65th Cong., 1st sess.]

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following minority report:

The minority of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate disagree with the majority, in that the bill as reported does not provide for the calling out of volunteers under the volunteer-army act, which was passed by the Congress and approved April 25, 1914.

The minority very earnestly believe that there ought to be a provision calling for 500,000 volunteers at this time in connection with the proposed draft. They supported the amendment offered in the committee by Mr. MCKELLAR, providing as follows:

Amend by adding as a separate section, after the second division of the first section, and after line 20, on page 2 of the bill, the following:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to raise 500,000 volunteers under the provisions of 'An act to provide for the raising of the volunteer forces of the United States in times of actual or threatened war,' approved April 25, 1914, in so far as the same is not inconsistent with the terms of this act, and shall immediately call out and train 500,000 volunteers. Should that number not enlist in 90 days all deficiencies shall be secured by draft as herein provided."

The reasons actuating the minority are, among others, as follows:

1. One of the best military assets of the country consists of those men over 25 years of age who have seen service: (a) In the Regular Army; (b) in the Spanish-American War; (c) in the National Guard; (d) in the military colleges of the country; (e) those who have been trained in the various training camps heretofore provided by law. All of these classes of citizens would be excluded from the draft under the terms of this bill. We believe that we should not lose these military assets. We have spent much money in training them and we ought not throw them away.

2. Under the terms of the bill, without this amendment, the major portion of the additional army raised would be composed of boys who have not attained their majority. It is all right, no doubt, to use these boys in connection with maturer men in the Army, but to use these boys to the exclusion of older men and more experienced men, is, to our mind, a very dangerous policy in view of the fact that we have got to send these boys against trained German troops. There will be about a million of these boys subject to conscription who are not even old enough to make a contract under our laws.

3. The traditions and history of our people favor the volunteer system. We have had five wars. All of them were fought under the volunteer system and all of them we won. This Nation has never lost a war. The volunteer spirit is bred into the people. The men of the United States are willing to volunteer now and are anxious to volunteer now, and ought to be given an opportunity to do so rather than be conscripted into the service. The minority believes with the President that the conscription feature should go into this bill, but it does not believe it should exclude the enlistment of volunteers, and does believe the volunteer system first should be well tried out.

4. Secretary Baker testified that in the event of the passage of the bill without the volunteer feature, it would take until August to enumerate and equip the men fit for service under the terms of the bill, and it would be that time before we could begin to organize. We believe that now is the time to organize, and if a call for volunteers were made we would have men drilling and preparing themselves for service within 30 days.

5. We believe that men who volunteer their services are better fighters than those who are conscripted into the Army. England has more than 4,000,000 volunteers in the field to-day. She resorted to conscription only as a last resort to get more men. Had she done otherwise she would have been torn with internal disorder. Canada has never resorted to conscription. She has more than 400,000 volunteers, 300,000 of them being in Europe.

6. The organization of 500,000 volunteers under the terms of the amendment need not in the slightest degree interfere with the organization of the drafted army as proposed in the bill, and will not do so.

7. The proposition that if we call out 500,000 volunteers it would make our Army half volunteer and half conscript, and therefore undesirable, is without force, because we now have about 300,000 troops in the Regular Army and in the National Guard who are volunteers. It is not proposed by the staff bill to change these forces, and so our Army will be part volunteer and part conscript whether we had a provision for volunteers or not.

8. From our understanding of the testimony of Secretary Baker and Gen. Crowder it is evident that under the present law volunteers may be received in the National Guard and in the Regular Army to the extent, probably, of more than a half million men, still it was also evident from their testimony that if the conscript bill passes without amendment it is not intended or expected by the War Department that these volunteers will be actually enlisted. On the contrary, it is expected to fill up the Regular Army and the National Guard with the conscripted troops.

W. F. KIRBY.

I concur in the above to the extent of favoring an amendment providing for the simultaneous employment of both the volunteer and conscription methods of raising an emergency army.

In employing the method of conscription, however, I do not believe that 19-year-old boys should be taken. I think no men less than 21 years of age should be included. There are enough adults without taking boys against their will and without the consent of their parents.

G. M. HITCHCOCK.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN resumed and concluded his speech, which entire is as follows:

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter into any extensive discussion of the measure under consideration at this time. I hope I may be permitted to discuss the subject generally before the bill is finally disposed of; but there has been a great deal of misunderstanding as to the provisions of this measure, and, I think, a good deal of honest misrepresentation as to what it really contains. I have found a great many persons who have criticized it and have made statements as to the provisions of the bill who candidly admitted to me that they had not even read it, taking as a basis for a statement of fact some remark that has been made by some one who has never given the subject any consideration at all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Were any of the hearings on this bill taken down and printed?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will state to the Senator that there were practically no hearings on the bill, except that the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General came down, and I believe one member of the General Staff. There have been no general hearings on the bill.

Mr. BORAH. The difficulty has been, Mr. President, aside from those who are on the committee, to get information in regard to this bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true, if persons depended for information upon the hearings themselves, rather than upon the bill. I was referring now more particularly to the provisions of the bill and not to the reasons which influenced the committee.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the chairman of the committee that hearings were held during the winter before a subcommittee on the subject involved in this bill, as I understand.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On the subject of compulsory service, or universal service, extensive hearings were had during the winter by a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, and they are printed in a volume covering several hundred pages. The principles involved in that and the opposition which was urged against universal military training are practically the objections I have heard to this so-called draft bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. There has been some hearings in the House before a House committee, have there not?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There have been some in the House. I do not know how extensive they have been.

Mr. BORAH. I have seen those hearings, but as to the details of this particular measure I have not been able to get any hearings.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There have been none before the Senate committee. The Senator is correct. There were some brief hearings in the House.

Mr. President, it is my purpose to make only an analysis of the bill under consideration, and I beg that the Senate will not interrupt me while I make that statement, simply because I want to have it a consistent whole, and state, as briefly as may be, the provisions of the bill itself. In order that I may do correctly I have carefully prepared what I have to say on the subject.

In the provisions of the bill under discussion "to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States" to meet the present emergency, advantage is taken of the provisions of the national-defense act approved June 3, 1916, to continue discretion in the President to raise the additional organizations authorized in that act for the Regular Army and to draft into the military service of the United States, under the provisions of section 111 of that act, to serve during the period of the existing emergency, any and all members of the National Guard and of the National Guard Reserve, and to raise both forces to the maximum enlisted strength authorized by law. If these organizations are completed, namely, all remaining increments added to the Regular Army, and raised to war strength, we will have in the Regular Army 11,942 officers and 287,846 enlisted men, and in the National Guard 10,956 officers and 326,982 enlisted men, a total for both forces of 22,898 officers and 614,738 enlisted men, so that the provisions of this bill make no change as to the power of the President of the United States with reference to filling up the increments of the National Guard and the Regular Army. In case only one increment is added to the Regular Army it will consist of 8,648 officers and 203,401 enlisted men, as 25,900 men are added by each increment. To supplement this force it is proposed to raise by draft and to organize and equip an additional force of 500,000 enlisted men, or such part thereof as the President may at any time deem necessary, and it is proposed further to authorize the President, in his discretion, and at such time as he may determine, to raise and begin the training of an additional force of 500,000 men organized, officered, and equipped as provided for the first 500,000 raised by draft. It is further proposed to raise by draft, organize, officer, and equip in addition to and for each of the above forces such recruit training units as may be deemed necessary for the maintenance of such forces at maximum strength.

I may say, in reference to that, that in the Civil War many such recruiting regiment units were maintained in the several States to fill up the losses in the regiments that were in the field; and I think notably in the State of Wisconsin recruits were continually sent from the State, as the troops were lost in the field, to fill up the vacancies occasioned by the loss.

From the above outline it will be seen that if all the forces authorized are raised by the President we will have a total of 1,614,000 enlisted men in organized regiments, brigades, and so forth, and an additional force of approximately 500,000 men undergoing training in the recruit training units, as there would normally be organized for each regiment a recruit training battalion approximating in size one-third of the unit for which it is training recruits. The enlisted men required to raise and maintain the organizations of the Regular Army thus expanded and to complete and maintain organizations consisting of members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States at the maximum legal strength are to be raised by volunteer enlistment until the President decides that these forces can not be effectively raised and maintained except by selective draft. The other forces authorized in the act are to be raised and maintained by selective draft exclusively. So it would appear from this that the President has the power to organize the largest volunteer army that was ever raised in this country for any purpose.

This draft is to be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens or male persons who have declared their intention to become citizens between the ages of 19 and 25 years, and is to take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of the act. The act requires that quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or the subdivisions of these political divisions, shall be determined in proportion to their population and that credit shall be given to any State, Territory, or District, or subdivisions thereof, for the number of men entering the military service of the United States under the provisions of the act from any such State, Territory, District, or subdivision, as members of any Federal force authorized in the act. It prescribes that those selected for service shall, from the date they are required by order of the President to enter upon such service, be subject to the laws and requirements governing the Regular Army, so far as such laws and requirements are applicable, and requires that those accepted shall be required to serve for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged.

Under the plan outlined above, compulsory service is an auxiliary method for enlarging and maintaining the Regular Army and National Guard in the service of the United States at the prescribed maximum strength, to be employed, in the discretion of the President, should volunteering fail to maintain such forces at the prescribed maximum strength. Under the system proposed, it is believed that all who desire to do so between the ages of 19 and 40 should have the opportunity of volunteering, and it is believed possible that the Regular Army and National Guard in the service of the United States will be raised to war strength by this system. To guard against the failure to obtain men under the volunteer system, however, and in order to insure that losses are promptly replaced by trained men, the recruiting battalions of these two forces are placed on the same basis, as the recruiting battalions of the other forces provided in the act; that is, they are filled exclusively by drafted men. From the above outline it will be seen that the proposed act applies to all forces the principle of compulsory service now contained in the national defense act in section 79.

It is manifest, I think, that when we are about to wage war with what is probably the strongest military power the world has yet seen, we can no longer rely in its entirety or mainly on the volunteer system. Now that we are engaged in war with one of the greatest military powers in the world, the adoption of the application of the principle of universal service becomes all the more imperative, as it is self-evident, that this Nation can make no headway unless we adopt a system in waging war which will enable us to utilize to the fullest possible extent our entire resources in men and material, as is the policy and practice of the nation with which we are now at war.

In making liable to draft only those between the ages of 19 and 25 we will make available for selection for service only approximately 6,000,000 out of our 21,000,000 men of military age. It is believed that of the 6,000,000 included between the above ages 3,500,000 will be able to pass the necessary physical examinations, and that we will get a total of approximately that number after all exemptions have been made. Of these 3,500,000 it will be seen that only a total of less than one-half are taken, and for that reason selective draft is used between these age limits. It will be understood that should our armies become seriously engaged the remaining 2,500,000 will have to be trained to supply losses, and, if that is not sufficient, men beyond the age of 25 will have to be called to service.

By taking men between the ages of 19 and 25 we are taking the very best material in the country for soldiers. Relatively few of these young men have contracted family ties, and for that reason there will be little expense to the Government in taking care of families of married soldiers. With only 400,000 soldiers taken the care of dependents has already cost Canada $30,000,000. Congress found it necessary to appropriate $6,000,000 for this purpose in the recent call of the militia for border service. No military efficiency is gained and the $30,000,000 is economic waste.

Young men of the age given have the highest possible recuperative power to recover from wounds and to resist the hardships and diseases incident to a campaign.

Mr. President, I will say right here that the records of the War Department disclose that the Civil War was fought by young men between the ages of 15 and 23. That is, the great majority of the men who were utilized in that service on both sides were between those ages.

The following total exemptions are made from the selective draft prescribed in the bill; and these exemptions, Mr. President, have followed practically the language of every statute that we have had in force on the subject since the foundation of the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator has stated what is a historical fact, that the Civil War was fought almost exclusively by young men between 21 and 23. Will the Senator tell me what age is provided for in the so-called selective draft?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Nineteen to twenty-five.

Mr. President, at the time the motion was made to make this bill the unfinished business I had reached the point in the analysis of the bill showing the total exemptions from the military service as provided for the bill; and I will take up the matter at that point.

The following total exemptions are made from the selected draft prescribed in the act. I stated then, and I will state again now, that these exemptions are practically the same exemptions that have been made in nearly every statute that has been in force since the Revolution:

The Vice President of the United States.

The officers—legislative, judicial, and executive—of the Government of the United States and of the several States and Territories.

All persons in the military and naval service of the United States.

Members of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing whose creed forbids its members to participate in war in any form, and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed of these religious organizations.

In addition to the total exemptions enumerated above, the President is authorized to exclude or discharge from the selective draft, and in drafting the National Guard into the military service of the United States, or to draft for partial military service only, persons of the following classes:

Customhouse clerks.

Persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mails.

Artificers and workmen employed in the armories and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate.

Mariners actually employed in the service of any citizen or merchant in the United States.

Persons engaged in industries found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or to the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interests during the emergency.

Persons in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support, which makes their exclusion or discharge advisable.

Those found to be physically and morally unfit.

It is provided in the act that no exemptions or exclusions shall continue when the cause therefor no longer exists. These exemptions, it is believed, are such as will meet the demands of the existing situation, and are such as can be granted readily, without partiality or favoritism of any kind. It should be noted that the President is given discretion in these cases to require the people enumerated to serve in the armies, or he can excuse them while they are engaged in the classes of work enumerated. There is only one exemption which might be a cause of disagreement—the exempting of those engaged in industries, including agriculture, necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the maintenance of national interests during the emergency. This is intended to apply to industries engaged in the supply of munitions and war material, including the raw material needed to supply such industries, as it would be manifestly bad policy to take skilled labor away from those industries at a time when we wish them to operate night and day, if possible.

It is proposed to obtain the new officers for these forces as follows: The vacancies in the Regular Army created or caused by the addition of increments, as authorized in the law, which can not be filled by promotion, may be filled by temporary appointment for the period of the emergency or until replaced by provisional appointments made under the provisions of section 23, national-defense act. Provision is also made that hereafter provisional appointments in the Regular Army made under section 23, national-defense act, may be terminated when it is determined, in the manner prescribed by the President, that the officer has not the suitability and fitness requisite for permanent appointment.

For the National Guard the officers will be taken with the organizations of which they now form part.

For the forces to be raised solely by draft the President is given discretion to appoint the necessary officers, line and staff, for such forces and for organizations created by combining organizations of the Regular Army with organizations of the other forces authorized in the act, by ordering members of the Officers' Reserve Corps to temporary duty in accordance with the provisions of section 32 of the national defense act approved June 3, 1916; by appointments from the Regular Army, from the Officers' Reserve Corps, from those duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903, from the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, from those who have been graduated from educational institutions at which military instruction is compulsory; from those who have had honorable service in the Regular Army, the National Guard, or the volunteer forces; from the country at large; and by assigning retired officers of the Regular Army to active duty with such forces with their rank on the retired list, giving them the full pay and allowances of their grade, or by the appointment of retired officers and enlisted men, active or retired, of the Regular Army as commissioned officers in such forces. Provision is further made that the organization of the drafted forces shall be like that of the corresponding organizations of the Regular Army. Officers with rank not above that of colonel are to be appointed by the President alone, and officers above that grade by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The Senate will see, from the class of persons from whom promotions may be made in the service, that it covers almost every branch of our citizens, and is not confined to the Regular Army. I have heard it suggested that promotions are made only from the Regular Army, but this covers nearly every class of citizens.

The foregoing is a general statement of what is proposed in the bill as a source from which we are to obtain officers. I think it is desirable to go more specifically into detail as to what I am advised the War Department is doing and has done to list men available for drilling and training a force of 500,000 men. Five hundred thousand soldiers in division units will require 18,538 officers. There have already been listed in the Officers' Reserve Corps some 8,000 officers, of whom nearly 6,000 are listed as company and battalion officers. The remaining 2,000 are listed for service in the staff corps and departments. In addition to officers now listed in the Officers' Reserve Corps, I am informed that examinations are being continually held in all departments at which additional officers are being qualified. In the Eastern Department a few days ago 400 applicants were undergoing examination, with 700 applicants still to be examined. This is typical of the other departments. There are listed under section 53 of the national-defense act 1,665 officers. The War Department has a first-class source of supply of officers in the enlisted men of the Regular Army. Every first sergeant of a company in the regular service should possess training and ability to be able to step at once into the responsibilities of a company commander. On March 3 the Secretary of War called upon commanding officers of regiments to recommend noncommissioned officers of their commands who were qualified for temporary commissions in the new forces to be created. I am informed that to date 7,376 noncommissioned officers have been reported as qualified. There are on file in the War Department hundreds of tenders of service. Many of these come from men who are too old or lack previous training, and therefore not qualified; but a hundred of these men have been listed to be commissioned now. The total number of prospective officers as outlined above is 17,141—not the number required to train the whole number of troops proposed to be raised. This does not take into consideration that 1,022 officers of the Regular Army on the detached officers' list or reserve officers from the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, of whom an appreciable per cent can be spared for the training of the new organizations, nor does it take into consideration all the graduates from educational institutions having military instruction or available men from the country at large qualified to be commissioned in the lowest grades. The recent decision of the Secretary of War to take in as second lieutenants in the Officers' Reserve Corps young men who have had no military training, provided the applicants are college graduates or seniors in college, or clearly well-educated men, and provided they have demonstrated their ability to handle men, will certainly bring to the colors thousands of available young men who after a few months' training will be able to take their part as junior officers in training the additional increments which will have to be called.

From this detailed statement it will be seen that we will be ready to start the training of the first increment of 500,000 men just as soon as the proposed registration is completed and these men drafted into the service. The places of noncommissioned officers going from the Regular Army or from the National Guard will be quickly filled by other men. After a few months this first draft should furnish all the additional junior officers necessary for the next increment, and so on with each successive increment. The national-defense act placed us upon certain ground in its provisions to provide the necessary officers for this first increment.

As volunteer recruiting for the Regular Service increases it will be necessary to add the increments provided by the national-defense act. This gradual increase in the Regular Service will provide the best possible school of training for young men who desire appointment as officers and noncommissioned officers.

The fact should not be lost sight of that the officers proposed to be used are of very limited experience, and it will require much training and intense application on their part and practical experience to bring them up to the standard required before they can be trusted to command troops in modern battle.

Already provision is being made in the War Department for an officers' training encampment, as the encampments are held for training enlisted men, so that the young men who have made application to be commissioned as lieutenants in the Reserve Corps will have an opportunity to perfect themselves in their duties if they are qualified to do so.

Section 4 deals with the subject of registration, leaving the rules to be prescribed by the President. It requires the registration of all persons liable to military service under the provisions of the act—i. e., those from 19 to 25 years of age. It prescribes that upon proclamation by the President, or other public notice given by him or by his direction, stating the time and place of such registration, it shall be the duty of every such person liable to military service under the provisions of the act to present himself for and submit to registration under its provisions. It provides that any person who shall fail or neglect to present himself for registration, or to submit thereto as provided in the act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall upon conviction in the proper district court of the United States be punished by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than one year, and shall thereupon be duly registered. The requirements of this section, it seems to me, are reasonable and its enactment absolutely essential for the purposes of the act. It is proposed in the regulations to be adopted to use the existing agencies of the Government to carry out the provisions of this section regarding registration.

In most cases there are established usages in each of the States which would carry out the provisions of the act; but in some cases they might not be best adapted to that purpose, and that was the reason for leaving some part of it to regulations.

By section 5 of the act the President is authorized to utilize the service of any and all departments and of any and all officers and agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia. The are required to perform such duty in the execution of the act as the President shall order or direct, and the officers and agents of the several States are given full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act by direction or request of the President. This section further provides that any persons charged with the duty of having authority to carry into effect any of the provisions of the act or the regulations made thereunder, who shall knowingly make or be a party to the making of any false or incorrect registration, physical examination, exemption, enlistment, enrollment, or muster, and any person who shall make or be a party to the making of any false statement or certificate as to fitness or liability of himself or any other person for service under the provision of the act or regulations made by the President thereunder, or otherwise evades or aids another to evade the requirements of this act or of said regulations, shall, if not subject to military law, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction by the proper district court of the United States be punished by imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than one year, or, if subject to military law, shall be tried by court-martial and suffer such punishment as the court-martial may direct. This section utilizes all existing machinery of the Federal and State Governments needed to execute this act, and provides a minimum penalty that should be visited on any person who evades or violates its provisions.

Section 6 prescribes that the qualifications for voluntary enlistment shall be the same as those prescribed herein for selective draft, and that such enlistments shall be for the period of the emergency unless sooner discharged. It further provides that all enlistments, including those in the Regular Army Reserve, which are in force on the date of the approval of the act and which would terminate during the emergency, shall continue in force during the emergency unless sooner discharged. It further provides that the President may discharge any or all enlisted men whose status with respect to dependents renders such discharge advisable, and authorizes him to employ on any active duty retired enlisted men of the Regular Army, either with their rank on the retired list or in higher enlisted grades. It is obvious that, as prescribed in this section, those who voluntarily enlist or who are drafted shall be held for the period of the emergency unless sooner discharged, and to hold all those already enlisted on the date of the approval of the act, whose terms of enlistment would terminate during the emergency until the emergency has passed. The proviso regarding the placing on active duty of retired enlisted men of the Regular Army is especially important, as there are many duties they can perform adequately and release other trained but younger men for more active duty.

Section 7 authorizes the President to appoint for the period of the existing emergency such general officers of appropriate grades as may be necessary for duty with brigades, divisions, and higher units into which the forces provided for in the act may be organized by the President, and also to appoint general officers of appropriate grade for the several Coast Artillery districts, six in all. It further provides that, in so far as such appointments may be made from any of the forces provided in the act, the appointees may be selected irrespective of the grades held by them in such forces. It provides that all vacancies in the Regular Army resulting from the appointment of its officers to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army shall be filled by temporary promotions and appointments in the manner prescribed for filling temporary vacancies by section 114 of the national-defense act approved June 3, 1916, which provides that officers appointed to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army under the provisions of this act shall not vacate their permanent commissions or be prejudiced in their relative lineal standing in the Regular Army. This section is necessary to get the officers of general grade for the command of organizations above that of the regiment—that is, brigade, division, army corps, and armies—as they are organized by the President.

Section 8 gives authority to the general officers commanding any division or higher tactical organization or territorial department to appoint from time to time military boards of not less than three nor more than five officers of the forces provided for in the act to examine into and report upon the capacity, qualifications, conduct, and efficiency of any commissioned officer within his command belonging to any of the forces provided for in the act other than the Regular Army. It provides that each member of such a board shall be superior in rank to the officer whose qualifications are to be inquired into, and if the report of the board be adverse to the continuance of any such officer, and it is approved by the President, such officer shall be discharged from the service, at the discretion of the President, with one month's pay and allowances. Such provision is absolutely essential for the elimination of unfit officers and is essential to the efficiency of the forces raised by this act, as they must necessarily be officered, especially in the junior grades, by men about whose character, ability, and professional attainments the President can know little at the time of their appointment.

Section 9 provides that all officers and enlisted men shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay and allowances and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army.

The whole act, Mr. President, is temporary in its nature and character, and is only to be effective during the emergency which calls it into existence. The last clause in the act provides that laws in conflict with it shall be suspended only during the time of the emergency.

Now, Mr. President, I think I have stated as succinctly as it is possible to do the purposes of the act.

Mr. THOMPSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. THOMPSON. Is there any provision in the bill by which volunteer companies already organized and ready for service, although having no military training with a regiment which may soon be in the same condition, can be taken into the service as a body in units?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Like the units outside of the National Guard that the State has now organized?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, sir.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is no such provision?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is not.

I ask in connection with what I have had to say that the report of the committee on the bill be printed as a part of my statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The report submitted by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN on the 19th instant is as follows:

[Senate report No. 22, 65th Cong., 1st sess.]

UNIVERSAL LIABILITY TO MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany Senate bill 1871.

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, having carefully considered the same, report thereon favorably with amendments and as so amended recommend that the bill do pass.

This measure, designed to provide large armed forces to meet effectually the present great national emergency, proceeds in recognition of the just principle of universal liability to national military service, and adopts, with modifications to suit our situation, that system which our own experience, as well as the experience of the world now in arms, has proved to be the only adequate and effectual one. While this measure establishes as a means of raising such forces the system of selective draft, it has left room for the operation of so much of the volunteer system as in our judgment is worthy of adoption. While it provides for the raising of additional forces in large number by selective draft exclusively, it also provides, through means of recruiting to war strength the existing establishments of the Regular Army and the National Guard, for absorbing a force of more than 600,000 volunteers. Thus, happily, the bill, while establishing and placing the national dependence upon the almost universally approved system of draft, at the same time accommodates itself to such volunteer spirit as exists and is available in the early days of war. Thus it is that the bill provides for a Volunteer Army larger than any Volunteer Army ever before raised by this Nation at any one time or as a result of any one piece of legislation. The adoption of this system necessarily excludes the volunteer method upon which this country, following tradition rather than reason, experience, counsel, and the lessons of its own history as well as of the other nations of the world, has too long relied.

The volunteer method has never proved adequate and effectual for national needs, and will prove far less so now. War as now conducted is of a hitherto unconceived magnitude. Now millions of men are demanded where formerly a few thousands only were required. We must no longer think in terms of divisions but in large groups of armies, each consisting of hundreds of thousands of men. In former times of national stress, far less perilous than this, the volunteer method has never furnished the men needed for the emergency. History shows that, much to our detriment, we have begun our wars with this inadequate and ineffectual method, and have brought them to a successful conclusion only by resort to a system based on proper principles. The volunteer method failed this Nation in the Revolution and it was only the material aid of France that gave us our independence. It failed us in the war of 1812 and had it not been for drastic draft laws and the diversion created by the Napoleonic War we could not have concluded even such peace as we did. It failed the Confederacy in the Civil War, and that government, to its advantage, was quicker to perceive that fact than our own. It likewise failed the Federal Government, and volunteering having practically ceased by the end of 1862, was succeeded in the following year by the first of the draft acts. It failed us in the Spanish-American War, for the force then called for was never obtained.

The volunteer method has no fundamental legal basis for its existence. The universal liability to render military service is based upon the fundamental concept of the relation of a freeman to the State. From the earliest times every freeman, in legal theory at least, has been under the necessity of rendering military service to the State. The volunteer method grew, not out of any legal principles, but was adopted doubtless as an expedient having no other basis, perhaps, than that the need of the State on ordinary occasion has heretofore required the service of far less than the numbers available. The mere frequency of resort to this method of raising forces, which in its origin had nothing to sustain it but convenience, has resulted in causing us in some degree to forget the fundamental fact that every citizen capable of bearing arms has the bounden duty to render military service to the State. And the same frequency of resort has established the tradition that the volunteer system is the only system of raising military forces compatible with the maintenance of liberty. On the contrary, it is incompatible with that right and duty of equal participation in the affairs and burdens of State which characterizes American political institutions. To render military service to the Nation is a higher duty than to contribute to its financial support. Fundamentally considered, therefore, military service is the highest duty of the citizen and is in no sense to be regarded as a voluntary offering.

Our experience with the volunteer system has revealed its deficiencies to all who will view it candidly. Shortly after the close of the Revolution and until the beginning of the Civil War the country looked almost exclusively to a system of militia and volunteers. The act of February 24, 1807, was the first, and may be regarded as the typical volunteer act, a principal feature of which was, as it has always been of that method, the provision that organizations tendering their voluntary service to the United States should continue to be commanded by officers holding commissions therein at the time of the tender. This method has, of course, received at all times commendation from the leading spirits who became its officers and were transferred as such into the national service, but never in the history of this country has it been tested in comparison with any other system. It has, of course, always drawn a meed of fulsome praise from those who through its operation have been able to throw upon others the burden of their duty and from those who for political advancement have sought to fawn upon the vanity of those who served under it. Its demerits, however, have always been obvious and recognized as such by every thorough student of political and military affairs.

This method, first fastened upon this country after its military destinies had ceased to be guided by Washington, has failed both first and last. Employed during the War of 1812, it never did result in an effective army and had, as heretofore mentioned, to be supplemented by drastic draft legislation, and for the 470,000 men raised in that war the system was distinguished for supplying twice as many officers as any proper system of military organization could have required.

Of this method thus early established, Gen. Upton well says (p. 91, Military Policy): "It was half a century later that we reaped the bitter fruits of this system at the Battle of Bull Run." That battle, the first of the war, though it should have contributed much, contributed nothing whatever to the decision, and this for the very reason which so unnecessarily prolonged that struggle, namely, the incompetence of those placed in command by the volunteer method. It is generally conceded that victorious and vanquished armies were about equally demoralized. The truth is the volunteer system and the State method of recruiting it, which seems to be a necessary concomitant of it, throughout the war proved such a failure to Union arms that it could but have been disastrous in the face of an enemy better prepared than were the Confederates or with a better system.

Both Governments recognized the inefficiency of their methods, and both applied a more or less efficient measure—the principle of universal liability to military service. The Confederate compulsory-service act of 1862 and the Union draft act of 1863, makeshifts as both were, were made more effectual by subsequent legislation toward the close of the war. Looking back, it can be said indisputably that had either army adopted an adequate and effectual draft system at the beginning of the war it could have crushed its adversary.

England has had a like experience. Like ourselves, in the same way and moved by the same forces, she had permitted that principle of government, which is fundamental with her as well as with us, to drop into practical obscurity so far as it affected her land forces. It is worthy to be remembered that England has never trusted the effectual maintenance of her first great line of defense, her navy, to such haphazard method alone and has never permitted her traditions in this regard to affect the efficiency of that branch of her defense. The influence of this British tradition in this regard has brought her to the verge of national disaster in this pending gigantic struggle, which involves her life, as, indeed, it may involve ours. Under the incubus of that tradition, as compelling there as here, she set about this war first by sacrificing, as under the emergency and the result of her system she must inevitably have done, her regular establishment. Shoved to the brink of calamity and after loss incalculable, she did what we and she have always belatedly done—turned away from the system which must inevitably bring such results in the face of an enemy who does not thus impede himself to a system based on dominant national principle. No effectual army was raised in Great Britain until the volunteer system was abandoned and compulsory service established in its stead. Such a service was first but less effectually established by the force of enlightened and apprehensive public opinion operating in the form of social compulsion evidenced by derision, ostracism, and abuse heaped upon those who were reluctant to respond. Finding this method ineffectual, Parliament, on May 25, 1916, passed the most sweeping compulsory-service act ever expressed in the English tongue, whereby every male British subject resident in Great Britain between the ages of 18 and 41 years was made a member of the regular forces for general military service as if he had been enlisted therein. The whole body of arms-bearing subjects thus constituted a grand reserve thus placed in national military service, out of which the Government selected at its will for active service with the colors such numbers as were deemed necessary to meet the national crisis. The British people are to-day, three years after the outbreak of the war, where they would have been at its outbreak had they been so well advised then as they are now. It would be folly for us at this late day, in the light of their experience, to begin where they began.

The volunteer system does not accord with the principles of our institutions. It is undemocratic. It shifts the burden of national defense from the many, where it rightfully belongs, to the shoulders of the few, whose condition in life or patriotism impels them first to offer themselves to accept the risks and hardships of war. The spirit of real democracy, which must lie at the basis of national defense, could not be better expressed than was done by the mother of two sons, who, in writing to urge that the system established by this bill be adopted, said:

"It is the only just, equitable, and democratic way; otherwise the flower of the country is sacrificed. We mothers with our sons want to defend this country, but we resent thus saving a lot of shirkers. This is the woman's point of view, but from the military standpoint it is also the most efficacious."

In a word, the volunteer system which this measure is designed to supersede is undemocratic, unreliable, extravagant, inefficient, and, above all, unsafe. The system established by this bill will have one other effect greatly to be desired in this Nation, consisting as it does of varied elements of all races and tongues. It would directly and very effectually tend to the unification of our people by common association in a common cause in furtherance of the principle that it is the duty, as it should be the desire, of all citizens of whatever race or origin to undergo all necessary sacrifice for the national good. It strikes down that opportunity, which the volunteer method deliberately induces, for the selfish and unpatriotic to remain at home in time of war and to profit out of the Nation's adversity at the expense of those whose patriotism has impelled them to perform a citizen's duty.

This is no time to tolerate uncertainty in the raising and the maintenance of the large numbers of men which the present emergency is likely to require nor uncertainty in the methods to be adopted for the establishment of an adequate efficient military service. The bill makes certain the raising and maintenance of the required forces with the utmost expedition. It establishes the principle that all arms-bearing citizens owe to the Nation the duty of defending it. It selects only those who by reason of their age and physical capacity are the best fitted to receive the training and withstand the actual hardship of a campaign, and who, happily, can be taken with least disturbance of normal economic and industrial conditions.

In closing this report upon the measure under consideration it seems appropriate to refer to what President Lincoln had to say upon the subject of the draft at a critical stage of the Civil War. No one would have the temerity to doubt either his patriotism, his democracy, or his great ability as a lawyer and as a statesman. While opposition to the enforcement of the draft law was at its height he prepared an address to the American people, which, though never issued, has been published from the original manuscript in his own handwriting by those who were most intimately acquainted with him and who could speak with authority. In that address, which is a fitting conclusion to this report, he said amongst other things:

"It is at all times proper that misunderstandings between the public and the public servant should be avoided; and this is far more important now than in times of peace and tranquillity. I therefore address you without searching for a precedent upon which to do so. Some of you are sincerely devoted to the republican institutions and territorial integrity of our country, and yet are opposed to what is called the draft or conscription.

"At the beginning of the war, and ever since, a variety of motives, pressing, some in one direction and some in the other, would be presented to the mind of each man physically fit for a soldier, upon the combined effect of which motives he would, or would not, voluntarily enter the service. Among these motives would be patriotism, political bias, ambition, personal courage, love of adventure, want of employment, and convenience, or the opposite of some of these. We already have, and have had, in the service, as appears, substantially all that can be obtained upon this voluntary weighing of motives. And yet we must somehow obtain more or relinquish the original object of the contest, together with all the blood and treasure already expended in the effort to secure it. To meet this necessity the law for the draft has been enacted. You who do not wish to be soldiers do not like this law. This is natural, nor does it imply want of patriotism. Nothing can be so just and necessary as to make us like it if it is disagreeable to us. We are prone, too, to find false arguments with which to excuse ourselves for opposing such disagreeable things. In this case, those who desire the rebellion to succeed, and others who seek reward in a different way, are very active in accommodating us with this class of arguments. * * *

"The republican institutions and territorial integrity of our country can not be maintained without the further raising and supporting of armies. There can be no army without men. Men can be had only voluntarily or involuntarily. We have ceased to obtain them voluntarily, and to obtain them involuntarily is the draft—the conscription. If you dispute this fact and declare that men can still be had voluntarily in sufficient numbers, prove the assertion by yourselves volunteering in such numbers, and I shall gladly give up the draft. Or if not a sufficient number, but any one of you will volunteer, he for his single self will escape all the horrors of the draft, and will thereby do only what each one of at least a million of his manly brethren have already done. Their toil and blood have been given as much for you as for themselves. Shall it all be lost rather than that you, too, will bear your part?

"I do not say that all who would avoid serving in the war are unpatriotic; but I do think every patriot should willingly take his chance under a law made with great care in order to secure entire fairness. This law was considered, discussed, modified, and amended by Congress at great length and with much labor, and was finally passed by both branches with a near approach to unanimity. At last, it may not be exactly such as any one man out of Congress, or even in Congress, would have made it. It has been said, and I believe truly, that the Constitution itself is not altogether such as any one of its framers would have preferred. It was the joint work of all, and certainly the better that it was so. * * *

"The principle of draft, which simply is involuntary or enforced service, is not new. It has been practiced in all ages of the world. It was well known to the framers of our Constitution as one of the modes of raising armies, at the time they placed in that instrument the provision that 'the Congress shall have power to raise and support armies.' It had been used just before in establishing our independence, and it was also used under the Constitution in 1812. Wherein is the peculiar hardship now? Shall we shrink from the necessary means to maintain our free government, which our grandfathers employed to establish it and our own fathers have already employed once to maintain it? Are we degenerate? Has the manhood of our race run out?

"Again, a law may be both constitutional and expedient, and yet may be administered in an unjust and unfair way. This law belongs to a class, which class is composed of those laws whose object is to distribute burdens or benefits on the principle of equality. No one of these laws can ever be practically administered with that exactness which can be conceived of in the mind. A tax law, the principle of which is that each owner shall pay in proportion to the value of his property, will be a dead letter if no one can be compelled to pay until it can be shown that every other one will pay in precisely the same proportion, according to value; nay, even it will be a dead letter if no one can be compelled to pay until it is certain that every other one will pay at all—even in unequal proportion. Again, the United States House of Representatives is constituted on the principle that each Member is sent by the same number of people that each other is sent by, and yet in practice no two of the whole number, much less the whole number, are ever sent by precisely the same number of constituents. The districts can not be made precisely equal in population at first, and if they could they would become unequal in a single day, and much more so in the 10 years which the districts, once made, are to continue. They can not be remodeled every day, nor, without too much expense and labor, even every year.

"This sort of difficulty applies in full force to the practical administration of the draft law. In fact, the difficulty is greater in the case of the draft law. First, it starts with all the inequality of the congressional districts; but these are based on entire population, while the draft is based upon those only who are fit for soldiers, and such may not bear the same proportion to the whole in one district that they do in another. Again, the facts must be ascertained and credit given for the unequal numbers of soldiers which have already gone from the several districts. In all these points errors will occur in spite of the utmost fidelity. The Government is bound to administer the law with such an approach to exactness as is usual in analogous cases, and as entire good faith and fidelity will reach. If so great departures as to be inconsistent with such good faith and fidelity, or great departures occurring in any way be pointed out, they shall be corrected, and any agent shown to have caused such departures intentionally shall be dismissed.

"With these views and on these principles I feel bound to tell you it is my purpose to see the draft law faithfully executed."

Mr. HUSTING. Before the Senator takes his seat may I ask him a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill how long it will be before the draft can be put in operation? How long after the enactment itself?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is right hard to answer that question. I am inclined to believe, and this is my own judgment, that it will take at least two months and possibly longer to put in motion the machinery which it will be necessary to put in motion to have the men enrolled. Of course, it will depend upon the rapidity with which the State authorities act. I believe that the States will do all in their power to assist in carrying out the purposes of the act so far as enrollment is concerned. It has been estimated by some competent to speak that if a request was made upon the governors of the States to-day, for instance, that on a certain day steps be taken to enroll the men the enrollment in the United States might be perfected in one day just as the population of the country votes in a day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Answering the question of the Senator from Wisconsin, my recollection is, and I ask the chairman if it is not correct, that Secretary Baker testified before our committee that it would be about the 1st of August before steps could be taken to organize an army under the pending bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In just a moment. I will say to the Senator that, now that my attention is called to it, I do recall the Secretary making some statement of that kind; I think it was August 1.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I simply want to state there should not be a misunderstanding on that point. I think neither the Secretary of War nor the Judge Advocate General of the Army stated that it would be August 1 before steps could be taken to organize an army. He did state that about August 1 the troops would be produced in the mobilization camps. Prior to that time many steps will be taken.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon, but certainly he is in error in that. I heard that statement.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would be glad to be corrected if I am in error.

Mr. REED. I asked a good many questions myself, and was very much interested in it. I am very confident the Secretary of War stated that the draft could not be made before the 1st of August, and I am very confident he said further that the Government would not be in a position to equip an army of 500,000 before the 1st of August. The Senator will recall that there was considerable inquiry in reference to the number of rifles on hand, the rapidity with which they could be made, and the Secretary stated that in order by the 1st of August to equip an army of 500,000 it would be necessary for us to accept, in lieu of Regular Army rifles, Springfield rifles, something like 300,000 rifles, which could be procured of a different kind and which, with slight modifications, could be made to use exactly the same ammunition, or ammunition interchangeable with the Regular Army Springfield rifle.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I should like to have an opportunity to make a statement when the Senator has finished.

Mr. REED. I wanted to make that statement, because I think the Senator is in error.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Unless the Senator from Mississippi desires to ask me a question pertinent to the comment made by the Senator from Missouri, I prefer not to yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I was just going to say that everything needful to be done in the organization of the Army to carry out the Senator's impression of what the Secretary said could be done without a gun. It might be the 1st of August before they could equip the Army with guns, but the Army could be organized and ready for drilling without a gun. In the organization of an army there are many things to do other than teaching the soldier the use of arms.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I wish to make myself perfectly clear and to make the impression which I received in the hearings held before the committee entirely clear. May I say that the impression I gathered upon that occasion has been verified in conversation with high officials in the War Department as late as this morning? My impression is, and I am quite positive I am correct, that immediately upon the passage of this bill, if it shall pass, the initial step will be taken to operate the draft. No suggestion was ever made that it would take two and a half months to inaugurate the steps to operate the draft. The steps will be inaugurated within 10 days, it is hoped, after the signature of the President to the bill.

Mr. HUSTING. May I ask the Senator from New York a question right there?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin for a question.

Mr. HUSTING. The question I propounded to the Senator from Oregon was for the purpose of ascertaining how long it would take to select a man and accept him. Can the Senator give me any information on that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am unable to give definite information as to the exact time taken for each step in the draft itself.

Mr. HUSTING. The first——

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I finish my sentence? The first step, of course, will be the registration in the smaller geographical units of the country. That has nothing to do with the drafting of the men. That is merely the registration of the men available under this law. That registration must be consolidated into larger geographical units and through the local channels finally reach the War Department and the computation made as to the quota which each locality or geographical unit will be called upon to furnish. When that quota is determined, then the local board, it is understood, which shall operate the draft itself will actually draft the men in their respective localities.

The testimony before us was to the effect that the original registration in the smallest geographical unit, the consolidation of all that registration, which amounts, in effect, to a military census of the country of the men between the ages of 19 and 25, up through the State authorities to the War Department, the fixing of the quota upon the various localities, the actual drafting of the men, including the operation of the exemption clauses of this act, will be accomplished by August 1, and the men actually drafted and put into camp, and there the War Department hopes and feels confident the entire equipment will be ready. So it is not quite accurate to say that the first step can not be taken until August 1. The first step can be commenced within two weeks after the passage of the act.

Mr. HUSTING. I understand the Senator to say, then, that the actual drafting of the men—that is, the collection of the men who are going to serve and the acceptance of men under the selective system where the man will actually be under the draft and count as one of the soldiers—will not be earlier than August 1.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not say "not earlier than August 1," because these things are subject to some modification. On or about August 1 is the best information the committee had, and I think the chairman of the committee will bear me out in the statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee two or three questions about the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from New York yield to me for one moment before he takes his seat?

Mr. GALLINGER. I thought the Senator from New York had concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. Before the Senator from New York takes his seat——

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire, with the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire, to ask the Senator from New York a question relating to what he said. Will the call for troops be by States, or will it be by townships or the smaller units over the State? In calling for troops, will the States be required to furnish so many, or will the townships or counties be called on? What will be the unit, in other words?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As I stated, the President makes the call.

Mr. OVERMAN. The call is made on the State, and the State calls on the unit?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is based on the population or, rather, on military age.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understood the Senator from New York to state that the unit will be the township.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The unit for registration is a matter of regulation to be fixed by the department. Surely the Senate could not very well attempt to legislate about all the minutiæ and details in the operation of the draft.

Mr. OVERMAN. I see that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I call attention, in answer to the question directed to me by the Senator from North Carolina, to the language on page 5, line 13, of the bill:

> Quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof available for military service as shown by the registration provided for herein.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I take it the Senator from New Hampshire wants to ask a question with regard to another phase of the bill than that under discussion.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is my purpose.

Mr. REED. I ask him to indulge me to make a statement in connection with the one just made by the Senator from New York before that subject matter is passed over.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I shall be very brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is unfortunate that the statements made before the Senate committee were not recorded and that we are now left to the uncertainties of human recollection. It is, however, very important to know how long it will be before troops drafted can be mobilized in camps and ready for training. That embraces getting the men and getting the equipment, and producing them both at a given point of mobilization.

Of course, it is true that the first steps to be taken in the draft will not be postponed until the 1st day of August. Indeed they need not be postponed more than a few hours beyond the signing of the bill by the President. But what is meant by the first step? Manifestly the President must issue his proclamation. Manifestly there must be allowed a reasonable notice of the day of registration. Manifestly there must be the organization of all the machinery of registration, which must be coextensive with the United States, and it must be sufficient to record something like from two to five million names. Just as plainly there must be a method worked out by which this registration which has taken place in small precincts shall be forwarded and consolidated and again forwarded and consolidated, until finally it reaches the War Department. Now, all of that necessarily must precede the drafting. After that has been done the regulations with reference to the manner of making the draft must be put into effect, and after that has been done there will come the selective process by which men are to be picked out who will be exempt from service and the calling in their stead of others.

I can not conceive of that vast machinery being organized and its purposes carried out unless there is a very considerable consumption of time. I do not believe, to begin with, that this bill will become a law until it has been debated in the two branches of Congress for some days of time.

I believe that we must count on the loss of some days. Then will come the notice. Therefore it seems to me that it will bring us very near the month of August when these men have been drafted and notified and given time to close up their business affairs and say good-bye to their families, and so forth, before they can be mobilized in any camp. I understood the Secretary of War to indicate the same view; I will not be positive; I could not assert it with positiveness, since the recollection of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is otherwise, and I know he is perfectly sincere in his statement.

Now, there is another thing that has to be considered——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I know I am taking some time, but I want this point cleared up. I will try to be brief, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator if I may take my seat for the time being, without losing the floor.

Mr. REED. I merely ask the Senator to allow me to conclude this statement. I did not mean to make it in his time, and I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Now, as to the question of equipment. The Secretary of War certainly did state to us very plainly that they did not have on hand at this time sufficient equipment so that they could take care of new units of the National Guard—that individuals desired to organize—and the department ruled at one time they would not receive them, but afterwards rescinded the order.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. I am very anxious to know just what the Secretary of War said on the subject of the time that will be required to complete the draft. Surely, if he said it would take until August 1, he must have made an allowance for a vast deal of time which would probably be consumed in unlimited debate.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Ohio is undertaking to go into training as a satirist. He has made several efforts of that kind recently. I am trying to state, within the limits of my power of expression, exactly what the Secretary of War said.

Mr. POMERENE. I assure the Senator I did not mean to be satirical at all; but I can not conceive how four months would be used in getting a draft for the number of soldiers required under this bill.

Mr. REED. Very well. I have been trying to state what I understood the Secretary of War to say. There is another consideration now that I desire to call attention to, and I was calling attention to it, that the Secretary of War did state that the reason why enlistments in the National Guard had been held up was because there was not at present sufficient equipment in the department to take care of the enlisted men as they would come in. He stated that some considerable part of that difficulty could be speedily overcome. Asked with reference to the rifles that were on hand, he stated that the only place where the Army rifle is made is in the Government arsenal, and that the total capacity to-day in the arsenal is a certain amount——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, perhaps the——

Mr. REED. Perhaps I ought not to state that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was going to say to the Senator there is much that might be said in this discussion that had better be said in executive session. I have a statement that will show the exact condition of all these things, but I do not think it ought to be made public. I make that suggestion to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I thank the chairman of the committee. It occurred to me as I was talking that possibly that might be information which ought not to be made public; but I think I may say to the Senate—and I will make it very general—as I understood the Secretary of War it would require until the 1st of August to procure certain necessary and essential equipment.

Mr. THOMAS. May I interrupt the Senator long enough to remind him that Mr. Roosevelt, in an interview, I think, published on the 16th of April, expressed the opinion that it would take, to use his almost identical language, many months, perhaps a year, to organize and discipline an army to be raised under a bill like this for field service?

I can give the Senator the exact language of the statement to which I have just referred. He said:

> Many months, probably at least a year or more, must elapse before the army thus raised would be available in Europe in the hard, aggressive fighting campaigns which it is honorably incumbent on us to undertake now that we have entered into the war.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the reason why I have sought to make this matter as plain as I can is because the question of time will become very material when we come to consider the conflict between the minority and majority reports that have been made by the committee, because if it will require this length of time to mobilize men in camp under the draft system, then it will be contended at least—and I do not intend to argue the point; I state it merely—that there is an abundance of time to permit a volunteer system to be tried out without delaying in any way the speedy organization of the Army.

I thank the Senator from New Hampshire for his great courtesy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall probably avail myself of the opportunity that will doubtless present itself in the early part of next week to make some observations on certain features of the bill. In the meantime I merely desire to ask the chairman two or three questions for my own information. I made inquiry as to whether or not the hearings had been printed and was told they had not. Had they been printed I presume I would have been able to have satisfied my mind on this point from reading the hearings. So I am compelled to ask the chairman certain questions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will state to the Senator that the Secretary of War and several officers of the Army also appeared before the House committee, and those hearings were taken down and are printed. The Senator can get a copy of those hearings I am sure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not know that.

Mr. President, the report has been given a headline, which I presume was done without consultation with the chairman. It is "Universal liability to military service." That does not appear in the bill, because if this was intended to be universal liability to military service it is a misnomer.

I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon why they have limited the ages of the men who are to be drafted between 19 and 25. Why stop at 25?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I mentioned that in the analysis of the bill I gave. Really that is the age, as stated in the statement, when men are not only most available but when it can be done with the least economic loss to the country, and we get a body of young men who are strong and rugged and healthy.

Mr. GALLINGER. A few days ago I took occasion to make some offhand remarks—in fact, I was trying myself out to see whether I could talk or not after my illness—and in those observations I made a suggestion that I thought we should rely upon the system which has heretofore been in vogue at the beginning of wars especially; that voluntary enlistments rather than the system of drafting men was preferable. My mail has been filled since then with letters from all over the country discussing this question, and I am glad to say that if I could bring those hundreds of letters into the Senate Chamber and submit them to Senators it would be seen that most of my correspondents agreed with the suggestion I made at that time. But there were several of my correspondents who took exception to the remarks I made and insisted that it was much fairer to draft people than to ask them to voluntarily enlist. The argument which was used was that the slackers would escape, whatever that term means, and I presume we all can apply a meaning to it; that under the system of voluntary enlistments the men whom they denominate as slackers would not enlist, while the boys, many of them in families where perhaps a widowed mother had but one, moved by patriotism, would offer their service to the Government.

Mr. President, I think I know what slackers are. If the Senator will walk from the Peace Monument to Seventh Street on Pennsylvania Avenue he will see a great many of them, and if he will go into the East Side of New York or the Bowery of New York or North Street in Boston he will find the slackers there.

But almost all of them are over 25. Almost every one of them whom you meet is over 25. So this system of selective conscription stopping at the age of 25 is going to catch the boys, but it is not going to catch the slackers, and I confess that I do not think it is wise legislation to make 25 the maximum age. However, the committee have considered it, and I presume they are satisfied that the matter is right. For myself, I should like to vote, if we are to have conscription, to place the maximum at least at 35.

If I have read the bill correctly, the voluntary enlistment ages are fixed at from 18 to 40. Now, I will ask the Senator why that distinction? Why do you take men who volunteer to enlist at the age of 40 and refuse to conscript those above the age of 25? What is the philosophy of it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We make the National Guard and the Regular Army uniform with reference to enlistments in the Army. That is the age of volunteer enlistments in the Regular Army.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand; but it could be changed, of course. It could be put at 35 if Congress saw fit to do it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course. I will state to the Senator that Congress can change this in any way.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. And probably will change it. That was the best judgment of the majority of the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought the Senator had concluded

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I had not quite finished.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I quite agree with the Senator's view; but would it not be a good idea, for instance, to take the single men up to 45?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so; up to the military age. Another thing, Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator? Perhaps I did not make myself plain. The period of enlistment in the Regular Army is 18 to 35 and in the National Guard 18 to 45. The period from 18 to 40 was established as a mean between both the other branches of the service.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think the Senator is not quite accurate in regard to the National Guard. In the National Guard it is from 18 to 45, and in the Regular Army up to 35. This bill is merely a compromise between the two ages and fixes the maximum age at 40.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is right.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does, so far as enlisted men are concerned.

Mr. McKELLAR. Only so far as volunteers are concerned.

Mr. GALLINGER. But as far as conscripted men are concerned it is very much less.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is 18 to 25.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I suggested the other day, Canada, with a population of 8,000,000 people, has raised an army of 400,000 men by enlistment. Three hundred and fifty thousand of them are at the front to-day, and 50,000 of them will probably pass over our territory in the near future to take their places in the trenches in Europe. I will ask the Senator from Oregon if he has any knowledge as to the approximate age of those enlisted men in Canada. I have not, but perhaps the Senator has looked it up?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have not the approximate age, I will say. I think most of them are young men under 35, but I have no information as to the ages.

Mr. GALLINGER. I asked that question for the purpose of eliciting information on another point. The Senator from Oregon did not state what I am now going to say, that Canada is paying her soldiers $1.10 a day, while we are paying the munificent compensation of $15 a month to the ordinary soldier. But the Senator did correctly state that Canada had raised a fund of $30,000,000 to take care of the families of those soldiers, their wives, and children, and dependents. The Senator suggested that we probably would not need approximately as large a fund here because most of those men would not be married; but I know of no reason why they may not be, though perhaps there would not be as large a proportion of married men as those in Canada. I chance to know that the Canadian troops are largely young men, but Canada takes very liberal care, not only of the wives and children but the dependents of those who go to the war; and I think we will be constrained to do the same thing here.

Will the Senator from Oregon tell me whether or not the committee took into consideration the propriety of increasing the compensation to our soldiers?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that we applied to the War Department for information upon that subject. I have it here, but I have not had an opportunity to read it yet.

The Senator will remember that when the national defense act was up for consideration a year ago I insisted, but the Senate was against me, that married men ought not to be permitted to enlist until it became absolutely necessary; in other words, that they might be permitted to get out of the service where they had families or where they had dependents, but the Senate saw fit to amend that bill by putting in it a clause appropriating money for the dependents. I still think it was a mistake. This bill provides for an exemption of all those men. I do not think men with dependent families, or those who have dependents, ought to be called into the service until it becomes necessary.

Mr. FLETCHER. Bearing on the question of the age of enlistment, I have an article published in the Survey, entitled "Recruiting and the man-power inventory," in which there is a statement that may be of interest to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall be glad to have the Senator put it into the RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. The article states that—

> Mr. Bennett was in France in 1915 and made a study of military needs. "The experience at the front all goes to show," he says, "that men from 18 to 30 are the best type to stand up under the strain upon infantry in modern warfare. From 30 to 35 there is a marked increase in wastage by disease and breakdown and corresponding loss in efficiency. From 35 to 40 the increase is 100 per cent. The human system is so constituted that it is best adapted to resist the strain of trench fighting at the younger period. Unless the fighting men are fed and kept in prime condition, we might better never send them across the seas."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have served the purpose I had in view in asking the chairman of the committee the questions which I have; but before I take my seat I want to emphasize the view that I hold in reference to the amount of pay that we should give to our soldiers. The little Dominion of Canada has seen fit to pay her soldiers $1.10 a day; Australia pays $1.25 a day. The result has been that there has been no trouble in getting the very best soldiers that the world has ever seen from Canada and Australia, not by conscription but by voluntary enlistment. While I have an open mind to-day as to the better method, my mind running rather to that of fair effort to secure soldiers by voluntary enlistment, giving them adequate pay and taking care of their families, I want especially to call attention to the fact that Canada and Australia have furnished the flower of the British Army in that great struggle in Europe.

Those soldiers have been at the forefront in every battle; they have distinguished themselves on every field of conflict; and they have been volunteers. When Senators say, and when the newspapers insultingly refer to those of us who do not follow unquestioning certain lines that have been mapped out for us and say that we are not acting in the interests of the Government, I want to put on record the fact that those possessions of Great Britain have probably saved the cause to the allies. The Australian soldiers and the Canadian soldiers have done that. They have been secured, not by conscription but by voluntary enlistment, for the reason that Canada and Australia have seen fit to offer inducements to every soldier that caused the young men to enlist, knowing, as they did, that they would be given sufficient money perhaps to send back to their dependents and that the governments of those colonies would take care of those who were dependent upon them while they were at the front fighting the battles of the country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator will readily concede the same high grade of service and manhood to the volunteers of South Africa and New Zealand.

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely; to New Zealand, and, to a certain extent, to those who have entered the service even from India. They have been splendid soldiers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call the Senator's attention also to the fact that in England over 4,000,000 have enlisted in this war; that most of them are fighting in this war; and they are the very best soldiers in the world to-day. They were enlisted under the volunteer system of England.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is very true. Again, Mr. President, as I said in the beginning——

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I am ready to indorse everything which the Senator says about the efficiency of volunteer troops, especially the Canadians; but there is not quite the difference in pay which might be thought to be the case. The pay of the Canadian soldier, the Senator says, is a dollar a day.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is $1.10.

Mr. WARREN. One dollar a day base pay, and the 10 cents is a separate addition; but the American soldier gets 20 per cent added if he serves outside of the United States, which more than compensates for the 10 cents additional paid to the Canadian soldier. Then there are various grades or rates of pay. As soon as a soldier qualifies as a sharpshooter he receives $3 per month additional, and there are various other additions. The question of pay has been referred to the department with the request that we may be informed of what each grade should get, basing the initial pay upon $20, $25, or $30 a month, in order that we may have the equitable proportion. We desire to get this pay matter in shape so as to consider it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am very glad the committee has taken the pains to make that inquiry; but the fact remains that when we raise this great army—if we succeed in raising it—either by conscription or by voluntary enlistment, the bulk of the soldiers will commence their service, unless we legislative otherwise in the meantime, at the paltry sum of $15 a month. Considering all the conditions that surround the world at the present moment in reference to the horrible war that is prevailing in Europe, if we undertake to send our soldiers across the Atlantic Ocean to enter the trenches and to help fight the battles of the allies at $15 a month, I do not know what the American people will say about it; but I am very thoroughly persuaded in my own mind that the American people will resent it in such a way that even the Senate of the United States will understand clearly their attitude on that question.

Mr. President, I have stated that before the bill is concluded I may take a very brief time to discuss certain other features of it; but to-day I simply wanted to get a little information for my own guidance in this matter. Having elicited that information, I will not now detain the Senate further. Unless some other Senator moves to increase the age above 25, I shall probably offer an amendment myself, so as to take the sense of the Senate on that question.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was going to suggest that probably the orderly way to proceed with this bill would be to have the bill read. It is a short bill, and I will request that it be read.

Mr. WARREN. Let the bill be read in full, Mr. President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted to ask the Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the committee, or any other Senator, if he has not the information, if it is known what was the average age of the soldiers of the Union Army in the Civil War?

Mr. GALLINGER. It was 23 years.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I had the figures and have had them printed in the RECORD.

Mr. NELSON. I have the figures here, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Minnesota says he has the figures as to the ages of those soldiers.

Mr. NELSON. I have the figures here, and with the permission of the Senator from Connecticut I will read them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall be very glad to have that done.

Mr. NELSON. They are in regard to the age at enlistment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of volunteers?

Mr. NELSON. Of volunteers during the Civil War. There were 25 who were only 10 years old—they were drummer boys; there were 38 who were 11 years old; there were 225 who were 12 years old; there were 300 who were 13 years old; there were 1,523 who were 14 years old; there were 104,987 who were 15 years old; there were 231,051 who were 16 years old; there were 844,981 who were 17 years old; there were 1,158,438 who were 18 years old. Then, of those of 22 years of age, there were 618,511; of 25 years of age there were 46,626; of 44 years of age there were 16,071.

Over half of the Army which we had during the Civil War consisted of boys of 18 years of age. The feature of the bill to which I object is fixing the age limit at 19 years instead of 18 years. Boys 18 years of age make first-class soldiers. The boys of that age were the backbone of our volunteer army during the Civil War. I see no reason why we should not reduce the age limit in this bill to the level of 18 years instead of 19 years.

If the Senator from Oregon will allow me while I am on my feet, I wish to say that I entirely agree with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], that we ought to extend the limit up to 35 years. I remember very well in the company in which I served during the Civil War most of the boys were under 20 years of age. The oldest man we had in the company was an old Englishman, who was 35 years old—only 35—and yet he was so much older than the rest of us that we called him "Old Dad." But he was as good and as efficient a soldier as were the boys of 18, 19, and 20 years of age. I see no reason why we should not go up to that limit, Mr. President.

More than that, as the Senator from New Hampshire has suggested, there is a good reason why we should do so. The slackers—and they will be found among a certain class of our population whom I do not care now to refer to by name—these slackers will be found among those classes and they will not be amongst the men between 19 and 25 years of age, but they will be in the class of men between 30 and 40 years of age.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. NELSON. The boys between the ages of 19 and 20 have a little of the old American spirit in them, and they are likely to volunteer; but that is not the case with the old fellows. I now yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I merely want to call the attention of the Senator to what I think was the motive of the department in suggesting the ages from 19 to 25. There are 6,000,000 young men available at from 19 to 25, and even one-half of that number will be more than we shall need. So there will be large exemptions anyway; and the limit was raised so as to avoid, so far as possible, calling the younger men unless it became absolutely necessary.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut will allow me further——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to hear the Senator, and I hope he will proceed.

Mr. NELSON. There is another singular impression which seems to prevail, which is that we will have no Army until the draft is made. As I understand, this plan contemplates the filling of our Regular Army by voluntary enlistment up to 240,000 men. I will inquire of the chairman of the committee if I am not correct?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. To nearly 300,000.

Mr. NELSON. Those voluntary enlistments will go on constantly, and the men thus enlisted and incorporated in the ranks of the Regular Army will become efficient soldiers in a very short time as they mingle with the old companies and regiments. In that way, it seems to me, we can readily and in a very short time have a very good and efficient Army of 300,000 regulars if we can succeed in filling the ranks by volunteers.

Now, as to the National Guard, we are handicapped because enlistments must, in the first place, be by the State authorities; but they can proceed to enlist volunteers. We can not draft, as I understand, and the bill does not propose to draft men into the National Guard. The National Guard is primarily a State organization.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The bill specifically provides that if the National Guard is not raised to the maximum war strength by the volunteer system the President shall draft men into it to bring it to war strength.

Mr. NELSON. He can only do that after the organizations have been mustered into the United States service. The skeleton of the State organizations must first exist, because the officers of the National Guard must be appointed by the governors of the States and not by the President. There is room for 300,000 men in the National Guard. Practically, therefore, there is an opening, if I understand the bill correctly, for volunteer enlistments to the number, say, of about 150,000 to fill up the Regular Army and for some 200,000 to 300,000 to fill up the National Guard. So that there is a field, if we can get the volunteers, for upward of 500,000 men by voluntary enlistment. Those enlistments will be going on constantly while we are preparing for the selective draft.

Mr. President, the proposed selective draft has no terrors for me. It is perfectly simple. First, there will be made a census of the men of military age in the different localities and places where it is proposed to institute the draft. In the Northern States we have township governments, while in most parts of the South they have nothing smaller than county governments; but say, for instance, one of our northern rural townships has 50 men of military age prescribed by this bill. Those are the men subject to the draft, and their names are put into a box. The quota of the town, we will say, is 5 men, and the 5 men are drawn by lot out of those 50 men. Where there is no township government, as is the case in most of the Southern States, the selections will be made probably by counties or by election precincts; but, in any case, that is the way to operate.

All this will take time, as the Senator from New York has well said, it first being necessary to take a military census, and then, after that census has been completed, to apportion the quota under that census to the different States, to the counties, and to the precincts, if it is extended down that far. Then, after that census and apportionment have been made, the drawing takes place. It is a drawing by lot. That was practically the method pursued during the Civil War, although I think in some instances it was left to the States to apportion the quota of the counties of the State among the different townships or election precincts. I am not sure as to that, but I have that impression. However, that makes no difference, although it is better, perhaps, that it be done by the Federal Government.

I desire now to call attention to another fact. The volunteers who enlist to fill up the National Guard and the Regular Army will come into the service under tried and educated officers, especially in the Regular Army. One of the vices of the old volunteer system, as it was in vogue during the days of the Civil War, was that the officers—colonels, majors, lieutenant colonels, captains, and lieutenants—were oftentimes appointed because of their political affiliations and their political standing and influence with the governor who had the appointment. The customary method was for some ambitious man to go to the governor and say, "If you will appoint me colonel, I will try to recruit a regiment." Then he would endeavor to associate a man with him to whom he would say, "If you will help me, I will try to get you appointed lieutenant colonel." Then he would go to another man and promise to make him a major if he would help him, and so on down the line.

These several men in that way became, as it were, embryo recruiting officers. They were all anxious to secure commissions, and in order to secure them they had to raise companies or regiments. Another vice of that system was—and we suffered immensely from it during the last years of the war—that we were constantly getting new regiments, new organizations of volunteers, when the ranks of the old and tried regiments were depleted and reduced, whereas if we could have had a different system to fill up by voluntary enlistments the older regiments as they shrank because of loss in battle and from disease in camp, we would have done much better, for two reasons: In the first place, if a "green" soldier is placed among old trained soldiers he becomes more quickly efficient than he would in a "raw" regiment. In the next place, in the older regiments by the time they have become reduced——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. By the time the companies and regiments have become reduced the inefficient and incompetent officers have become weeded out, while the experienced officers remain. Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I know that during the Civil War fresh regiments were formed, and, doubtless in many cases, when it was not for the best. I do not know how it may have been in Minnesota, but in New Hampshire we pursued the plan of filling up our regiments. Take the "Fighting Fifth," of New Hampshire—and I have no doubt the Senator has heard of that regiment, for it lost more men in killed and wounded than any other regiment on either side——

Mr. NELSON. I want to say, if the Senator will allow me, that during the Civil War, and for 20 years before that time, my home was in the State of Wisconsin, and I served in a Wisconsin regiment. I know that the regiment in which I served was partially filled up twice by recruits, but that was not true very generally. We had toward the last of the war many volunteers, some of whom did not even have to leave the State.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is very true. I was about to say that the regiment to which I have alluded, the "Fighting Fifth," of New Hampshire, was, to my knowledge, recruited three times to its maximum strength and sent into the field to renew its activities on the fighting line.

Mr. NELSON. The regiment in which I served was in the same brigade with the Eighth New Hampshire when the brigade charged the enemy's works at Port Hudson. The Eighth New Hampshire was an old, good, and tried regiment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to make a further suggestion, if the Senator will permit me, and that is that conscription in our State toward the close of the war did not produce very desirable results. We sent one regiment from New Hampshire of the members of which, I think it is safe to say, 90 per cent deserted before the close of the war, and, while the Government was under obligations to pay us $400,000 for recruiting and equipping that regiment, we have not had the audacity to seek a refund of the money that the State expended, because of the fact that those troops were so utterly worthless.

Mr. NELSON. It was only in the latter days of the war, Mr. President, after the war had progressed for some time that general resort to the draft was made. One vicious feature of the draft was this: After the quota of soldiers had been apportioned to the different towns in my section of the country the towns were allowed to raise their quota of soldiers in any manner they saw fit. In some instances the wealthy men of the town would raise a fund and in other cases they would vote town bonds to buy substitutes, who were paid large bounties, to take their places so that they might avoid the draft, and anything in the shape of a man, as a rule, was accepted. Those substitutes as a class—there were, however, some good ones among them—were a worthless job-lot set.

I hope that nothing of that kind will transpire under this bill. If we are to have a selective draft, let us have it, and let us have nothing of the old system by which those eligible for military duty secured worthless fellows as substitutes, who afterwards acquired the euphonious name, in many instances, of "bounty jumpers." I remember very well an incident when I was in the southern part of my State holding a political meeting some years ago. A man who had joined our company under those conditions and got a big bounty for enlisting came to me and told me a pitiful story. He said he could not get a pension. That fellow had obtained a bounty of $400 from his town. Then he had deserted and enlisted from another town, and he repeated the operation three times. He was cursing the Government because he could not get a pension, and he wanted to know if I could not help him. I told him that he ought to thank God Almighty that he was not strung up by the neck while he was in the Army.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I owe an apology to the Senate for saying as much as I have. I did not intend to do so when I rose. I concur with the Senator from New Hampshire in the view that the minimum age should be reduced to 18 years and the maximum increased to at least 35. I want to catch some of those who in Canada are called "slackers"—and we have had some of them there. Do Senators know that the best recruiting agents in Canada have been the women? The young girls in Canada walk up to the young men who have not enlisted and call them "slackers," will not associate with them, will not go out to parties or entertainments with them. So they have fairly compelled the boys to enlist or to be socially ostracized. I wish to God we could have some such spirit in this country; but the peace propaganda that has been going on here for such a long time, and which finally came to a head about this war, I am afraid, has demoralized our people.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I submit a proposed amendment to the bill, which I ask to have read and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

On page 5, line 10, strike out the word "nineteen," and substitute the word "eighteen"; and in line 11, on the same page, strike out the word "twenty-five," and substitute the word "thirty-five."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I think I have the floor.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I thought the Senator had concluded, and I was going to ask to have the bill read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will not delay the reading of the bill more than a few seconds. I have been very much entertained by the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. I was under the impression that the average age of the troops in the Union Army in the Civil War was very low; in fact, I thought it was a little lower than 23; but the wars of all countries, Mr. President, are fought by the young men. They make by far the best soldiers.

I read to-day in one of the papers a statement by an officer in foreign service that the men above 30 showed a marked increase in their tendency to rheumatic troubles and colds and diseases of the respiratory organs. The young men, in every respect, having more vitality, make by far the best fighters and soldiers, and their enlistment discommodes the rest of the community and the great industrial forces of the Nation much less than would the enlistment of older men.

My impression is that the average age of the men in the Confederate Army was less than that of those in the Northern Army, and I think I would rather favor—unless the War Department or the technical men can give some reason that would change my opinion—the reduction of the minimum to 18 years. I do not care so much about it being raised from 25 to 35, because I think we will get all we want between the ages of 18 and 25. However, that is a detail of the bill that I will not go into now; but I do desire to say, with reference to the amount of time necessary to put the draft into effect, that I am very confident, indeed, that under the draft the men will be in the training camps before the 1st of August if this bill should pass within a week or two.

The governor of my State several months ago caused a military census of the State to be made, and not only a military census but an industrial census, classifying all our manufacturers and every other asset that would be available in war. The military census—that is, the number of men between 18 and 45 that would be available for service—was made, I think, within two weeks; certainly not more than three. I am quite strongly of the impression that it was two weeks, but I will look it up and verify it. The Judge Advocate General of the War Department was very much interested, and I remember telling him about it. It was done systematically by the town clerks of the towns. We have the town system of government in my State, there being 178 towns in the State. Each town clerk, who had in his office all the lists of electors and a very wide acquaintance, took charge of the work in his town, and it was done in a very few days. He appointed assistants, of course, but he was the responsible man through whom it was done.

We have had now for a month a complete military census of the State. It could be done in larger States exactly as quickly. It does not make any difference how large the State is; your system will work just the same if you divide it into small enough units. So I have no fear that the passage of this bill would delay the raising of an army at all.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have been very much interested in what has been said in regard to the success of the volunteer system in Great Britain, Canada, Australia, and other Provinces.

During the past few days we have heard Lord Northcliffe's views commented upon in this Chamber, and a number of Senators have referred to the very great service that he rendered his country by the outspoken way in which he treated matters of a military character; and because of what has been said this afternoon it occurred to me that it might not be inopportune to have Lord Northcliffe's views of the volunteer system in England and the Provinces. I am going to beg the indulgence of the Senate long enough to read just a few paragraphs.

This article was written by Lord Northcliffe and printed in the Baltimore Sun under the title:

Lord Northcliffe tells of pitfalls to avoid. Warns America of volunteer system, which broke down early in Britain's war experience.

I am going to read only a few paragraphs.

Under date of April 13 he said:

The pitfalls which face the United States resemble more closely those of England and allied nations—Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa—than of France or Germany, which had long maintained large standing armies.

* * * * * * * *

But our army was at the beginning of the war, as your Army now is, really but a nucleus, and alas, we had to disperse our nucleus in France, Belgium, Egypt, Gallipoli, and Mesopotamia. We were then left with the instant need of turning farm hands, mechanics, chauffeurs, clerks, and all of the rest into soldiers at the shortest possible moment.

The then government, afraid to take the political risk of going at once to conscription, sought refuge in what is called the volunteer system. There was the old parrot cry: "One volunteer is worth three pressed men."

This was hammered from every platform by every demagogue. Nobility of the volunteer was eulogized, especially by those who wanted him to go so that they might remain and steal his business. Then the largest campaign in the history of modern advertising was inaugurated by the Government. Thousands of pages of newspaper space were obtained by the Government for advertising, many of which were of a semiblackmailing nature, displaying such phrases as:

"What will you say to your grandson when he asks you what you did in the great war?"

"What will your best girl think of you if you keep out of uniform?"

In the great rush of anger at the German horrors in Belgium and France hundreds of thousands of high-spirited young men went to the colors without thought of their business or private fortunes. When that rush was over recruiting slumped, and the advertising campaign for volunteers began and continued until the Government was able to proudly announce the vague fact that "some five millions of men have volunteered for our various naval and military services."

The exact meaning of the word "volunteered" was never explained and is unknown to this day. Among the volunteers were counted the halt, the maimed, the cripples, and other ineligibles.

It speedily became obvious that the system of volunteering had broken down. Many patriotic men enlisted freely. Others equally well disposed declined, insisting that there must be an equality of sacrifice.

If the Government told them that it was essential for them to go, they would go, provided others of their age and condition were required to go also. A grossly unjust state of affairs had come into existence. Married men with children had enlisted, and single men with no responsibilities remained behind to "enjoy the war," to use the popular phrase. Employees in patriotic stores enlisted en masse, and near-by stores in the same line of business did not hesitate to retain their workers and thrive.

The injustice became at last so pronounced and the cry of "single men first" so continuous that eventually, after much nervous trepidation, our Government summoned its courage and dreadful word "compulsion," firstly as to young men only. With the exception of a few cowards who posed as conscientious objectors to warfare, and also some bona fide objectors, such as members of the Society of Friends, the whole country welcomed the abolition of the grossly unjust system whereby the patriotic mother sent her son to the great fight for liberty and the unpatriotic mother kept her boy at her side.

The United States is in no such desperate hurry to raise soldiers as we were. If she desires to send a contingent overseas she will have plenty of time to send inquirers to France, to this country, or to Canada to find out the latest novelties in the ever-changing demands of war as to both men and material.

We were, unfortunately, in such haste that our men were enrolled in a way to remind one of a badly taken census. It took many months' time and the work of thousands of assistants in England and France and elsewhere to find out who the men in our army were, their trades and occupations, the conditions of their private lives, and other essential details.

In the vibrant days of the summer and autumn of 1914, in the first rush of patriotic volunteers, resulting in the greatest volunteer force ever raised in the world's history, all manner of important matters broke down—most notably, perhaps, that of the medical examination of recruits. The result was that many healthy, willing young men were rejected for trifling defects, and many others physically unfit were sent to the front only to go to the hospitals at once and otherwise cumber the earth.

There is much more of this article, but I shall not take the time to read it. In view of the opinions that have been expressed on the floor of the Senate as if they were not even disputed, I felt that it would be not inopportune that we might hear the views of one of the greatest of the world's critics on the subject of this war.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in the hearings before the House of Representatives, under date of April 14, Capt. Percy George Reginald Benson, of the English Army, was the first witness, and simply to put in the RECORD the result of the volunteer system and the conscription system in England I want to read just two questions propounded to Capt. Benson:

The CHAIRMAN. How many men did England get under the volunteer system?

Capt. BENSON. They got 5,000,000 men under the volunteer system. They got 11 per cent of the population under the volunteer system.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the total number now?

Capt. BENSON. The total force now would be, roughly, 6,500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. And 5,000,000 of that force were raised under the volunteer system?

Capt. BENSON. Five million came in by volunteer effort.

So the volunteer system was not such a lamentable failure in Great Britain.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in that connection I want to ask the Senator if he will not turn to the next page, reading from the same witness, and put into the RECORD at this point the number of men raised in Canada. It is about the middle of the page.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. The following question was asked the witness by Mr. SHALLENBERGER:

Do you know how many were received under the volunteer system from New Zealand, India, Australia, Canada, and the other colonies?

Capt. BENSON. I think Canada raised under the volunteer system about 400,000 men, and I think Australia and New Zealand raised, roughly, about the same number.

Mr. WISE. Between what ages do you take them under the volunteer system?

Capt. BENSON. Volunteers were taken from 18 to 41 years of age, I think.

Mr. WISE. Between what ages do you conscript them?

Capt. BENSON. The military obligation runs now, I think, to 45 years—between the ages of 18 and 45 years.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that practically a million men were raised in the colonies under this system.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I had intended to offer what I am about to read on another occasion hereafter, but I think it is perhaps apropos that it should be read into the RECORD now.

I read from the statement of a somewhat prominent English soldier, who had during his long life a fairly good military judgment and a considerable military experience. I think, therefore, that his opinion upon this subject is entitled to some consideration. I am referring to Lord Kitchener.

On the 5th of January, 1916, he said in the House of Lords:

So far we have been able to provide for the largest increase of the army and its maintenance on a purely voluntary system, and I, personally, had always hoped that we should be able to finish the war successfully without changing that system, which has done so well and which has given us such splendid material in the field. I do not consider that the change proposed should be regarded in the light of any derogation of the principle of voluntary service in this country. It only affects, during the period of the war, one class of men, among whom there are undoubtedly a certain number who have but a poor idea of their duties as citizens.

On May 23 following Lord Kitchener, again addressing the House of Lords, I think upon the conscription bill, said:

The conviction is deeply and universally felt that we have engaged in a just war, and the patriotism of our people gave us, under the voluntary system, a far larger army than we could ever have contemplated. This bill will enable us to maintain its numbers in a manner and degree not hitherto possible.

It is evident from the last quotation which I have read that Lord Kitchener regarded the compulsory-service bill as designed to supplement the magnificent army raised in Great Britain under the voluntary system and to maintain its numbers after it had been raised.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, it seems necessary, in order to explain the last answer of Capt. Benson read by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], to read again the entire questions and answers that he placed in the RECORD. For that reason I repeat the reading of his statement, together with the entire answer that he gave to the last question:

The CHAIRMAN. How many men did England get under the volunteer system?

Capt. BENSON. They got 5,000,000 men under the volunteer system. They got 11 per cent of the population under the volunteer system.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the total number now?

Capt. BENSON. The total force now would be, roughly, 6,500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. And 5,000,000 of that force were raised under the volunteer system?

Capt. BENSON. Five million came in by volunteer effort. The only point that was found to be objectionable was that these men were told off and a great many of them sent out to the line uneconomically, because afterwards they were wanted at home, and a great many men were lost who ought not to have gone out at all; and also if we had not been obliged to raise the full number of men, as I hope you will not have to do in this country, we would not have had so much of separation allowances and pensions. In other words, it would have saved us an enormous amount of money, because we would not have taken married men, as we did under the volunteer system.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am very glad that the article written by Lord Northcliffe has been read into the RECORD, expressing his opinion—and certainly his opinion was entitled to great weight—on the comparative merits of the volunteer system and the selective-draft system or the so-called conscriptive system; and I am particularly glad that the remainder of the testimony of the British captain was read into the RECORD, because it is the most significant part of his testimony.

I do not intend to address the Senate at any length this evening on this bill. I hope to have an opportunity of doing so on Monday. There are, however, one or two comments that have been made in the running debate that has taken place here this afternoon which I think perhaps it is permissible for me to comment upon in return.

We talk about Great Britain raising four or five million men by the volunteer system. It is a misnomer. I venture to say that a very large percentage of the four or five million—whichever the number was—were practically compelled to go. It is perfectly true, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] said in his description of the efforts to recruit the army in Canada, that the women themselves were the best recruiting officers. Social ostracism—the finger of shame pointed at every man who appeared upon the streets and in the street cars in London and in Liverpool, with complete ignorance on the part of the person, be he man or woman, that was making fun of him for not going as to his home conditions and his state in life—was the thing that drove men into the British Army and has been driving them into the Canadian Army. There is no more volunteer spirit in that than there is in the selective-draft provision of this bill.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield for a question.

Mr. BECKHAM. Is it not also a fact that the Zeppelin raids and other aerial attacks upon England had a great deal to do with the stimulating of volunteering there?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the whole success of recruiting armies by a volunteer system depends upon the psychology of the moment. You get a great mass of recruits one day because some outrage is perpetrated upon your own people. The next day the recruiting drops off. Public sentiment goes up and down, and the Government will always be compelled to gamble with the psychology of public sentiment and will never know from day to day how many recruits they are going to get. But to say that by volunteer recruiting Great Britain has built up this vast army is not an accurate description of the situation, because there was a very evident and an effective degree of compulsion in it. The cities and the countrysides of England were literally plastered with posters depicting in the most invidious manner the man who did not go, and thousands and thousands of men were compelled to go under the so-called volunteer system who never should have been permitted to go.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield for a question.

Mr. THOMAS. That is all that I intend to interrupt the Senator for. Does not the Senator recall that the conditions to which he has just referred in greater or less degree apply to every volunteer campaign in time of war?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is true, and that is why I am opposed to it. It is unfair. The truth of the matter is, if one will study the question of the creation of the British Army under the so-called volunteer system, that the waste of the very best material in England which went out in the so-called "Kitchener's mob," or "the first hundred thousand"—terms which have been eventuated, I hope, in military literature—was so great that it has been exceedingly difficult for the British Government to find officers for the forces that have been raised subsequently.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the case of Canada, I have in mind a most conspicuous instance of how the volunteer system imposes a vast hardship upon a government, a people, or a nation that is endeavoring to wage war effectively. Perhaps some of the Senators have heard of a famous Canadian volunteer regiment known as the "Princess Patricia's Own"—a regiment of cavalry known in Canada as a crack regiment. It was filled up on the volunteer system, and although it was cavalry, when it was sent to France, so great was the need for men that the men were dismounted and sent into the trenches as infantry. I heard upon reliable authority that out of the fifteen or sixteen hundred men of that splendid regiment, two-thirds of whom were officer material, and never would have done anything but officer work after they had been trained had there been a selective draft—out of the fifteen or sixteen hundred men in that magnificent outfit of volunteers only 40 were left fit to do military duty after six weeks of service.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator does not find fault with that regiment for being patriotic enough and brave enough to fight in the trenches, does he?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, certainly not. If I may use a colloquialism, I take off my hat to that regiment. "It is magnificent," Mr. President, "but it is not war." It is waste. That is the trouble.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am very much surprised to find that Senators know with so much accuracy precisely what happened in Great Britain under the volunteer system. The fact is that they raised 5,000,000 soldiers under the volunteer system in England. Then, when they were in great need of an additional force, and could not wait for the volunteer system, they enforced conscription, and got a million and a half more. That is the whole story. Beyond a doubt some men volunteered who ought to have stayed at home, and some of them were recalled from the trenches to take their places in industrial establishments; but to say that that volunteer force was not a patriotic and a brave army is to belie history, because they were both patriotic and brave.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that in the discussion of this bill we ought not to belittle what happened in England under the volunteer system, or in Canada, or in Australia. If we had the same patriotism in this country to-day that we had at the beginning of the Civil War there would be no trouble about having a volunteer force without resorting to conscription. They had that patriotism in England. They had that patriotism in Canada. They had it in Australia. It has been a great wonder to me how it happened that those colonies, attached as they are to the mother country, but practically independent nations, should have exhibited that patriotism, and should have given the very best of their young men to the cause of the allies. But they did it; and I do not think that the system which produced those results can be belittled by an argument that "the girls forced them to enlist," or that the finger of scorn was pointed at them in the streets of London.

Mr. President, whichever of these systems is agreed to by the Congress will receive my support after the result has been reached. But, having had some knowledge of the volunteer system in the Civil War, and of the results of conscription which followed when the volunteer forces could not be secured in an emergency, I am unwilling that the volunteer system should be presented to the people of this country as a failure, either in the Civil War, in the War with Spain, or in the war that is going on to-day in the countries of Europe.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, of course, there is not time now to enter upon any serious discussion of this question, which involves the very fundamental propositions which no doubt will be thrashed out quite thoroughly before we are through.

No one could have greater admiration than I have for the magnificent way in which Canada has responded in this war. She was not even invited to come in; she was not urged to come in; it was not intimated to her that she was wanted in the war, according to my understanding. She did volunteer, however, and volunteered nobly. She first called for 25,000 men, and in response to that call over 100,000 came forward, and finally she had to raise her limit to 35,000 at first, and they were supplied, and the men broke down fences and inclosures and gates and other things to enlist. They did nobly; there is no question about that; but that is not a complete answer to the question involved at all. It does not solve this problem; it does not meet the question here; and I am just saying this by way of calling attention to an article written by Mr. Paul U. Kellogg.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the Senator reads that article——

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not going to read the whole article.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield for just a moment, on that subject?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator speaks of how the men have volunteered in other countries. Does not the Senator think that if the men of America are given a chance to volunteer in this war they will volunteer now?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have not any question but that there will be a large number of volunteers. Whether or not we will have a sufficient number to meet the requirements is another question. There is room under this bill for 600,000 volunteers or more, and there is opportunity to volunteer. The bill does not deny that opportunity; and there will be, of course, a splendid response to that sort of a call.

Just one question still remains: Do we want the future brains of this country, the boys now of 18 to 25 in our colleges and universities, to enlist in this war and go to the trenches and be shot down and destroyed?

Mr. GALLINGER. Those who are going to be conscripted are between 18 and 25, according to the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. This selective draft business does not oblige them to come in.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not exclude them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand the bill there is no provision exempting college students between the ages of 19 and 25.

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly not; but only proportionately will they be brought in. The Etons, Oxfords, Cambridges, Winchesters, Trinities, and other institutions of learning will not pour forth of their blood and brain into these trenches.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks a boy who is fortunate enough to have a father who can send him to Cambridge or to Eton, or some other college, is under any less obligation to go than the unfortunate boy who has to stay at home to take care, perhaps, of a father or mother or to earn his livelihood? Is he any better because his people happen to have some money to send him to school?

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course not, Mr. President; nobody means to intimate anything of that sort; but if you have an unrestricted volunteer system in operation, you will take all these boys and all these men in the colleges. They are perfectly able to meet all the proper demands that will be made upon them, and they will furnish their proper proportion, but not all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the volunteer system the boys in the colleges are not compelled to enlist.

Mr. FLETCHER. They are not compelled to.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; and they do not all enlist.

Mr. FLETCHER. But an unrestricted volunteer system would bring them in. You could not relieve against that situation. Those are the boys who would volunteer at once.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I merely wish to ask the Senator whether the selective plan as provided in the bill would not apply to the volunteers the same as the conscripted?

Mr. FLETCHER. I should say yes.

I did not mean to get into this discussion and I am not attempting to answer these inquiries fully. They will be answered before the debate closes, but it is late and I know Senators wish to adjourn. I rose on purpose at this time to call attention to this article, written by Mr. Paul U. Kellogg, entitled "A Canadian city in war time. Recruiting and the man-power inventory."

It says:

> The national service board was created in September, 1916, by order in council under the war-measures act. It is composed of a director general and a director in each military district in Canada. The former is Richard Bedford Bennett, M. P., from Calgary—

Now, what does Mr. Bennett say? In the first place, as this article recites, they took a census over there and it resulted in three classes of military prospects: First, men from 18 to 30 without dependents; second, men from 30 to 45 without dependents; and, third, men from 18 to 45 without more than three dependents.

Then the article proceeds with the statement that—

> By March the board had turned into the military department 20,000 cards of military prospects of the first class.

Attached to the article is the form of inquiry they submitted, the questions they asked, and sent out all over Canada. They got this information, and it is quite important material, too. This is what Mr. Bennett said——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. STONE. What is the matter with men from 45 to 70 that they can not get in?

Mr. FLETCHER. The general experience is, I think, that men from 45 to 70 would not compose very efficient men for soldiers in the trenches. There may be other opportunities for gentlemen of that age in other work and in other service, and undoubtedly there will be opportunities offered them. But the point I am coming to is what Mr. Bennett, the director of this national service board in Canada, says:

The board has power to prevent men from enlisting who are needed in occupations where they have skill—for example, send them back to the farm. England had to return four divisions of shipbuilders and coal miners who enlisted in the first wasteful period of recruiting. A nation should not let the wild cry for soldiers from a thousand sources stampede irreplaceable men needed at home to make those soldiers effective. It takes six months to make a soldier; it takes six years to make a tool setter, two years to make a coal cutter, long apprenticeship and training to make an engineer or machinist. Nothing is more ruinous than the cry for wholesale indiscriminate volunteering.

That is a statement of this gentleman after the experience they had in Canada.

WASHINGTON RAILWAY & ELECTRIC CO.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By direction of the Vice President the Chair announces the following Senators to serve upon the committee to investigate the street railway strike: The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 23, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 23, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Father of all mercies, Thy servants this day are called upon to face the solemn responsibility of making preparation for the defense of our national honor and peace. We pray that Thou wilt lend them Thy blessing and Thy guidance. We thank Thee for the unity of spirit which pervades our national life. The ideals committed to us by the toil and sacrifice of our fathers, which are so infinitely dear to us to-day, will be defended with our fortune and life. Only let us see clearly that Thou art guiding us in the way. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore [WILLARD SAULSBURY, a Senator from the State of Delaware] assumed the chair.

JOHN H. BANKHEAD, a Senator from the State of Alabama, and HENRY F. HOLLIS, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, appeared in their seats to-day.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CROW INDIAN RESERVATION, MONT. (S. DOC. NO. 12).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 12th instant, certain information relative to what land within the Crow Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, is susceptible of cultivation to cereal crops without irrigation, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize the issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 1771. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to the Fleet Naval Reserve;

H. R. 2008. An act to provide for the extension of minority enlistments in the naval service;

H. R. 2338. An act to authorize the detail of additional officers to the Hydrographic Office;

H. R. 2339. An act to increase the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy until September 1, 1918; and

H. R. 2340. An act to increase the age limit for persons appointed as officers in the Naval Reserve.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial 2. (By Mr. Coombs.)

To the President, to the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, and to the Secretary of the Interior:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, duly assembled in its third session, respectfully and earnestly represent that—

Whereas in the Government service in the Territory of Alaska, and particularly in the service of the Alaska Engineering Commission, there are employed in clerical positions numerous aliens and persons who are not naturalized citizens of the United States: Now, therefore,

We, your memorialists, respectfully ask that legislation be enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and regulations be adopted by the various departments of the Government, prescribing as a necessary qualification for the holding of clerical positions in the Government service in the Territory of Alaska that the employees be citizens of the United States: Be it

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be sent to the President, to the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, to the Delegate from Alaska, to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Alaska Engineering Commission.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

Passed by the house March 29, 1917.

LUTHER C. HESS,
Speaker of the House.

Attest:

A. H. ZIEGLER,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Passed the senate April 5, 1917.

FRANK A. ALDRICH,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Attest:

W. M. EDDY,
Secretary of the Senate.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Territory of Alaska, ss:

I, Charles E. Davidson, secretary of Alaska, do hereby certify that the above is a full, true, and correct copy of house joint memorial No. 2, of the Alaska Territorial Legislature, passed at the third session thereof.

Witness my hand and the seal of the Territory of Alaska, affixed at Juneau, the capital, this 12th day of April, A. D. 1917.

[SEAL.] CHARLES E. DAVIDSON,
Secretary of Alaska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial 4. (By Mr. Snow (by request).)

To the President of the United States, the United States Senate, and the United States House of Representatives:

Your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the Territory of Alaska, most respectfully represent that—

Whereas the Government of the United States is now engaged in the construction of a railroad from Seward to Fairbanks, Alaska, for the purpose of developing the resources of the territory tributary to said railroad;

Whereas several towns have been and will hereafter be established along the line of said railroad;

Whereas the act of March 12, 1914, authorizing the construction of said railroad empowers the President to withdraw and dispose of lands belonging to the United States for town-site purposes, and the said act further provides that all funds received from the sale or other disposition of town-site lands be paid into the Treasury of the United States as other miscellaneous receipts are paid;

Whereas most, if not all, of these new towns are established and located upon undeveloped land, which requires large expenditures of money to make it suitable for habitation; water supply must be furnished, streets and sidewalks constructed, as well as schoolhouses, municipal buildings, and other public improvements of that nature;

Whereas Congress has on many occasions, by law applicable to the disposition of town sites in other portions of the United States, provided that a certain portion of the funds received from the sale of town sites shall be devoted to making improvements within such towns: Now, therefore,

We respectfully urge that suitable legislation be passed requiring that at least 50 per cent of the funds received from the sale of town sites sold under the provisions of the said railroad act be devoted to making improvements within the respective towns; be it further

Resolved, That a copy hereof be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the chairmen of the Committees on Territories and Public Lands of the United States Senate, and the chairmen of the Committees on the Territories and the Public Lands of the United States House of Representatives, the Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, and the Delegate to Congress from Alaska.

Passed the house March 31, 1917.

LUTHER C. HESS,
Speaker of the House.

I, Charles E. Davidson, secretary of Alaska, do hereby certify that the above is a full, true, and correct copy of house joint memorial No. 4 of the Alaska Territorial Legislature, passed at the third session thereof.

Witness my hand and the seal of the Territory of Alaska affixed at Juneau, the capital, this 12th day of April, A. D. 1917.

[SEAL.] CHARLES E. DAVIDSON,
Secretary of Alaska.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I present resolutions adopted by Sioux Falls Lodge, No. 262, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, of Sioux Falls, S. Dak., and a petition of the Commercial Club of Fort Pierre, S. Dak. I think both are very important, and I should like to have them printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petitions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the United States of America is now engaged in war with a foreign power, the prosecution of which war demands the undivided and unqualified support of all American citizens: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Sioux Falls Lodge No. 262 of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks hereby declares its unswerving support of whatever measures may be taken for the prosecution of said war and for the common defense by the President or by the Government of the United States of America or by the government of the State of South Dakota; be it further

Resolved, That this lodge will cooperate in every way with other organizations or with local or State or Federal officials for the promotion and carrying out of plans for the mobilization of the resources of the United States in men and material for the defense of the Nation and the successful prosecution of the said war; and be it further

Resolved, That the governor of the State of South Dakota be informed of this action by this lodge, and be given assurance of the loyal and energetic cooperation of this lodge, and of every member thereof, in any measures he may take for the discharge of the duties of the State of South Dakota to the Nation.

Introduced by the trustees at the regular meeting of the lodge April 13, 1917.

FORT PIERRE COMMERCIAL CLUB,
Fort Pierre, S. Dak., April 18, 1917.

Hon. E. S. JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Inclosed you will find a copy of some resolutions adopted by the Fort Pierre Commercial Club, which I believe will be self-explanatory.

I trust and urge that you do everything in your power to have these resolutions or some of a like nature adopted.

Thanking you in advance, I beg to remain,

Very respectfully,

GUY H. HARVEY, Secretary.

We, the undersigned, hereby petition the Congress of the United States, and each of the Senators and Congressmen of the State of South Dakota, that Congress take such action as may be necessary to prohibit as soon as possible the use of all grain and other produce suitable for food where the same is being used in the manufacture of beer and distilled liquors and spirits, and that the sale of all intoxicating liquors be prohibited throughout the United States and all its possessions during the continuance of the present war or while the United States is engaged in war.

We also urge that the dealing in futures and the buying and selling of margins and long and short options in the exchanges and boards of trade be prohibited, but that care be exercised not to interfere with the purchase and sale of commodities in the way of grain and provisions where delivery is made of the article bought or sold at the time of such transaction.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I present resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Newberry County, in my State, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEWBERRY, S. C., April 20, 1917.

Hon. E. D. SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have the honor of sending you a copy of the resolutions enthusiastically and unanimously adopted at an immense mass meeting of the citizens of Newberry County, S. C., Tuesday, April 17, 1917.

Respectfully,

JNO. M. KINARD, Chairman.
S. J. DERRICK.
JNO. H. WICKER.
MRS. W. H. HUNT.
MRS. F. Z. WILSON.

Whereas by act of the Congress and President of the United States a state of war has been declared to exist between our country and the Imperial German Government; and

Whereas our Government, State and National, has called upon all citizens to assist in preparing our country to meet the manifold needs and to make the numberless sacrifices arising from our duty in this crisis and testing time of our national life; and

Whereas the people of Newberry County have always, in every time of stress and storm in our history, heroically and in unanimity rallied to the support of the Government to which they owed allegiance: Therefore be it

Resolved—

First. That the citizens of Newberry County in mass meeting here assembled do hereby express to the Congress and President of the United States our hearty approval of the stand they have taken to uphold the dignity, the honor, and the rights of our country, and the intelligent zeal they manifest in preparing our Government and people for the arduous tasks now before them.

Second. To our Government, State and National, we pledge our earnest and loyal support in all its efforts to strengthen to whatever extent needed the power of our Army and Navy, to increase our food supply, to curb the extravagance and careless wastefulness of our people, to throttle the greed of the avaracious eager to prey on their country's necessities, and to equip the units of mercy and charity which the patriotic and devoted women of our country are ready now to organize to the end that this horrible world war may be quickly ended and the issues involved righteously settled.

Third. To the accomplishment of these high purposes we announce to-day that Newberry County stands ready in the services of her sons on land or sea; on her farms and in her gardens; through her financial, industrial, and business enterprises; and by the ministration of her women to do her full share whenever and wherever loyalty to country and duty to humanity points the way.

Fourth. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, Senators of this State, and the Representative of this district.

Mr. JAMES. I present resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Bowling Green, Ky., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOWLING GREEN, KY., April 20, 1917.

"No militia (volunteers) will ever acquire the habits necessary to resist a regular force. The firmness requisite for the real business and fighting is only to be attained by a constant course of discipline and service. I have never been witness to a single instance that can justify a different opinion; it is most earnestly to be wished that the liberties of America may be no longer trusted in any material degree to so precarious a dependence." (George Washington.)

In view of the above and the fact that universal military training as set forth in the Chamberlain bill and in that drafted by the War Department involving the principle of universal liability to service, and which is being so powerfully advocated by the President: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Bowling Green, Ky., representing 386 members, mayor of city of Bowling Green, and the undersigned patriotic citizens of this city and the county of Warren, do hereby pledge to the President and to the Congress of the United States our supreme loyalty and consecration to the national cause; and be it further

Resolved, That we do hereby urge upon each of our Senators and Congressmen, and especially our own Representative, the Hon. ROBERT Y. THOMAS, Jr., the imperative necessity of supporting the President and by adopting an immediate system of selective universal military service along those lines for which they are best fitted; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be immediately dispatched to the President, to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House, to our two Senators, each of Congressmen, and especially to the Hon. ROBERT Y. THOMAS, Jr.

Passed this 20th day of April in assembled session.

Carl D. Herdman, President Chamber of Commerce; A. T. Patterson, Mayor City of Bowling Green; E. C. Smith, Clerk County of Warren; G. D. Milliken; P. J. Potter; T. F. Miller; Lon M. Jackson; Ervin Ray; F. F. Stovalle; S. D. Hines, Police Judge; R. W. Covington; Robert Rodes; John M. Galloway; Perrin S. Turpin; D. C. Garvin; J. E. Stewart; Frances Clarke; S. C. Lawson; J. S. Patterson.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have resolutions of a mass meeting called by the mayor and the president of the Kelso Commercial Club, held in the city of Kelso, Wash., in which they urge Congress to take immediate steps to regulate food prices through the proper Government bureau and establish maximum prices that are fair and equitable. I ask that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At a meeting called by the mayor and the president of the Kelso Commercial Club, held in the city of Kelso, Wash., on Monday, April 16, 1917, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas in the present war period the people of the United States are admonished by the President to forego unusual profits in the handling of all food supplies; and

"Whereas many of the necessities of life, including all food staples, are reaching such high prices as to make it a burden for the great majority of people to subsist: Now, therefore,

"We, the citizens of Kelso, through the city officials and the Kelso Commercial Club, urge President Wilson and our duly elected representatives in Congress to take immediate steps through the proper Government bureau to regulate food prices and establish maximum prices that are fair and equitable."

J. BALLARD,
Mayor of the City of Kelso.
CLAUDE J. SHIPLEY,
President of Kelso Commercial Club.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, urging an appropriation for the construction and maintenance of a military road in that Territory, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint resolution 3. (By A. A. Allan.)

To the Congress of the United States of America:

The Legislature of the Territory of Alaska respectfully represents that—

Whereas the prime essential to the development of the vast resources of Alaska is transportation; and

Whereas railroad and steamship facilities are inadequate to such development unless supplemented by a system of wagon roads and trails, and Congress has recognized this fact by repeated appropriations for such purposes; and

Whereas the annual appropriation for the construction of roads and trails in Alaska was not made the last session of Congress and the failure of Congress to make appropriations at this special session will not only paralyze the efforts of the road commission for future developments, but by preventing necessary repairs and maintenance will result in the great deterioration of the roads already constructed, to the great loss of the Territory and the United States; and

Whereas the construction of an adequate road system in Alaska will not only open for development immense areas of mineral, coal, and lands suitable for farming and cattle grazing, but will afford an invaluable asset to the United States in case of war; and

Whereas the Legislature of Alaska has created Territorial road commissions to supplement the work of the United States Road Commission and will appropriate moneys to this end to the extent of its financial ability; and

Whereas the Territorial road construction to be of any considerable value must be tributary to and an extension of Government construction; and

Whereas the discontinuation of governmental policy of road construction in Alaska would result in a loss to the Territory and to the United States far greater than the sum asked by the Secretary of War for maintenance and construction, and would be, under the circumstances, utter folly: Now, therefore,

We, your memorialists, urgently call your attention to the situation as above presented and respectfully but earnestly represent that the sum of $500,000, requested in Senate amendment, in lines 7 to 11, inclusive, on page 55 of House of Representatives bill No. 20783, for appropriation for the construction and maintenance of roads and trails in Alaska, should be allowed.

We, your memorialists, will ever pray.

Passed the house March 30, 1917.

Secretary of the Senate.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
TERRITORY OF ALASKA.

I, Charles E. Davidson, secretary of the Territory of Alasks, do hereby certify that the above and within is a full, true, and correct copy of the original house joint memorial No. 3 on file in my office and of which I am the proper custodian.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the Territory of Alaska at Juneua, Alaska, this 13th day of April, A. D. 1917.

[SEAL.]

CHARLES E. DAVIDSON,
Secretary of Alaska.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire. It is a very brief one, and I ask to have it printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE, 1917.

Resolved, That the Legislature of New Hampshire hereby expresses its hearty approval of the message of the President of the United States to Congress on April 2, and trusts that the high ideals therein expressed may soon be established for the welfare and peace of the entire world, and we urge upon Congress the speedy enactment of the military and naval measures submitted by the President, especially his appeal for the raising of an army upon the basis of universal liability to service, in order that there may be a vigorous prosecution of the war against the German Government.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of Abigail Webster Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Franklin, and of 250 citizens of New London, in the State of New Hampshire, praying for compulsory military service, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the New Hampshire annual conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Keene, N. H., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CURTIS. I present a petition signed by the president of the Western District Conference of the Mennonite Church of Newton, Kans., which I desire to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PETITION TO CONGRESS.

The Mennonites of this country are either immigrants or the descendants of immigrants from various countries in Europe which they left to avoid compulsory military service. Assurance was given them by high officials of the United States, including President Grant in 1873, that they need fear no compulsory conscription here.

In view of this our attitude regarding military service we petition the Congress of the United States to exempt us and other noncombatant Christians from all compulsory military training and service in the event of the enactment of such a law.

Our people are mostly engaged in agriculture and are in every way loyal citizens. They pray for this exemption because they try to follow the doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ, stated in Matthew v, 44: "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you."

Our hope that this petition will be granted is based on the fact that in a democracy the conscience of the individual is duly considered, and the further fact that in Canada our brethren have been assured by the Government that the exemption for which we pray is granted them.

J. W. KLIEWER,
President of Western District Conference.

NEWTON, KANS., April 21, 1917.

Mr. CURTIS presented petitions of sundry citizens of Leavenworth and Lawrence, in the State of Kansas, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Osage County, Pratt County, Newton, and Parsons, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against compulsory military service, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Commercial Club of Atchison, Kans., praying for compulsory military service, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, No. 1, Department of Kansas, praying for the protection of the Army from saloons and immoral characters locating near the camps, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MYERS. I present two brief telegrams in the nature of petitions to Congress, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD with their signatures.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONRAD, MONT., April 17, 1917.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
Washington, D. C.:

Be it resolved by the city council of the city of Conrad, That we hereby pledge our support to the President of the United States of America in the great crisis which now confronts our country, and we believe it to be the sentiment of the city and of the entire community that our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States should stand squarely behind the President in each and every measure that he may suggest to the Congress for the prosecution of the war; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to our Senators and Representatives in Congress and a copy hereof be spread on the minutes of the city council.

Passed by the city council this 16th day of April, 1917.

Approved by the mayor this 16th day of April, 1917.

BUTTE, MONT., April 19, 1917.

Senator HENRY L. MYERS,
Washington, D. C.:

Without a dissenting vote it was resolved by the Rotary Club, of Butte, that we request our Members of Congress and Senate to adhere to and support the President of the United States in all war measures. We particularly indorse universal military service with immediate conscription, if deemed necessary by the President and the War College.

BUTTE ROTARY CLUB,
CHAS. AUSTIN, Secretary.

Mr. PHELAN. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, a communication from the governor, and another from the president and faculty of Leland Stanford Junior University, of Palo Alto, Cal., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions and communications were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[California Legislature, at Sacramento, 42d sess.]

ASSEMBLY CHAMBER, April 2, 1917.

To the Honorable President of the United States, Secretary of the Interior, Secretary of Agriculture, President of the Senate, Speaker of the House of Representatives, Senators and Members of Congress from California:

In compliance with the provisions of assembly joint resolution No. 14, adopted by the Legislature of the State of California at the forty-second session, I am sending you a true copy thereof, in title and words as follows:

CHAPTER 37.

Assembly joint resolution No. 14 (by Mr. William J. Martin, of forty-eighth district) relative to the establishment by the Government of the United States of a national park at Pinnacles National Monument.

Whereas there has been established by the Government of the United States a national monument known as the Pinnacles National Monument, which said monument is situated in San Benito County, State of California, in sections 33 and 34 of township 16 south and in lots 3 and 10 of township 17 south, both in range 7 east, Mount Diablo meridian, and which said monument was created January 16, 1908; and

Whereas there is contained within said monument beautiful scenery and rock formation of a peculiar and interesting sort, said rocks being the largest conglomerate bowlders known; and

Whereas each year a very large number of persons visit said monument, said numbers greatly increasing each succeeding year, until said monument has become one of the most instructive and interesting nature exhibits in the State of California, so much so that the public interest requires that said monument be given the standing of a national park; and

Whereas a large amount of land surrounding said monument is now Government land and is of such a wild and rugged nature as to be unfit for agricultural purposes: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly and senate, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California memorializes the Congress of the United States to enlarge said monument by adding thereto all the surrounding nonagricultural Government land, and as thus enlarged to change the same into a national park; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of California be requested to use all honorable means to secure the action desired in this matter for the purpose aforesaid; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of California, including those to assume office on March 4, 1917.

C. C. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
ARTHUR H. BREED,
President Pro Tempore of the Senate.
MARTIN C. MADSEN,
Private Secretary to the Governor.
FRANK C. JORDAN,
Secretary of State.

And do hereby certify that the same was duly filed with the secretary of state on March 30, 1917.

B. O. BOOTHBY,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 20, 1917.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Our State council of defense advises me that there is a serious shortage of tin plate, which is restricting the supply of cans for household and for the commercial canning of foods. These facts are apparently known to the Departments of Agriculture and of Commerce. I am further advised that exports of tin plate from this country continue at the alarming rate of 500,000 boxes per month, which, if continued for 12 months, would represent the equivalent of 1,500,000,000 can—a quantity which, if retained for domestic use, would greatly relieve this distressed situation for the conservation of food supplies. I would urge that an immediate embargo be placed upon exports of tin plate, except in so far as such exports may relate to the necessities of war, and that such embargo continue during the canning season or until such time as domestic requirements for the canning of food may be protected.

Kindly give copy this wire to each of our Representatives.

STANFORD UNIVERSITY, CAL., April 21, 1917.

Senator JAMES D. PHELAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Whereas every American citizen shares equal rights under his Government, and therefore stands under equal obligations toward it:

We, the undersigned members of the faculty of Stanford University, heartily indorse the principle of universal service and the measures recommended by the President to Congress for selective conscription. We urge you to vote accordingly, and against any amendment favoring volunteer recruiting to the exclusion of the principle of universal obligation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram embodying a resolution adopted by a patriotic meeting at McCook, Nebr.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

McCOOK, NEBR., April 19, 1917.

Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
Washington, D. C.:

At a public meeting this evening 500 patriotic citizens of McCook passed the following resolution unanimously in a rising vote. We the patriotic league of Redwillow County, Nebr., desire to express to our Representatives in Congress, Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS, Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK, and Hon. A. C. SHALLENBERGER—

"Resolved, That we most heartily indorse the program of our administration in its fight against autocracy; that we pledge herewith our loyal support of his program to His Honor President Woodrow Wilson in this grave crisis; and that we request this expression to be conveyed at once to our President."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I send to the desk and ask to have read a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the Nebraska Legislature.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That to defray the necessary military and naval expenses of the present crisis we favor legislation that shall call for sacrifice on the part of capital as well as human life, and to that end we favor the raising of extraordinary revenue by Congress, by increasing the income and corporation taxes particularly upon those incomes and corporation revenues arising from the manufacture of war material. Let war, if it comes, not become the source of further increase in enormous fortunes, but let capital be content with the ordinary profits of business and join with labor in the necessary sacrifices to maintain our rights and protect our citizens.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the President of the United States and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I present petitions of the Salisbury Lodge, Order of Elks; the Frostburg Lodge, Order of Elks; the Municipal Congress of the Eastern Shore of Maryland; and the mayor, city counsellor, and aldermen of Annapolis, all of my State, approving the President's foreign policy, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petitions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FROSTBURG, MD., April 3, 1917.

Hon. JOHN WALTER SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

Frostburg Lodge, No. 470, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, unanimously indorses the President's foreign policy.

Whereas our forefathers fought and died that the inalienable principles of freedom to pursue life, liberty, and happiness without molestation might be firmly established and permanently preserved; and

Whereas the Imperial German Government and its allies, by ruthless destruction of the life and property of neutrals and noncombatants, and by their avowed intention to continue such dastardly conduct, have violated those principles; and

Whereas the President of these United States of America has called upon the Congress and the American people for full authority and means to preserve our sacred rights: Therefore be it

Resolved by the members of Salisbury Lodge, No. 817, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks—

First. That we do hereby unequivocally indorse the course of action recommended by the Hon. Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, in his address to the Congress made on April 2, A. D. 1917; and be it further

Resolved—

Second. That we do hereby pledge our support and loyalty to the promulgation of whatever measures the Congress in the exercise of their knowledge and wisdom may adopt for the defense of the principles of American liberty against the vicious and arrogant attacks of Prussian imperialism and greed; and be it further

Resolved—

Third. That copies of these resolutions be sent to the President and both Houses of the Congress of the United States, and also published in the newspapers of Wicomico County, Md.

The above resolutions were adopted by Salisbury Lodge, No. 817, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, at a special meeting thereof held on Wednesday, April 4, 1917, at 8 o'clock p. m.

Resolutions approving the action of the President and of the Congress of the United States in declaring that a state of war exists between Germany and the United States.

Whereas by repeated and brutal attacks on the high seas by the German Government upon the commerce of the United States whereby the lives of American citizens, men, women, and children alike, have been lost, and millions of the property of our people destroyed, the maritime trade of our country fundamentally injured, and the rights of Americans on the ocean denied, infringed, and ravaged; and

Whereas the Government of the American Republic, under the wise and patriotic leadership of His Excellency, President Woodrow Wilson, has borne with unparalleled patience these wrongs, injuries, and outrages, and insisted and petitioned, to the very last point of submission, the German Government to desist from their unwarranted and cruel campaign upon our shipping, and to return to the humane principles of international law, without relief from these merciless evils or abatement in their heineous excesses; and

Whereas we have accepted the gage of battle with this natural foe of liberty, and have determined, if necessary, to spend the whole force of the American Nation to check and nullify its pretentions and end its power: Now, therefore,

We, the mayor, city counsellor, and aldermen of the city of Annapolis, in Maryland, deem it proper and fitting, representing as we do, the people of a town most illustrious in the patriotic annals of the country, where the first seeds of American liberty were sown; where the stamp officer in battle royal by our citizens was driven from our shore; where the Good Intent was sent back to our mother country with its unbroken cargo for violating the interdiction of the Maryland patriots; where the Peggy Stewart and her cargo of tea was burned in the open hours of daylight by our undisguised forefathers; where the Maryland line of immortal fame and unmeasured prowess was formed; together with a legion of other patriotic acts performed here in the cause of our national liberty, to hereby declare our heartfelt and unqualified approval of the action of our noble President and of our splendid Congress, and to pledge to them in all the fellowship and fraternity of our common patriotism to our beloved country, our cordial and complete support, unqualified by limitations to bring to a successful issue the cause that they and we sustain, that we may preserve our rights and may aid everywhere the people who are seeking it, a larger share of liberty and their proper and legitimate voice and vote in the government of themselves.

Resolved further, That the clerk of this body have a properly printed or engrossed copy of these resolutions, with the seal of the city on it, signed by the mayor and clerk, sent to the President of the United States and the President of the United States Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved April 9, 1917.

Mr. NELSON presented 17 telegrams from citizens and firms in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against volunteer enlistment, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented 27 telegrams from citizens and firms in the State of Michigan, praying for prohibition in naval and military camps, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Commercial Club of Fergus Falls, Minn., praying for the adoption of an arrangement by the United States, Canadian, French, and English representatives for guaranteeing the prices of farm products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against the imposition of a stamp tax to increase the revenue, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Virginia, Minneapolis, Crookston, Faribault, and Gilbert, all in the State of Minnesota, praying for compulsory military service, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, this morning I received 19 telegrams from Malden, Mo. I will read three of them:

Stand by President in all war measures, especially conscription.

Another:

We are with the President, and we want conscription.

Another:

Now is the time to support the President, and we want conscription.

These 3 are samples of the 19. Malden is a very pretty, prosperous little city of 1,500 to 1,800 population, being located near the northern border of Dunklin County, Mo., which is one of the best counties in the southeastern section of the State. I personally know most of the gentlemen who signed these 19 telegrams. They are highly respectable and esteemed citizens of that town and thoroughly representative.

Mr. President, so far I have not put into the RECORD any telegrams or letters received by me respecting the war, although I have received not hundreds but I think I can safely say thousands of such communications from all over the country, representing every phase of opinion. I have taken the position, assumed generally by Senators of experience and long service, that it would be a useless and expensive encumbrance of the RECORD to put into its pages the vast number of such communications showered upon us. They would make a volume—some being one way and some another. I see no sense in putting these things into the RECORD, making pages and pages at large public expense for nothing.

But I felt a little curious this morning when I received this batch of 19 telegrams from this one town, the only ones I received to-day, to know how it happened that these good people suddenly awakened to the importance of pressing this matter upon my attention en masse. They all came in a bunch. I wondered what influence had operated to excite this movement, and I am still curious to know. They were all delivered at once. I wish I knew how it happened. Of course I do not object to my constituents conveying their views to me; on the contrary I specially desire them to do so. I always treat the individual views of my constituents with high respect, although their views often confuse me by their wide divergence. However, that is not the point that interests me at this moment. I merely wonder how it happened that 19 good men and true in one small town suddenly felt themselves constrained to send to me such telegrams as those I have read. There must have been some influence operating to induce this concentrated action. That is the point at which my curiosity asserts itself. I can understand that sort of thing when there is a great organized movement afoot—a thoroughly well-organized movement—such as the movement which seeks to promote prohibition legislation, woman suffrage, labor movements, or something like that which has taken on the aspect of an established propaganda. I can understand that, for in such cases there are organized agencies which can be utilized to induce the people throughout the country associated with such movements to send telegrams or letters to those representing them at the Capitol. But I am curious to know why 19 gentlemen in this one small town all at once and at the same time sent me this particular bunch of telegrams. I do not know that I will ever find out about this, but I am going to send a copy of to-day's RECORD to every man who sent me one of these telegrams, with the hope that some of them will enlighten me on this mystifying subject. Just such mystifying incidents frequently occur with respect to a variety of subjects, as every Senator knows. Every Senator has similar experiences.

As to this particular matter, I will say that while telegrams of this kind, whether from the one side or the other, have weight with me, yet if I felt a deep conviction that I ought, as a matter of public duty, to oppose the conscription bill, or oppose or support any other particular bill before the Senate, I would oppose or support it as I thought duty required of me. That would not be out of any disrespect to those who communicated their personal views to me. But if I felt constrained, as a matter of public and official duty, to oppose or support a bill I would act accordingly to my best judgment. I might and probably would act regretfully because of the fact that some of my constituents, whose views I highly esteem, advised me to the contrary, but I could not shrink from the performance of a grave public duty as I saw it.

In this instance it so happens that the telegrams from Malden, to which I am referring, were unnecessary. I had already declared my purpose to support the conscription bill. On the very day the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill I told him I intended to vote for it. Many more than 19 of my constituents have telegraphed me to oppose the conscription bill. I wish I could oblige all of them on both sides, but I can not. I must therefore act on my own judgment as to what I think is best promotive of the public welfare and according to what I think duty demands of me under my oath as a Senator. Later I will give my reasons for supporting this particular bill, and I hope these 19 esteemed constituents of mine will do me the honor of reading what I shall have to say in this behalf.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We have in Michigan, organized by the Legislature under the leadership of the governor of that State, what is known as the Michigan War Preparedness Boards and also a Food Preparedness Board. The latter board has sent to me a short resolution, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MICHIGAN WAR PREPAREDNESS BOARDS,
Lansing, April 18, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. TOWNSEND: Acting upon the authority and instruction of the Food Preparedness Board of Michigan, I am sending you the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted by such board at a meeting held in Lansing April 17, 1917:

"By Mr. Simpson:

"That the secretary be instructed to write the Michigan delegation in the National Congress to use every honorable influence to speed up the vote on the agricultural appropriation bill of $25,000,000, as proposed by Secretary Houston of the Department of Agriculture."

Very respectfully,

FOOD PREPAREDNESS BOARD,
By M. H. DEFOE, Secretary.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present a petition signed by some 30 or more of the leading business firms of Jackson, Mich., setting forth their reasons for supporting national prohibition at this time, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JACKSON, MICH., April 2f, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We inclose herewith a petition signed by manufacturers and business men of this city.

The sentiment for national prohibition as a war measure, and especially in view of food conservation, seems to be practically unanimous, and, had time permitted, we believe almost every voter, except those directly interested in the manufacture and sale of liquors (which constitute a small minority), would have signed this request.

We have kept the original for our files.

Yours, truly,

E. R. YOUNG,
W. R. SMITH,
L. E. LATTO,
W. R. FOX,
Committee.

JACKSON, MICH., April 21, 1917.

To the Hon. WOODROW WILSON, President; Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND, Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH, Senators; Hon. MARK BACON, Representative:

In view of the probability of food shortage and in the interest of conservation of grains and in the interest of factory efficiency, farm production, and military efficiency, we hereby petition for national prohibition as a war measure.

Jackson Cushion Spring Co., W. R. Smith, secretary; Wilson Packing Co., W. H. Knox, vice president; Modern Machine Tool Co., H. Holton, president; Jackson Glass Works, F. C. Ransom, secretary; Walcott Lathe Co., Dean G. Kimball, vice president; Townley Shingle Co., Neal R. Townley; Colvin Dairy Co., F. E. Colvin, secretary-treasurer; O. F. Schmid Chemical Co., O. F. Schmid; Alloy Steel Spring & Axle Co., R. W. Smith, president; Lockwood Ash Motor Co. (Inc.), W. L. Ash, president; Field Brundage Engine Works, C. F. Field; Jackson Farm Produce Co., G. H. Randolph; Auto Oil Co., D. S. Fleming; Jackson Machine Tool Co., D. G. Kimball, secretary-treasurer; The Mutual Motors Co., W. T. Miller, treasurer; Fox Machine Co., W. R. Fox, president; Briscoe Motor Corporation, L. E. Latta, secretary; Jackson Automobile Co., H. A. Matthews, treasurer; The Sparks-Withington Co., Wm. Sparks; Jackson Motor Shaft Co., L. C. Bloomfield, president; Forst Gear & Forge Co., Edw. J. Frost, president; Hayes Wheel Co., C. B. Hayes, president; Pearlman Rim Corporation, O. W. Mott, president; Jackson Welding Co., O. W. Mott; Walk-Over Boot Shop, T. A. Rogers; J. O. Gilbert; F. D. Bennett; Wm. J. Stiles, city commissioner; Geo. H. Curtis, attorney; F. T. Lockwood, city commissioner; W. W. McLain, commissioner of schools; Yocum & Taylor, retail leather goods; Reid & Carlton, retail seeds, hardware, and implements; Peoples National Bank, F. H. Helmer, cashier, A. C. Bloomfield, cashier; Cook & Feldher Co.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We have pending before the Senate the war bill, upon which I expect to submit some remarks at an early opportunity. In connection with that bill I ask to have read a letter comprising but one page, which I have received from a former member of the Michigan State Senate and a participant in the late Spanish-American War, which to me furnishes an argument for the proposition of raising the age limit for enlistment in the Army to 45 years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

APRIL 19, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I like your stand upon the matter of conscription. Make the age limit 45 instead of 40. I am 42 and as fit as when 40.

Without conscription and a maximum age limit of 42 at least, men like myself could not take an active part in the war.

Should the age limit be raised above 40 thousands like myself might hesitate (unless conditions become more serious), because those nearest and dearest to us claim there is no justification for us attempting to enlist and thus sacrifice their interests.

Most men at 45 are physically fit for hard and energetic service. We have had five years more of the benefits of government than men of 40, hence owe more to our country.

My case is a sample. I realize, possibly more than most men of 40 years, the duty I owe to my country. I'm fairly, profitably, and satisfactorily employed but, being in debt, must keep at my work, else through the nonpayment of interest all I have will be lost not only to me but to my family. A private's pay would not pay my interest charges, let alone the taxes, therefore I can not enter a training camp for six months' preparation without causing my family serious want in the future. Yet I owe a duty to my country and in my present employment am not aiding her directly in this her hour of need. To do so would appear cruel to those who are dependent upon me, and to others I would look foolish.

Now with conscription and a maximum age limit set by the Government at 42, service in the Army, at whatever cost, would be the natural thing for one in my position.

In order that we may be justified in asking a seat at the table when the final decisions are made, we must strike hard and quickly. We can do so only by adopting conscription and more effectively by placing the age limit at 42 at least.

With best personal regards, I beg to be,

Faithfully yours, J. E. BAYLISS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Some days ago I presented a telegram from the governor of Michigan, which was printed in the RECORD, and which seems to have been misinterpreted. I did not misunderstand it; I knew that he was expressing his individual opinion as to industrial and agricultural preparation, and that the references to conscription and the sending of American troops abroad were simply a report of the information which had come to him. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a telegram which I have received from him on that subject.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LANSING, MICH., April 18, 1917.

Senator CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Washington, D. C.:

I fear my letter to you has been somewhat garbled by the press and has given a wrong impression to what I meant to convey. I wanted to emphasize the fact that we needed all the labor, at least for the present, upon the farms to produce foodstuffs, as that is one of the principal things in war, and the present condition of our food products throughout the country is alarming. Never in the history of the State have the cellars and barns of the farmers been as bare as they are to-day. I merely conveyed to you those ideas as were given to me, not my individual ideas, and did not suppose they would be made public. We are with the President and Government and his military and naval authorities in whatever way they may deem for the best.

ALBERT E. SLEEPER, Governor.

Mr. FREYLINGHUYSEN presented petitions of the Madonna Council, Knights of Columbus, of Englewood, N. J.; of the Daughters of the American Revolution of New Jersey; the Lawyers' Club, of Essex County, N. J.; of the Engineers' Club, of Trenton, N. J.; of the American Society of Civil Engineers, of New York City; and of the National Committee of Patriotic and Defense Societies, of Washington, D. C., praying for compulsory military service, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Presbytery of New Jersey, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the borough council of Rutherford, N. J., praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the Hackensack River, N. J., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented petitions of Local Lodge No. 114, Independent Order of Brith Sholom, of Camden; of Saranac Tribe, No. 128, Improved Order of Red Men, of Camden; and of the Civic Association of Haddonfield, all in the State of New Jersey, pledging support to the President, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of Local Lodge No. 340, International Association of Machinists, of Newark; of the New Jersey State Sunday School Association; and of the Civic Association of Haddonfield, all in the State of New Jersey, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the conservation of food supplies, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have here a memorial for national prohibition, signed by a thousand of the leading scientific, business, and professional men of the United States. It is one of the most notable memorials ever presented to Congress. The signatures were secured by a committee of 60, headed by former Gov. Foss, of Massachusetts, and Dr. Irving Fisher, of Yale University.

The memorial is of such importance that I ask that the thousand signatures, without prefix or suffix, be printed in the RECORD. It will take about a page or a page and a half of the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The memorial and signatures ordered to be printed in the RECORD are as follows:

A MEMORIAL FOR NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

In view of the scientifically proved unfavorable effects of the use of alcoholic beverages even in small quantities.

And in view, therefore, of the colossal, physical, mental, moral, economic, social, and racial evils which the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquor entail.

And in view of the inadequateness of all methods hitherto employed to check or regulate these evils.

And in view of the great and rapid growth of public knowledge and sentiment on this subject as shown by antialcoholic agitation and legislation through most of our national area.

The undersigned believe the time has come for the Federal Government to take steps looking to the prohibition in the United States of the manufacture, sale, import, export, and transport of alcoholic liquors:

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have a letter in the form of a petition bearing upon the subject of conscription. It is so terse and so strong and presents the argument so briefly that I ask that it may be read at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., April 21, 1917.

Hon. PORTER J. MCCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: You have voted the money, now vote the men; and don't depend on volunteer service; that has always failed in the past and is bound to fail if tried again.

Anyhow, we have no time for experiments. We need soldiers, and we need them quick. And we may need many more than can reasonably be expected to volunteer.

Then, why not vote for compulsory universal service and settle the question?

It puts all on an equality. It does not ask the generous and the brave to endure banishment from wives, children, parents, and friends, to sacrifice their business or positions, and to imperil their health and lives, while the shirkers and the unworthy remain comfortably at home and continue their selfish pursuits in peace and safety.

It means coercion, yes; but of a less offensive sort than the coercion of the volunteer system—the contemptuous glances of men and, more potent still, of women, too, upon the lusty figure of the youth who hangs back from the recruiting station, with their sneers, and jeers, and epithets, and imputations, and disdain.

Conscription is the only just, fair, democratic way to raise an army.

Those who oppose it are either uninformed as to what it really means or are afraid that they or theirs will be caught in the draft. You can not afford to vote just to please the uninformed, and as for the shirkers or the disloyal, they are not deserving of consideration.

You did not depend on voluntary contributions for the war fund. You knew it couldn't be raised that way. And if enough people will not voluntarily part with their money to pay the expenses of the war, is it reasonable to expect that enough of them will voluntarily give up their homes and business entirely and adopt a life worn out with toils and exposed to continued perils to create an army adequate for the emergency?

Undoubtedly some of the opposition to compulsory service comes from the same secret and subtle influences that from the beginning have sought to advance the interests of Germany. They want Germany to win. Failing in their efforts to keep us from accepting Germany's challenge, they now seek to hamper and delay our preparations for defense. They would, a few of them, deliver us into the hands of our enemies. With these, of course, you have no sympathy or concern.

But admitting there is a very considerable worthy and loyal element that is opposed from conscientious and unselfish motives to compulsory service, your practical, common sense must tell you they are wrong. Then why not use your own good judgment in the matter and depend upon your ability to establish the wisdom of your course later? You should have no trouble in convincing your constituents that from the standpoint of economy of life, of suffering, and of treasure selective conscription is the best means that can be adopted.

Senator, it is very likely that you hear from more people who oppose than who favor conscription. But that is not proof that the opposition sentiment preponderates. Those who favor it feel so strongly it is the only way that they take it for granted it will go through, and so only a few ask you to support it. Those who oppose it know that argument and reason and enlightened public sentiment are all against them, and they seek to make up by noisy demonstration and passionate protest what they lack in logic, in numbers, in intelligence and moral worth.

This is no time for Congress or its Members to consider any temporary or local political effect of its actions. It is a time to think of the future of the Nation, of the pressing needs of the situation, and to make sure that we do not by temporizing or delay invite calamity.

Yours, truly,

H. R. STRONG.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the modest communication which has just been read from a citizen of St. Louis rather amuses me. Each Senator has received a copy of that document. When Mr. Strong, whoever he may be, informs the country that those of us who have ventured to question the propriety of conscription are uninformed and are afraid that we ourselves may be drafted he goes altogether afield in his attempted criticism. I have more than a hundred communications here on the other side that I will not ask to have printed in the RECORD, but I will let the communication of the St. Louis gentleman go for what it is worth.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. BRADY. I have received from Mr. Norman Thomas, the secretary of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, a memorandum giving his views regarding the amendment his association feels should be added to Senate bill 1871. Mr. Thomas appeared before the Military Committee, and I then suggested to him to prepare this memorandum, which gives a very clear and intelligent statement of the principles of his association, and which I think is of sufficient importance to be considered by the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask that the memorandum be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorandum is as follows:

In submitting the inclosed suggested amendment, in the interest of conscientious objectors, I respectfully desire to make plain the following points:

First. Conscientious objectors in general are not expressing their approval of the principle of conscription for military service, when they request exemption.

Second. Conscientious objectors of the sort whom I know personally are not cowards and are very eager to serve society. It is our hope that under a system of selective draft the great majority of conscientious objectors will be found to be giving unselfish service of recognized value to the State. The Fellowship of Reconciliation, which I represent, has sent out a letter urging its members to lose no time in engaging in constructive service. Several of its members are now engaged in dangerous forms of relief and prison-camp work in the Balkans and in Armenia.

The fellowship is seeking an opportunity to send out some of its younger men for the reconstruction of villages in those regions in Armenia where danger from disease and disordered conditions of life is very great.

Third. In urging this amendment members of the Fellowship of Reconciliation are not actuated primarily by personal motives. Few of them would be liable under the present form of the act to military service. We are primarily desirous of saving the principle of freedom of conscience, which is absolutely vital to democracy, and of securing its recognition—even in a form which may not seem to us ideal—in this law.

Respectfully submitted.

NORMAN THOMAS,
Secretary Fellowship of Reconciliation.

Suggested amendment to Senate bill 1871 to cover the case of conscientious objectors:

First. Amend title by adding to it the following words: "and for other purposes."

Second. Section 3, strike out words "and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization * * * in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations." Substitute therefore the following: "and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel service in any of the forces herein provided for by any person who is conscientiously opposed to engage in such service."

Third Add new section, following section 3, as follows:

"Any person who shall have been exempted from military or naval service on the grounds of conscientious objection under section 3 of this act shall be liable to be drafted and assigned by the President to any one of the following kinds of civil service under the civil branches of the Government in which he can conscientiously engage: Agriculture, forestry, reclamation of waste land, highway construction and repair, public education, prison work, social-welfare work, coast-guard life saving, and relief and reconstruction among noncombatant sufferers. Any other civil service of national or international importance.

Any person so drafted shall serve during the period of the emergency and for one year thereafter unless sooner discharged.

Fourth. Add to the bill provision for civil tribunal to pass upon exemptions in general and especially upon those urged on conscientious grounds. We suggest, in general, that the terms of the House bill will meet this point. We quote the language of the House bill suggesting that it be incorporated in the Senate bill as a separate section: "That the President is authorized and empowered to constitute and establish throughout the United States tribunals for the purpose of enforcing and carrying into effect the terms and provisions of this act, together with such regulations as he shall prescribe and determine necessary for its administration. A majority of the members of each tribunal shall be citizens of the United States not connected with the Military Establishment: Provided further, That upon the complaint of any person who feels himself aggrieved by his enrollment or draft as is herein provided any court of record, State or Federal, having general jurisdiction in matters pertaining to the writ of habeas corpus, according to local laws or by act of Congress, shall have jurisdiction by proceedings in the nature of the writ of habeas corpus to hear summarily and determine the rights of such person."

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, while we may not all agree as to what this section in the bill should contain, yet I feel that the amendment suggested by Mr. Thomas should receive consideration and for that reason I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SEIZURE OF ENEMY VESSELS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 42) authorizing the President to take over for the United States the possession and title of vessels of any subject or citizen of any nation with which the United States may be at war, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to take over for the United States the possession and title of any vessel, within the jurisdiction of the United States, of any subject or citizen of any nation with which the United States may be at war, and, through the United States Shipping Board or any department or agency of the Government, to operate, lease, charter, and equip such vesssel in any service of the United States, or in any commerce, foreign or coastwise, as he may see fit.

The property rights and claims to compensation, if any, of such subject or citizen shall be determined at the end of the war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HARDING. I send to the desk an amendment which is to be proposed by me to the Army bill (S. 1781) and which I think is of sufficient importance to have read and ordered printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The amendment was read and ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

At the end of section 1 add a new paragraph, as follows:

"Seventh. The President is further authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment, to organize and equip not to exceed four infantry divisions, the officers of which shall be selected in the manner provided by paragraph 3 of section 1 of this act: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organization of the Regular Army: And provided further, That there shall be no enlistments in said force of men liable to draft under section 1 of this act: And provided further, That no such volunteer force shall be accepted in any unit smaller than a division."

In section 2, page 5, line 6, after the word "authorize," insert "except as provided in the seventh paragraph of section 1."

In section 8, page 11, line 18, strike out the word "and" and insert after the word "sixth" the words "and seventh."

REQUISITION OF VESSELS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Senate bill 1797 has been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs and is now on the calendar. I desire to offer an amendment which I intend to propose to that bill when it comes up for consideration, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received and printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I offer a resolution, which has reference to some hearings had before the Committee on Military Affairs, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 48) as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate, and that expenses contracted hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no immediate necessity for the passage of the resolution at this time, and I ask that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

RAILROAD FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I send to the desk a resolution and ask to have it read and lie over under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 47), as follows:

Whereas the railroad companies have filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission schedules of rate increases amounting to 15 per cent flat, that with the increase of local rates to follow will be over half a billion of dollars annually, which will go into effect June 1 unless suspended by order of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

Whereas the railroad companies have enjoyed an enormous increase of business during the last two years, giving them, according to the receipts for the last six months of 1916, a net income of approximately 7 per cent on the book value of their properties: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be requested to suspend said increases of rates until the same shall have been thoroughly examined in detail by the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine whether they are just and reasonable, or until such time as Congress may investigate the same to determine whether legislative action is advisable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

AFFAIRS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 49), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the authority heretofore vested in the Committee on the District of Columbia by Senate resolution of February 20, 1909, directing the said committee to examine into matters relating to the District of Columbia is hereby continued, and the said committee is hereby directed to pursue its investigation during the Sixty-fifth Congress.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 50), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate; and the expense thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

ADDRESS BY JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I present and desire to have referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view to have it printed as a public document, a very admirable address by Comptroller John Skelton Williams, which was delivered before the Southern Commercial Congress at its annual convention in Norfolk, Va.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The address will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate; and I desire to say in this connection, Mr. President, that I believe at the time the Senate adjourned on Saturday last the request was pending that the bill be read.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee. I send to the desk an amendment to the bill which I think the chairman of the committee will, perhaps, be willing to accept, and I ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

On page 6, line 9, after the word "Territories," insert the following: "duly ordained ministers of religion, students preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I prefer to examine the amendment a little more carefully, and in any event I think the bill ought to be read and the amendments taken up in order.

Mr. REED. Then, let the amendment be printed and it can be taken up later. I ask the chairman of the committee, however, to kindly consider it because I think it is a matter to which he will agree.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I now ask that the Secretary read the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in view of the existing emergency, which demands the raising of troops in addition to those now available, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized—

First. Immediately to raise, organize, officer, and equip all or such number of increments of the Regular Army provided by the national defense act approved June 3, 1916, or such parts thereof as he may deem necessary; to raise all organization of the Regular Army, including those added by such increments to the maximum enlisted strength authorized by law. Vacancies in the Regular Army created or caused by the addition of increments as herein authorized which can not be filled by promotion may be filled by temporary appointment for the period of the emergency or until replaced by provisional appointments made under the provisions of section 23 of the national-defense act, and hereafter provisional appointments under said section may be terminated whenever it is determined in the manner prescribed by the President, that the officer has not the suitability and fitness requisite for permanent appointment.

Second. To draft into the military service of the United States, organize, and officer in accordance with the provisions of section 111 of said national-defense act, so far as the provisions of said section may be applicable and not inconsistent with the terms of this act, any or all members of the National Guard and of the National Guard Reserve, and said members so drafted into the military service of the United States shall serve therein for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged.

Third. To raise by draft as herein provided, organize and equip an additional force of 500,000 enlisted men, or such part or parts thereof as he may at any time deem necessary, and to provide the necessary officers, line and staff, for said force and for organizations of the other forces hereby authorized, or by combining organizations of said other forces, by ordering members of the Officers' Reserve Corps to temporary duty in accordance with the provisions of section 38 of the national-defense act approved June 3, 1916; by appointment from the Regular Army, the Officers' Reserve Corps, from those duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903 (35 Stat. L., 775), from the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, from those who have been graduated from educational institutions at which military instruction is compulsory, or from those who have had honorable service in the Regular Army, the National Guard, or in the volunteer forces, or from the country at large; by assigning retired officers of the Regular Army to active duty with such force with their rank on the retired list and the full pay and allowances of their grade; or by the appointment of retired officers and enlisted men, active or retired, of the Regular Army as commissioned officers in such forces: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organizations of the Regular Army: And provided further, That officers with rank not above that of colonel shall be appointed by the President alone, and officers above that grade by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Fourth. The President is further authorized, in his discretion and at such time as he may determine, to raise and begin the training of an additional force of 500,000 men organized, officered, and equipped as provided for the force first mentioned in the preceding paragraph of this section.

Fifth. To raise by draft, organize, equip, and officer, as provided in the third paragraph of this section, in addition to and for each of the above forces, such recruit training units as he may deem necessary for the maintenance of such forces at the maximum strength.

Sixth. To raise, organize, officer, and maintain during the emergency such number of ammunition batteries and battalions, depot batteries, and battalions, and such artillery parks, with such numbers and grades of personnel as he may deem necessary. Such organizations shall be officered in the manner provided in the third paragraph of this section, and enlisted men may be assigned to said organizations from any of the forces herein provided for or raised by selective draft as by this act provided.

SEC. 2. The enlisted men required to raise and maintain the organizations of the Regular Army and to complete and maintain the organizations embodying the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, at the maximum legal strength as by this act provided, shall be raised by voluntary enlistment, or if and whenever the President decides that they can not effectually be so raised or maintained, then by selective draft; and all other forces hereby authorized shall be raised and maintained by selective draft exclusively. Such draft shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 19 and 25 years, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act. Quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof available for military service as shown by the registration provided for herein, and credit shall be given to any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof for the number of men who have entered the military service of the United States under the provisions of this act from any such State, Territory, District, or subdivision as members of any Federal force hereby authorized. All persons drafted into the service of the United States and all officers accepting commissions in the forces herein provided for shall, from the date of said draft or acceptance, be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Regular Army, except as to promotions, so far as such laws and regulations are applicable to persons whose permanent retention in the military service on the active or retired list is not contemplated by existing law, and those drafted shall be required to serve for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged.

SEC. 3. The Vice President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States and of the several States and Territories, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed; and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-organized religious sect or organization, at present organized and existing, whose creed forbids its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed of said religious organization; and the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only, persons of the following classes: Customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mails; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate; pilots; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency; those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable; and those found to be physically and morally deficient. No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists.

SEC. 4. All persons liable to military service under the provisions of this act shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President, and upon proclamation by the President or other public notice given by him or by his direction stating the time and place of such registration it shall be the duty of every such person liable to military service under the provisions hereof to present himself for and submit to registration under the provisions of this act; and every such person liable to military service shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of this act upon the publication of said proclamation or other notice as aforesaid given by the President by his direction; and any person who shall fail or neglect to present himself for registration or to submit thereto as herein provided shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction in the proper district court of the United States, be punished by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than one year, and shall thereupon be duly registered.

SEC. 5. The President is hereby authorized to utilize the service of any or all departments and any or all officers or agents of the United States, and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, in the execution of this act, and all officers and agents of the United States, and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, are hereby required to perform such duty in the execution of this act as the President shall order or direct, and the officers and agents of the several States shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act by the direction or request of the President. Any person charged as herein provided with the duty of carrying into effect any of the provisions of this act or the regulations made or directions given hereunder, who shall fail or neglect to perform such duty; and any person charged with such duty or having and exercising any authority under said act, regulations, or directions, who shall knowingly make or be a party to the making of any false or incorrect registration, physical examination, exemption, enlistment, enrollment, or muster, or any false or incorrect report or return pertaining to any registration, physical examination, exemption, enlistment, enrollment, or muster; and any person who shall make or be a party to the making of any false statement or certificate as to the fitness or liability of himself or any other person for service under the provisions of this act, or regulations made by the President thereunder, or otherwise evades or aids another to evade the requirements of this act or of said regulations, shall, if not subject to military law, be guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction in the proper district court of the United States, be punished by imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than one year, or, if subject to military law, shall be tried by court-martial and suffer such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

SEC. 6. That the qualifications and conditions for voluntary enlistment as herein provided shall be the same as those prescribed by existing law for enlistments in the Regular Army, except that recruits must be between the ages of 18 and 40 years at the time of their enlistment; and such enlistments shall be for the period of the emergency unless sooner discharged. All enlistments, including those in the Regular Army Reserve which are in force on the date of the approval of this act and which would terminate during the emergency, shall continue in force during the emergency unless sooner discharged, but nothing herein contained shall be construed to shorten the period of any existing enlistment.

All voluntary enlistments shall be in the Army of the United States, and those enlisted may be assigned upon enlistment to any force of said Army not required to be raised exclusively by selective draft.

The President may provide for the discharge of any or all enlisted men whose status with respect to dependents renders such discharge advisable; and he may also authorize the employment on any active duty of retired enlisted men of the Regular Army, either with their rank on the retired list or in higher enlisted grades, and such retired enlisted men shall receive the full pay and allowances of the grades in which they are actively employed.

SEC. 7. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint for the period of the existing emergency such general officers of appropriate grades as may be necessary for duty with brigades, divisions, and higher units in which the forces provided for herein may be organized by the President, and general officers of appropriate grade for the several Coast Artillery districts. In so far as such appointments may be made from any of the forces herein provided for, the appointees may be selected irrespective of the grades held by them in such forces. Vacancies in all grades in the Regular Army resulting from the appointment of officers thereof to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for, shall be filled by temporary promotions and appointments in the manner prescribed for filling temporary vacancies by section 114 of the national-defense act approved June 3, 1916; and officers appointed under the provisions of this act to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall not vacate their permanent commissions nor be prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing in the Regular Army.

Each chief of bureau of the War Department shall, during the existing emergency, have the rank, pay, and allowances of major general.

SEC. 8. The appointments authorized and made as provided by the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth paragraphs of section 1 and by section 7 of this act, and the temporary appointments in the Regular Army authorized by the first paragraph of section 1 of this act, shall be for the period of the emergency, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. The President is hereby authorized to discharge any officer from the office held by him under such appointment for any cause which, in the judgment of the President, would promote the public service; and the general commanding any division and higher tactical organization or territorial department is authorized to appoint from time to time military boards of not less than three nor more than five officers of the forces herein provided for to examine into and report upon the capacity, qualification, conduct, and efficiency of any commissioned officer within his command other than officers of the Regular Army holding permanent or provisional commissions therein. Each member of such board shall be superior in rank to the officer whose qualifications are to be inquired into, and if the report of such board be adverse to the continuance of any such officer and be approved by the President, such officer shall be discharged from the service at the discretion of the President with one month's pay and allowances.

SEC. 9. That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for other than the Regular Army shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army.

SEC. 10. All existing restrictions upon the detail, detachment, and employment of officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army are hereby suspended for the period of the present emergency.

SEC. 11. All laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby suspended during the continuance of the present war.

ISSUANCE OF BONDS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I desire to submit as a privileged matter the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on H. R. 2762, being a bill to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes.

I will say, before sending up to the desk the report of the conference committee, that the House receded from all of their disagreements except the disagreement involved in Senate amendment No. 5, and there they receded with an amendment. I will explain that so far as the difference involved in Senate amendment No. 5 is concerned, down to the second proviso the matter as it comes back from the conference committee is what the Senate did, but abbreviated, made somewhat more terse and somewhat clearer, and then there is added this proviso, which is new matter:

Provided further, That the provisions of section 5191 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the Federal reserve act and the amendments thereof, with reference to the reserves required to be kept by national banking associations and other member banks of the Federal Reserve System, shall not apply to deposits of public moneys by the United States in designated depositaries.

It was thought that we ought to make that amendment to the Senate amendment, because the moneys received by the Treasury under this bill are secured by independent security anyhow, and it would be a useless burden upon the banks to make them increase their general reserves because of this addition to their deposits. I submit the conference report and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, and 7, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to deposit in such banks and trust companies as he may designate the proceeds, or any part thereof, arising from the sale of the bonds and certificates of indebtedness authorized by this act, or the bonds previously authorized as described in section 4 of this act, and such deposits may bear such rate of interest and be subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That the amount so deposited shall not in any case exceed the amount withdrawn from any such bank or trust company and invested in such bonds or certificates of indebtedness plus the amount so invested by such bank or trust company, and such deposits shall be secured in the manner required for other deposits by section 5153, Revised Statutes, and amendments thereto: Provided further, That the provisions of section 5191 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the Federal reserve act and the amendments thereof, with reference to the reserves required to be kept by national banking associations and other member banks of the Federal Reserve System, shall not apply to deposits of public moneys by the United States in designated depositaries."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the title, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the title inserted by said amendment insert the following: "An act to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes."

F. M. SIMMONS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the adoption of the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose at this time to discuss in detail the bill which is now before the Senate. The chairman of the committee, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], has done that in the most comprehensive way, and I assume that there will be opportunity later on to discuss and rebut any arguments that may be made with reference to the provisions of the bill as presented.

When war was declared with Germany, the President was directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States to bring it to a successful conclusion, and we pledged all the resources of our country to that purpose.

The question we must now consider is How are we going to give the President what we have directed him to employ—that is, the naval and military forces of the United States? Are we to do so in a manner which has been demonstrated over and over again as ill-advised, ineffective, and disastrous, or are we to turn our attention to the results of the experience of other countries and take from their experience those lessons which will enable us to steer clear of the follies of the past? That is really the dividing line between general service and volunteer service, between efficiency and inefficiency, and between the judgment of military men everywhere and of those who, through some delusion, would make our country in its hour of greatest need ineffective, if not impotent.

Our own experience in the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, and the Spanish War, has been of one kind and has completely demonstrated, even if no other course had been adopted by other countries, the futility of sending untrained or partially trained troops—very largely officered by patriotic persons who are brave and willing, but insufficiently instructed—against thoroughly equipped and mechanized troops under the direction of trained officers. The result has always been a needless sacrifice of life and health and an enormous and unnecessary expense.

In the Revolutionary War we used 231,771 Regulars and Continental troops and 164,087 militia, a total of 393,858, against which the entire British force from first to last did not exceed 150,000; in other words, the Americans had nearly three men to their enemy's one, and they were operating in a country they knew thoroughly, in the midst of their own bases of supplies, while the enemy were operating a great distance from their base and in a country with which they were not acquainted and of which they could not have had suitable military maps.

In the War of 1812 we had 56,032 Regulars and 471,622 militia against English and Canadian forces of about 55,000 men. There is no more painful page in the history of our Republic than the results of the contests between our land forces and the enemy during this war. With the exception of two or three bright spots, notably at New Orleans, the American armies made a shameful exhibition of their capacity to wage a successful contest against a trained enemy.

Right here in the neighborhood of Washington we have had the example of an American volunteer army, quite likely made up of as brave men as ever shouldered a gun, fleeing before a British force so far inferior in numbers that the comparison is almost ludicrous and permitting, as a result of their inability to fight as a body, the British to capture Washington and to burn the White House and the Capitol of the Nation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Would it interrupt the Senator for me to ask a question just at that point?

Mr. WEEKS. Not at all.

Mr. VARDAMAN. In the light of those disastrous mistakes which the Senator has so graphically portrayed, what explanation has the Senator to give for the failure of Congress and the American people to embark upon the plan which the Senator now proposes, or some similar plan, in order to avoid the possible repetition of those disasters? If the old way was such a bad way, I confess I can not reconcile persistence in it with my idea of the ability, patriotism, and high order of statesmanship of the men who have directed the affairs of this Republic in the past.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I expect to discuss some of those reasons; but I will say to the Senator that in my judgment very much the same reasons have been advanced in the past as will be advanced here during this debate. They are well known; they will be stated by those who have an honest belief that a volunteer system is traditionally the system which this country should follow; and yet I am going to try to demonstrate that they are wrong in the first place, and in the second place that the demonstration of their wrong has been universal, not only in this country but in other countries.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the able Senator will pardon a further interruption, I should like to suggest to him that it is rather remarkable that the men who conceived this marvelous form of government, gave it being, and directed its growth from its infancy to the present day, when it stands out the strongest, the richest, and in many respects the most remarkable success in governmental experiment beneath the stars—I repeat, it is remarkable that these wise statesmen should have overlooked and disregarded the lesson of experiment and thrown away the wisdom which ought to have been extracted from the mistakes which the Senator has pointed out and pursued the same policy for 125 years. It remained for the wise men of the twentieth century, the heirs of the founders of the Republic, to insist upon this radical change, which to my mind is a reflection upon the capacity to govern and the noble statesmanship of those who have gone before us.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I agree that it is a reflection on their capacity; and it will be a reflection on our capacity if we do not now correct the mistakes of the past.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was interested in the statement the Senator from Massachusetts made, that a small British force defeated a larger American force of volunteer soldiers and burned the Capitol. Does the Senator think the force would have been any stronger if it had been conscripted at that time?

Mr. WEEKS. I think, Mr. President, that if we had had the wisdom to establish universal training in this country, so that we would have had trained men, we then would have been able to protect our own.

Mr. GALLINGER. But we did not have it. Now, my question is susceptible of a direct answer. Does the Senator think that if those soldiers had been conscripted, in place of having been volunteers, they would have been better able to compete with that trained force of the British Army?

Mr. WEEKS. With the same length of service, I think not; but, Mr. President, I am going to discuss the question of universal service. I hope the Military Affairs Committee will report later on a bill providing for universal training, and I am trying to point out why we have failed in the past.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am in favor of universal training, and I want to ask the Senator another question. We are constantly having it said to us that our disaster at the first Bull Run Battle was because our soldiers were untrained; and that was true. The southern army was made up to a very considerable extent of men who had had some military training. But does the Senator think that if that army had been conscripted, in place of having volunteered, they would have stood any better chance in the first Bull Run Battle?

Mr. WEEKS. Probably not, but I want to add if it had been conscripted it would have been a fair representation of the American people. As it was it was made up of an unfair representation of the American people. What we ought to do at this time is to do what is fundamentally and technically the right thing instead of continuing a policy which is fundamentally and technically wrong.

Mr. GALLINGER. That volunteer army was made up of average good citizens.

Mr. LODGE. Above the average.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes. That is one of the peculiarities with the early volunteers.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think so. Does the Senator think we are going to have a fair representation of the citizenship of this country if we draft men from 19 to 25?

Mr. WEEKS. I think so.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator thinks so?

Mr. WEEKS. I absolutely think so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it the most unfair proposition that ever could be presented.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator inform me whether the troops which won the Battle of New Orleans were volunteers or conscript?

Mr. WEEKS. The men who won the Battle of New Orleans were volunteers who had had a great deal of training in connection with the Indian wars, who knew how to shoot, who were led by a determined man, who knew how to handle his men. They were behind breastworks which had been improvised for the occasion, and they won because they were protected; they were well officered, and they knew how to shoot. That is a part of the general training which we ought to give to our people.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am very much interested in what the Senator is saying. I was wondering if he is going to take up in the course of his remarks the history of conscription in this country as well as voluntary service. I wish to ask the Senator if he recalls what took place when the Government instituted conscription by law in 1863?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, yes; Mr. President, I recall just what happened, and it happened as a result of the intrigues of a lot of copperheads who were doing everything they could to prevent the Government from being successful in prosecuting the war, and there are people in this country who are coming pretty near the line of doing exactly the same thing under present conditions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; the newspapers say those of us who do not entirely agree with the Senator ought to be put in that class.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I could put in the RECORD some very important newspaper utterances not a thousand miles away from Washington which would indicate it. Now, will the Senator——

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator knows I am not responsible for newspaper utterances. I am responsible for my own.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit one further inquiry? We have had five wars, I believe.

Mr. WEEKS. More than five.

Mr. GALLINGER. Five that are worth enumerating. They were all fought by volunteer forces and we won them all.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; and at the end of the Civil War we had the finest Army that was ever gotten together. A volunteer force in a Commonwealth which is trained makes the most effective force that can be congregated under any circumstances, infinitely better than Regulars. That has been demonstrated time and time again.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator, if that is so, why change the system that brings about such a splendid force as the Senator has described?

Mr. WEEKS. Because the delay and cost is excessive. If the Senator will give me the opportunity, I will try to demonstrate why I think we ought to change the system. There may be those who do not agree with me, and I should be glad to debate any question which develops as a result of this discussion. This is simply preliminary. I am glad to answer the question and I shall try to answer the question more fully during my discussion.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to preface my question with the statement that it seems to me the Senator's argument thus far made is a logical and correct one in favor of conscription as a permanent policy; but will the Senator claim that in raising an army for the present war we can get a trained army any quicker or a better army by conscription than we could by volunteering? In other words, taking the condition we are in now, whether we may like it or not, taking it just as it is, will there be any advantage in raising and training an army now by conscription over the volunteer system?

Mr. WEEKS. I think I can answer that.

In the Mexican War the forces involved included 31,024 Regulars, 60,659 Volunteers and Rangers, and 12,601 militia, a total of 104,284 men, while the maximum number of Mexican troops engaged in the war was only about 46,000. In this war the Volunteers were enlisted for one year, and as the war did not end within that time many of them returned to their homes without waiting for its termination.

At the end of the Civil War our volunteers had acquired a training which made them comparable to any army that ever existed. They were without question among the best troops in the world, but the cost of their preparation and the final accomplishment was simply appalling. We employed 67,000 Regulars and at different times 2,606,341 Volunteers, while the Confederacy did not during the entire war employ more than a million and a half men, and perhaps not greatly exceeding 1,000,000. It must be remembered that in this war the Confederacy was operating in interior lines and in their own territory, with which they were entirely familiar, and that to some degree they had previously been given a better training than the men who had come from the commercial and industrial North. But the results on both sides showed lack of experience and suitable previous training.

No intelligent man can go over the battle fields of the earlier days of the war or examine the records of that period without being deeply impressed with not only the lack of experience of the officers but the futility of attempting to fight without the very best training and under the best obtainable officers. Three months after war was declared the Battle of Bull Run was fought, and it showed conclusively the result likely to come in a contest between comparatively untrained forces, and that result would have been accentuated greatly if one of the forces had been made up of trained men. The panic was indescribable, and the evidence is complete that neither side felt itself competent to engage in further actual contests without sufficient preparation, because between the 4th of July, 1861, and the last days of May, 1862, no action worth the name was fought by the Army of the Potomac and the Army of Northern Virginia. It was a period of drill and preparation and assimilation of the forces which had enlisted for long enough periods to give them sufficient training.

In the Spanish-American War we had engaged 58,688 Regulars and 223,235 militia or Volunteers, and the Spaniards did not have over 200,000 men in any part of the territory involved in the contest. In this instance we were fighting with a nation not much better prepared than ourselves, though one that had military traditions, which might have led to the belief that it would have made a better showing.

Thus in two of our foreign wars we were fighting nations incomparably inferior to ours in numbers and resources, while in the other two foreign wars fought with Great Britain we engaged in the contests at a time when that country was not free to devote its entire energies to the wars being waged with us.

The arguments and appeals for trained forces made by military men from Washington and his lieutenants down to the present day are of one tenor; indeed, it would be difficult to find a trained military man anywhere in the world not in favor of universal training and universal service. Continental Europe has been committed to this policy for many years, and the soldiers of Great Britain, like the late Lord Roberts, Earl Kitchener, and others, who have in the past and their successors who are at the present time demonstrating their efficiency, are quite as insistent along this line as their brother soldiers of the Continent. The ideas of our own trained soldiers are in entire conformity with those of the soldiers of other nations.

Great Britain failed to heed Lord Roberts and the others, and this failure resulted in the loss of a great many of the most promising and patriotic young men of Great Britain and her colonies. Her failure to be prepared nearly lost the war, and imposed upon her allies a double burden until she could prepare herself to do her part.

Not only are the trained soldiers of our Regular Army favorable to universal training and service but their opinion is shared by our citizen soldiers, as is clearly demonstrated by the replies received to a series of questions asked last year by Representative GARDNER, through Gen. Bell, while the National Guard was on duty on the border. The head of every independent National Guard organization was asked this question: "Have you formed an opinion upon the question of universal military training? If so, what are your ideas?" Five hundred and ten answers were received to this question, 500 being in favor of universal training and 10 opposed to it. The 500 men favoring universal training included 16 colonels, 250 captains, and 234 first sergeants. The 10 included one colonel, 5 captains, and 4 first sergeants. As far as I am informed these National Guard units came from every section of the country, and it would seem to be a complete indorsement of the principle of universal training from our citizen soldiers.

Whenever we have waged a great war it has been necessary to resort to draft in order to bring it to a successful conclusion. As early as 1777, within about a year of the beginning of the Revolutionary War, the then leading Colonies of Massachusetts and Virginia were forced to resort to draft, and notwithstanding the disjointed efforts of the Colonies to keep up their complements the patriot armies which in 1776 had been 89,000 men had shrunk to 29,000 in 1781. In 1812 the volunteer system was so conspicuously unsatisfactory and incompetent that even Mr. Jefferson, who was certainly not a man of the military type, was obliged to make a protest against such a system.

From 1802 to 1808 all measures, whether offensive or defensive, looked almost exclusively to the use of militia and volunteers. In 1807, when for the second time our relations with Great Britain had become strained, the President was authorized to accept 30,000 Volunteers, officered by the several States, and says Gen. Emory Upton, probably the best military expert developed by our Civil War, "more than half a century later we reaped the bitter fruit of this system at the Battle of Bull Run." Thus was the volunteer system given preference in anticipation of the War of 1812. But long before that war had been brought to a close the folly of the system had manifested itself to such a degree that Thomas Jefferson wrote:

> It proves most forcibly the necessity of obliging every citizen to be a soldier. This was the case with the Greeks and Romans, and must be that of every free State. * * * We must train and classify the whole of our male population. * * * We can never be safe until this is done.

The volunteer system having failed before the close of the War of 1812, the Government was forced to devise various schemes for raising men, and was only able to avoid a draft by the speedy termination of the war.

In the Mexican War nearly the entire force of Volunteers was raised under one call and enlisted for a period of one year. It required almost the entire 12 months to train this volunteer force in the ways of war, and the training having been completed and the term of enlistment exhausted practically the entire volunteer force withdrew from the service, although the war was not over.

I might at this time call attention to the results during the Civil War due to a termination of the service of Volunteers. When Gen. Lee was making his invasion of Pennsylvania in 1863, when there was danger of an attack upon the Capital, the terms of service of many men ended; that is, on the 30th of June of that year. One regiment of Volunteers which was passing through the Capital was asked to remain and defend the Capital, or to remain long enough to be sure that their aid was not necessary, and of those men—loyal men, I presume, generally speaking—only about one-half consented to remain and protect their Capital.

Despite the unfortunate experiences of the Government with the volunteer system in almost every instance in which it had been put to the test, it was again resorted to at the outbreak of the Civil War. The difficulties experienced in that struggle through the use of Volunteers were occasioned, to some extent, by the fact that short enlistments were made the practice. Nevertheless, in resorting to the draft, President Lincoln in an address to the American people, which set forth some of the human traits which must forever be a weak point in the volunteer system, said in part:

> At the beginning of the war, and ever since, a variety of motives, pressing some in one direction and some in the other, would be presented to the mind of each man physically fit for a soldier, upon the combined effect of which motives he would or would not voluntarily enter the service. Among these would be patriotism, political bias, ambition, personal courage love of adventure, want of employment, and convenience, or the opposite of some of these. We already have and have had in the service, as appears, substantially all that can be obtained upon this voluntary weighing of motives. And yet we must somehow obtain more or relinquish the original object of the contest, together with all the blood and treasure already expended in the effort to secure it. To meet this necessity the law for the draft has been enacted. You who do not wish to be soldiers do not like this law.

The report of the provost marshal general of the Civil War, Gen. Fry, is eloquent of the failure of the volunteer system at the most critical period of the war. He said in part:

> During the latter part of 1862 the necessity for a radical change in the method of recruiting troops in order to prosecute the war to a successful issue became more and more apparent. The demand for reinforcements from the various armies in the field steadily and largely exceeded the supply of men. The old agencies of filling the ranks proved more and more ineffective It was evident that the efforts of the Government for the suppression of the rebellion would fail without a resort to the unpopular, but nevertheless truly republican, measure of conscription. * * *

But it was not easy to convince the public mind at once of the justice and wisdom of conscription. It was a novelty, contrary to the traditional military policy of the Nation. The people had become more accustomed to the enjoyment of privileges than to the fulfillment of duties under the General Government, and hence beheld the prospect of compulsory service in the Army with an unreasonable dread. Among the laboring classes especially it produced great uneasiness. Fortunately, the loyal political leaders and press early realized the urgency of conscription, and, by judicious agitation, gradually reconciled the public to it. * * * The public safety would have been risked by a longer delay in the enactment of this law. A general apathy prevailed throughout the country on the subject of volunteering.

Mr. President, I wish to demonstrate that the press of to-day is as loyal as the press of that time, so I include in my remarks the statement of a large number of newspapers throughout the country which have indorsed the act which is now pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Five hundred and one newspapers scattered over every section of the United States recognize the vital necessity for the immediate passage by Congress of a universal military training law and urge this action in their editorial columns. The advocates of universal military training include practically all the big dailies of the country. The list follows:

The Minneapolis Tribune says: "Universal training is not only the best safeguard against war, but the only scheme that puts the rich and poor on exactly the same footing in the matter of military service if war should come."

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch says: "Congress ought to pass at the earliest possible moment a measure embodying the main provisions of the Chamberlain bill. The people ought to demand it as a measure of wise and needful preparedness."

The Seattle Times says: "Compulsory military training is an urgent necessity as a means of assuring the Nation a dependable reserve of trained men for any emergency that may arise."

The New Orleans Item says: "This paper long ago exhausted its vocabulary in arguments in favor of a compulsory system of military training. It is the only democratic form of military service. It is the only practical form of preparedness."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am the last person to do an injustice to the National Guard. I have served in it for many years. I think I know its high purposes, its loyal membership, and its desire to be militarily useful. Moreover, in recent years, there has been a marked increase in its efficiency, somewhat due, of course, to the legislation of 1903 and other subsequent legislation. Yet, our National Guard is composed of 48 units, the officers of which are elected and, in time of war, appointed by the governors of the several States. Necessarily, the efficiency of these units vary, because the same support and encouragement is not given to the guard in each State, and very seldom is the guard enlisted to its full strength. Many men who enlist are found disqualified for various reasons and are discharged before they receive much training; many lose interest and fail to attend drills, being discharged for cause, without any resulting stigma attached to their leaving the guard; and the number of long-service and well-trained men in comparison to the total number connected with the guard is relatively small. Probably not more than 25 to 30 per cent of the National Guards which went to the border last year had received more than a year's training, which meant, in addition to the week ordinarily spent in camp, not more than from 50 to 100 hours of drill a year.

To show how inadequate this amount of training is considered by those directing European military affairs, it is only necessary to compare this period of drill with that given European recruits before being sent to the front. At this time no recruit is considered fitted to come into contact with the enemy until he has received at least 2,400 hours of drill. When our men went to the border last year, a very considerable percentage—possibly as many as one-half—had never fired a rifle and nearly as large a proportion had never had an hour's drill.

Moreover, as I have suggested, the selection of officers, which is done under the provisions of the Constitution, presents a serious difficulty. They are elected by their men, and the election, while it produces many admirable officers, is more or less influenced by social or political reasons and almost always affected by the element of good fellowship. As a matter of fact, officers should be chosen solely on account of their military qualifications. Leadership in military affairs, as in every other walk in life, must include a knowledge greater than that possessed by others. A man who knows more than his fellow men is a leader, wherever he may be, and therefore, in fitting out military organizations, one of the first requirements is that an officer must be competent to instruct and lead his men, in which case he will have their respect and will be followed by them even though they may not have a personal liking for him.

I have heard many complaints about the hardships brought about by sending the National Guardsmen to the border last year to perform police duty. There is reason for these complaints, because men who had been patriotic enough to join the National Guard suddenly found themselves dragooned into performing a service they had not anticipated or desired, while many of their fellow citizens were at home following their civil employments. Yet, if every man had had to take his chance of performing this service there could not have been any reason for complaint.

The Commander in Chief considered it necessary that such service should be performed on the border, and the National Guard was the only available force for that purpose. The National Guard, however, through its constituted representatives, is responsible for being placed in this position. I do not mean its representatives in every State—I am glad to say that the leading officers in the State of Massachusetts were opposed to the military legislation placing the guard in this position—but the adjutants general of most of the States brought all the political pressure they could to bear on Congress last year, and, as a result, obtained the legislation they desired and which made it necessary for the National Guard to perform this police duty. However, the feeling was created that the guards sent to the border were unjustly treated, because a great many of their fellow men were exempted from such duty, and for that reason alone, in my opinion.

Those who are urging a retention of the volunteer system emphasize the fact that there is merit in retaining historical associations, such as the names of well-known State and local military organizations. There is no doubt about the validity of such a claim. The long-continued service of an organization of distinguished character attracts enrollments in its membership. Everyone can recall the names of famous military organizations in this country which have had brilliant records. This, however, is not unusual in other countries and is equally true in countries where universal service prevails. The well-known regiments like the Grenadiers and the Black Watch and other similarly prominent organizations in Great Britain are as familiar to the rest of the world as to the inhabitants of England. A similar policy is followed in Russia and in Germany. In Germany troops from the different sections of the country are usually included in organizations by themselves. We read of the Bavarians, the Württembergers ,the Saxons, and the Prussians, and there is no reason why such a policy should not be followed in this country under a conscription system. It seems to me it would be particularly unfortunate to make up our organizations from groups of men coming from different sections of the country. They can serve in every way as well, and will be more willing to enlist if they are to enter organizations made up of men coming from the same general locality and who may be their personal friends.

Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States makes the most ample provision for the protection of the citizen and in permitting him to exercise his rights in all matters pertaining to citizenship. He is assured of entire freedom of religion and speech and is permitted to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. He is protected against unreasonable search of his person, house, or effects, and is assured against unjust arrest and imprisonment, and no State is permitted to deprive him of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The Government not only protects a person in the exercise of every conceivable liberty which does not involve a violation of law, but it goes further than that and protects him and his property abroad. It has contracted agreements with other nations assuring American citizens impartial treatment while sojourning within their territory, and our history is filled with instances in which the Government has taken drastic measures where the life or property of a citizen have been endangered in foreign lands.

We fought the Tripolitan War in 1803 because American citizens were seized and imprisoned by the Tripolitan pirates, their property sequestered, and because our commerce was constantly preyed upon and great financial tributes demanded by the Tripolitan leaders as ransom for our sailors. We fought the War of 1812 to maintain the rights of American citizens from the claim of the British Government of the right of search and seizure. It is not necessary to instance individual cases, though it will not be unreasonable to call attention to one or two to show what has been the policy of our Government in such matters.

For example, in 1852 Martin Koszta, a political refugee from Austria to the United States, made declaration under oath of his intention to become an American citizen. After remaining here nearly two years he went to Turkey on business, placing himself under the protection of the United States consul at Smyrna. While there he was seized by a band of lawless men, thrown into the sea, and immediately thereafter taken up by a boat's crew belonging to an Austrian man-of-war. Their plan, apparently, was to return Koszta to Austrian territory; but opportunely an American sloop-of-war, the St. Louis, under Capt. Ingraham, arrived in the harbor, and the release of the captive was demanded. Force was threatened, but unnecessary, as the Austrians finally released Koszta and he returned safely to the United States. Incidentally, I will say Congress thought that incident so important that it voted a sword to Capt. Ingraham for the prompt and effective action which he took.

On another occasion, in 1904, Ion Perdicaris, an American residing near Tangier, Morocco, was abducted by a bandit named Raisuli. The American consul immediately notified the Moroccan authorities that they would be held responsible for the safe return of Perdicaris. Long negotiations followed until finally Secretary of State Hay sent his famous message to the American consul general at Tangier that "the United States wants Perdicaris alive or Raisuli dead," and five weeks after his abduction this American citizen had regained his liberty.

Now, having all the rights of a free people and having the protection of the Government wherever the citizen may be or whatever the condition of his qualification for citizenship, it can not be an unreasonable position to say that the citizen shall respond to the just requirements of government, and we do compel him by stringent legislation to observe all laws and regulations concerning public health. We compel him, except when reasonable excuse is offered, to serve on the jury, and there are innumerable other civil examples to show the policy of the Government in requiring its citizens to support it in time of peace and to help, in proportion to their capacity and opportunity, in maintaining and executing the laws. If it is practicable to permit such action in time of peace, how much more necessary must it be to require from every citizen in time of war those things which he can best do to maintain and uphold his Government.

Unfortunately, up to the present time, this has not been the case. While our Government has been most scrupulous in its efforts to fulfill its obligations to the citizenry, it has been far too lenient, even in time of great national peril, in calling upon the citizens to reciprocate. It has said in effect: "Those of you who desire to do your duty may do so; others may do as they please," and the result has been that most of our wars have been unduly prolonged, and, before victory has been assured, it has been necessary for us to employ at least two men to every one used by our adversaries.

Mr. President, there is nothing in national compulsion repellent to democracy, provided the thing to be compelled is recognized as beneficial to the Nation. If there were, it would reject governmental regulation of the hours of labor, compulsory insurance, and compulsory education. A democracy like ours is made up of millions of units, and its success, in the final analysis, will be determined by the intelligence of these units. Therefore, we not only provide education at the public expense but compel it within reasonable limitations. If it is beneficial to the country that its citizens should be educated and educated as a result of compulsion, is it not equally desirable when the country needs defense that we should take those citizens who have been educated at the public expense and require them to defend what the world has agreed is the best form of government extant.

Moreover, a system of compulsory training should be established. The opposition of the opponents to compulsory training is based on the theory that it is not necessary, but when we come to a national crisis we immediately discover that there is no time for the preparation we should have made. Tyranny, not democracy, has always justified itself by suppressing discussion or action as unnecessary.

It is rather a curious statement, but true, nevertheless, that men who work for very different purposes in life have, through their studies, come to an entire agreement on the question of compulsory military service. While, as I have stated, most trained military men whether citizens of an autocracy or of a republic, are in favor of it—we have not expected the most radical pacifists to support it—we have been lead to believe that there was a vast difference of opinion on the question of compulsory military training and service among the peoples of those European countries where that system obtains, and that liberals and socialists were generally opposed to it. We hear substantially nothing from any such sources in opposition to the prosecution of the war or in detraction of the policy followed by their countries in preparation for it; indeed, compulsory service seems to have practically unanimous support in contiental European countries.

Such men as Vaillant and Jean Jaures, two of the most noted pacifists of France, long ago came to the conclusion that compulsory service was absolutely essential, and in his last days Jaures published a book which was a plea for compulsory military training based on the Swiss method, and advocated that it should commence as early as the age of 10. I quote the following from Jaures' book, and Jaures was one of the leading Socialists of Europe.

> A government which is demonstrably and genuinely a government of national defense, which can give proof of its reverence for law and justice, is entitled to call on every available man in time of need. The resentment which men feel at being obliged to leave their families will be directed against the aggressor and will strengthen their resolve to defend the country. It will be the duty of the country, defended by all its citizens, to provide for the families of those who fall in its defense.

Switzerland in the first week of the present war mobilized a force of 200,000 men, which would be equivalent to practically 6,000,000 in the United States; and in order to bring about a result so important it is necessary to take out of the working life of the citizen only a little more than six months. The Swiss system is one we could well afford to copy as far as it would directly apply to our conditions, for it is strictly defensive and intended simply for the defense of the country and not for the purpose of waging foreign wars.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. I understand the Senator's argument to be an argument in favor of universal military training. Does the Senator make no distinction between universal military training and the selective-draft system proposed by this bill?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, universal military training is simply a forerunner of the system which we should have in force, but which we have not. Every citizen should be trained, prepared, and compelled to serve his country in the way he can serve it best. It may not be in a military way; it may be in raising potatoes or serving as a United States Senator or in some other way. I am in favor of compelling everybody to do his share as a citizen of the Republic in maintaining the Government in time of need.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely; but——

Mr. WEEKS. Now, just let me go on one moment.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly. Pardon me.

Mr. WEEKS. I admit we are not in condition to do that to-day because we have had no universal-training law in operation. I hope there will be one; but why I am arguing in favor of this bill which is pending before the Senate is because I believe it is the only fair system to impose; and I think, if the Senator will do me the honor to listen to me, he will obtain my reasons for thinking so before I finish my address.

Mr. WATSON. I shall be very glad, of course, to listen to the Senator, but I thought that, in my own mind, at any rate, he was confusing universal military training with the idea of the selective draft, as embodied in this measure.

Mr. WEEKS. It is impossible to divorce universal military training and universal service.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely; one follows the other.

Mr. WEEKS. One follows the other.

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, we have not had universal training, and we want it—or most of us do—and we want universal service at this time. There ought not to be a single slacker in the United States. Either every man should be engaged in the military service or he should be engaged in some other way in supporting his Government at this time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield, if the Senator from Indiana has concluded.

Mr. REED. I do not want to break in on the chain of inquiry of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. I only desired to pursue the matter just one further step. I thoroughly agree with the Senator in his contention that it is entirely desirable from every standpoint that we should have universal military training, followed by universal military service; but we can not have universal service, except by the preliminary step of universal military training.

Mr. WEEKS. I disagree with the Senator in that respect entirely; and that is what we are trying to bring about now, so far as we can, by this legislation.

Mr. WATSON. I understand that this legislation simply proposes to go into each community and take out certain persons to be put in the Army, to be selected in a certain way, under a selective draft.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Now, whether a man is drafted or volunteers, he is still a raw recruit, is he not?

Mr. WEEKS. He is, or, at least, he may be.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; and he will have to go through precisely the same military training in order to become a soldier whether he is drafted or whether he volunteers?

Mr. WEEKS. He will.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely. So that there is nothing about the draft which makes a man a soldier by the mere act of being drafted?

Mr. WEEKS. Not at all.

Mr. WATSON. And, therefore, so far as obtaining immediate results are concerned, there is nothing sacred about the draft?

Mr. WEEKS. Not at all.

Mr. WATSON. Well, I wanted to get the Senator's viewpoint.

Mr. WEEKS. More than that, there is not only nothing sacred about the draft, but there is a great deal of prejudice against a draft. Now, however, we have an opportunity to do what those who have preceded us for 125 years have failed to do. We have an opportunity to establish what the whole world says is a correct military system; and why should we throw away this opportunity simply because for the moment we do not get better results than we would by following the old system?

Mr. REED. When did the whole world say that?

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator had been listening to me, and if he will do me that honor to listen to me until I finish, he may be able to get an answer to a question which evidently he has asked haphazard. I will say to the Senator that he can not find a single trained, competent military man in the world who is not in favor of universal training and of universal service.

Mr. REED. I can find the Senator one; I can cite him to one now, the best soldier in the United States to-day—Gen. Miles.

Mr. WATSON. Well, Mr. President, I rather agree with the Senator from Massachusetts in his contention; but that is not the selective-draft proposition which is favored in certain quarters: it is universal military training; and I think there is the greatest difference in the world, a chasm as wide as from the North Pole to the South Pole, between universal training and the selective-draft system proposed in this bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, let me make this suggestion to the Senator from Indiana: A selective-draft system is not ideal; it is going to take one man and not take another; but it is going to give every man a chance; and it is going to prevent the fellows who are standing around on the street corners down town—the slacker, who never does anything for his country—it is going to give him the same chance that the boy who is going to be a worthy citizen has to serve his country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. It is not going to take your boy and mine, necessarily, who may be fit and who may be prepared to make good citizens in the future, but it is going to give them an equal chance with every sluggard, every slacker, every fellow who is standing around the street corners and wasting his time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is going to take the boys of 25 and exclude the boys of 26.

Mr. WEEKS. It is.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is not universal; that is the most arrant discrimination and injustice.

Mr. WEEKS. There are good reasons for it, because the whole history of the world has demonstrated that the men who serve and serve best are under 25 years of age. There were only 46,000 men in the northern Army during our Civil War who were over 25 years of age when enlisted out of 2,600,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very true; but that great Army was organized of enlisted men, and was a magnificent Army.

Mr. WEEKS. It was when it came out of the war.

Mr. LODGE. They had four years' training.

Mr. GALLINGER. They could not have had four years' training before they enlisted, nor four days' training, any more than the conscripts under this bill can have.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that the Senator has covered it, and if he has I will read it in his speech—I have only come in in the last few moments—but I am very anxious to know how this bill links in with and fits into the proposition of universal training. It seems to me this is the very antithesis of universal training. It is by its terms limited to a very few and even to only a portion of those included between 19 and 25.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I think the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee would say to the Senator that it is his purpose to try to bring out of the Military Affairs Committee, before this session of Congress is over, a bill providing for universal training. It has not been attached to this bill for the very good reason that we can not commence to recruit our armies until Congress has decided how it shall be done, and therefore it did not seem desirable to involve that question in the legislation which is now pending.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; but what I want to get in my mind is in what respect am I indorsing universal service by voting for a bill which provides for a selective draft?

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator is indorsing it in this way—that every man stands his chance of being selected and of serving in some capacity, if we follow it by requiring certain men to work in munitions factors, certain men to work on the farm, and certain men to do other things.

Mr. BORAH. You could do that under the volunteer system. Canada has done it.

Mr. WEEKS. Well, Mr. President, I noticed this morning, that these regiments in the city of Washington, right under the shadow of the Capitol, are short 644 men, and that since the 1st day of April only 104 men have been enlisted. In other words, it will take nearly nine months to enlist the National Guard regiments in the city of Washington up to maximum requirements, if we follow the volunteer system.

Mr. WATSON. But after all——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I make a statement——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield, and to whom?

Mr. WEEKS. I have been pretty liberal in yielding. I am quite willing to yield for questions, and I am desirous of bringing out any objections to anything I have said or may say, but I do think I should yield to one Senator at a time, and just now I have yielded to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask only one more question. I am not asking these questions to combat the Senator's position.

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, I understand.

Mr. BORAH. I have been wholly unable to reconcile this bill with the propaganda which has been going on for the last year and a half for universal training and universal military service, and I should like to have the Senator—who is not only a member of the committee but peculiarly fitted to discuss this question—enlighten some of us as to how and wherein we are in any sense aiding universal military training and universal military service by voting for a selective draft, which contemplates, in the first place, limiting it to men from 19 to 25 and, in the second place, selecting a very few of the men between those ages. Now, you might go into a neighborhood where there were 10 boys and select 1. He would get his military training, while the other 9 would be in the same position that they were before.

Mr. WEEKS. Well, Mr. President, there are practical reasons why this can not be made any more comprehensive. It is estimated that we require at this time a million men. There would be probably, between the ages of 19 and 25, 6,000,000 men. We could not arm and equip 6,000,000 men with our present system inside of three years. What nonsense it would be to make a draft which would cover all of the men suitable for military service within those ages and have them taken away from their normal employments and not be able to arm and equip them or make any military use of them. Therefore it is necessary to take a portion of them rather than all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the statement was read into the RECORD on Saturday by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] that under the volunteer system of Great Britain there went from the factories and from the manufacturing enterprises of the country practically all of the available men, with the result that after they did get an army they had to bring back all of these men.

Mr. WEEKS. That undoubtedly is true, Mr. President, and it was especially true of men connected with steamships or any other water service.

Mr. BORAH. But that has not happened in Canada.

Mr. WEEKS. Men employed along the water front went into the naval reserve and became at once attached to the Government operations to such a degree that for a time it was impossible to discharge steamers which had landed at Liverpool and other British ports. We want to prevent that. We do not want to take men away from the factories that are making munitions or clothing or doing the other things which are just as necessary to the Government as the actual military service which this bill contemplates.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. This bill does create, does it not, a universal liability to military service between the ages of 19 and 25?

Mr. WEEKS. Absolutely so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is, except for certain exemptions contained in the bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Now I should like to have an opportunity to go on with my remarks. I was speaking of the Swiss system when I was interrogated. This system is not only compulsory and general but it is democratic in that all promotions result from competition and all ordinary social qualifications are removed. The Swiss system has the approval of those responsible for military affairs and government in Switzerland, and it meets the approval of all classes to such an extent that the rejection of a recruit on account of physical disqualifications or other reasons is looked on as a disaster.

The attitude of Liberals and Socialists in Belgium on this question is not different from that in France and Switzerland. There, after long discussion, the Liberals took the lead in advocating universal service and they were supported by substantially the entire Socialist Party. The opposition came from Conservatives.

We all know that in this country a man wearing the uniform of a United States soldier or sailor is tabooed in many places. This was once the condition in Europe, but since the adoption of universal service in European countries the uniform is universally respected, and many social benefits have resulted from the intercourse of men of all classes, rich and poor, during their periods of military training. One of the greatest "outs" about the English Territorials, and one which it is almost impossible to disconnect from a similar service, is the frequent distinction of birth and wealth between an officer and a private. That is impossible in a universal-service system.

Jaures said in one of his articles on the subject of universal training that a volunteer army for France was as undesirable and unthinkable as voluntary taxation. In referring to the political phase of the question, he said:

> Any political party which is too cowardly to demand from the nation the sacrifices which are necessary to its life and its liberties is beneath contempt, and can not survive.

Vaillant has said that—> universal service is one natural and inevitable direction of true democratic development.

To demonstrate to the Senate that the opinions of the European workingman are no different from those of the wage-earners of this country who have given the subject consideration, I wish to read the following extract from an editorial which appeared in a recent edition of one of the New York papers:

ORGANIZED LABOR ACTED WISELY IN INDORSING COMPULSORY UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING.

The declaration in favor of compulsory universal military training by the representatives of organized labor is a momentous event in the history of our country. It signifies the abandonment of the opposition to preparedness by the workingmen of the country; or rather it signifies the victory of the workingmen of the country over the opposition to improper methods of preparedness.

The workingmen have always very wisely opposed that preparedness which is based upon a large standing army of professional soldiers. They knew instinctively that there was danger to the country in a large standing army of professional soldiers. And it is largely due to the weight of their wise influence that military preparedness in this country has not taken the direction of an increase in the size of our professional army. A great standing army of professional soldiers would be dangerous to our internal liberties and ineffective as a defense from danger from outside.

But universal compulsory military training is an entirely different thing. Liberty was never endangered by a citizen soldiery, but liberty has many, many times been preserved by a body of trained citizens called from all walks of life to render service in the hour of need for which they had been amply trained.

In the history of the world the trained citizen soldiers have made the best armies. Never have they been conquered, when thoroughly trained, by any professional soldiers. In all nations and at all times they have conquered their enemies when their enemies have been professional soldiers. Thus they have proved themselves to be the best and most efficient defense against foreign foes.

But while the professional soldier has been a weak defense against the stranger and a source of danger to the country which employed him, the citizen soldier has not only been a source of strength and security to his nation from foreign attack, but has been a great bulwark in preserving the liberties of his country from dangers from within.

In many countries the opposition to compulsory service has been under the general characterization of calling it Prussianism or militarism. Militarism can not exist in any country where the military as a class is not exalted above the civilian. The theory that teaching a man to defend himself, to shoot, and to drill with precision puts in him a desire to fight and that every man wearing a soldier's uniform has that desire is absolutely without foundation. A complete answer to such an assertion can be found by inquiry of those men who have fought in our wars. Ask any old veteran af the Civil War whether the numerous battles in which he fought created in him a desire to fight or a disgust for war. In ninety-nine out of a hundred cases it will be found that the latter was the result of his military service. It has been charged that Army and Navy officers are desirous of bringing about war because of their desire to fight. Exactly the opposite is the case. Practically all of them would be glad to avoid war, but they know the only way to fight effectively is to be prepared for it, and that is the reason they defend suitable preparation. They are not deluded by the theory that because a man is patriotic or physically strong, or any other equally specious reason, he is a prepared soldier or sailor. They know that exactly the reverse is true; hence their desire to change raw material into a finished product.

The only countries in which militarism may be said to exist are Japan and Prussia. In Japan militarism has existed from days immemorial—the samurai and his successor of the present day have been in a higher social class than the civilians engaged in professions and trade. To some extent the same condition has obtained in Prussia. Many people who have visited Germany within the last 15 or 20 years have testified that the military class has been dominating and domineering; that it has not respected civil employments or employees; that there has been no discrimination in the brutal manner in which the soldier has treated the civilian; and that he has been supported and protected by the constituted authorities in following this course.

We all agree that the one great object to be obtained in the world is peace. We all hope that the time will come when armies and navies will be superseded by an international court of arbitration. As a practical proposition, however, the prospects in this direction are not promising. There are almost insurmountable barriers between us and the realization of our dream of world-wide peace. One of the difficulties of first importance is that every strong nation prefers to depend upon its own military resources instead of placing itself at the mercy of some international tribunal. Arbitration of differences between nations means the willingness of the nations concerned to reach some agreement. When one nation refuses to agree, that is the end of arbitration. Furthermore, some time before the present war began, the great powers participating in The Hague conference decided not to arbitrate certain important questions. Until our dream of world-wide peace comes true, we must be prepared to protect ourselves.

The extreme pacifists of to-day are decrying preparedness. They claim that the mere act of preparing ourselves to properly defend our shores from an invading enemy tends to militarism Because of their fear of militarism they prefer to let the other nations of the world prepare and the United States remain totally unprepared, trusting that we will not be attacked. History has taught me one thing: If we are going to trust anybody, I prefer to trust ourselves—even at the risk of having to cope with that terrible menace militarism which is causing the pacifists so much anxiety—rather than trust some great powerful nation to leave us alone in our weakness.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, I do not believe that a country governed by the people, as is the case in the United States, need fear militarism. It is true that large standing armies are dangerous to the peace of a country where the power to use that force is vested in a few persons. A few persons can not declare war in the United States. Before war can be declared a majority of the House of Representatives and the Senate must vote in favor of it.

The first person to resent militarism, exalting the military above the civil, is the private citizen, and the Constitution places in his hands the power to decree whether or not militarism shall exist; in fact, there is no institution of our Government—military or naval—which is not dependent upon the approbation of a majority of our citizens.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suggest to the Senator, too, that there is another shield against militarism, and that is the fact that Congress can only make an appropriation for the Army for two years, and in the meantime the Members of Congress have to go back to the people and be reelected.

Mr. WEEKS. That is quite true.

Opponents of universal military training have frequently charged that such a system is undemocratic and un-American and should not be tolerated in this country. To that charge I reply that nothing is un-American which a majority of the American people, after mature deliberation, decide is for the good of the country and desire to see enacted into law. If I correctly understand the principles which inspired the foundation of the Republic, the Congress of the United States reaches the utmost pinnacle of democracy and Americanism when it heeds the voice of the people and puts into effect such legislation as that voice demands. There is no doubt in my own mind as to what the people demand in this instance or what they would demand if they were correctly informed or given the time to study the question.

While expressions of opinion by individuals, even those in high official position, do not necessarily represent the final popular verdict, they do as nearly as any agency can express the popular will, so I wish to submit to the Senate the names of 383 mayors of cities of over 5,000 population, in all parts of the country, representing a total of 19,203,050 inhabitants, who are unqualified and enthusiastic advocates of universal training and service. I ask consent to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Three hundred and eighty-three mayors of cities of over 5,000 population, in all parts of the country and representing a total of 19,203,050 inhabitants, are unqualified and enthusiastic advocates of universal military training. The list follows:

Maine: Charles P. Lemaire, Lewiston; John F. Woodman, Bangor; F. H. Nickerson, Brewer; H. Shall, Houlton; Samuel J. Mitchell, Sanford; and Frederic E. Boothby, Waterville.

New Hampshire: Fred N. Beckwith, Dover; A. A. Beaton, Franklin; and George T. Munsey, Laconia.

Vermont: Adelbert W. Braisted, Burlington; F. Mitchell, Montpelier; and James E. Timmons, Winooski.

Washington: C. A. Fleming, Spokane; Milton Evans, Vancouver; A. M. Muir, Bellingham; and Jesse T. Mills, Olympia.

Oregon, F. T. Woodman, Los Angeles; C. L. Palmer, Baker; C. B. Lankin, Ashland; F. C. Harley, Astoria; and W. A. Belle, Eugene.

California: F. T. Woodman, Los Angeles; Edwin M. Capps, San Diego; Samuel C. Irving, Berkeley; Alva E. Snow, Fresno; F. H. Bartlett, Alameda; George Hay, Bakersfield; E. J. Doussel, Napa; E. J. Garrard, Richmond; Oscar Ford, Riverside; G. H. Wixom, San Bernardino; Willis M. Slasson, Santa Barbara; and S. L. Berkley, Santa Monica.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, Switzerland is one of the best examples of the improbability that preparation involves militarism. Switzerland is completely surrounded by first-class powers; and yet, it has maintained its independence, its democratic institutions, its self-respect, and it has had universal service for more than 70 years.

Practically every Republic in South America has a compulsory military law on its statute books; yet we have heard no suggestion that universal service has developed a militarism in those countries or a desire to wage war. The Argentine system is an illustration of what is being done in those countries. In Argentina the law provides for obligatory military service between the ages of 20 and 45, and there are practically no exemptions, except for physical disability.

I have received a very large number of letters and communications in advocacy of universal training and I quote the following from the letter of a well-known citizen of New York, who expresses in strong terms his views in favor of this form of military preparation:

> There is more objection to it in Congress than elsewhere. Universal training and universal but selective conscription is mighty popular among the people I talk with, because it is so universally democratic and the only fair way. Every one of these slackers and pacifists would be united in declaring for his equal rights—that is, rights equal with those of any other man, rights equal because of American laws and American institutions—but if it comes to a question of equal duties and equality of obligations, these people would, many of them, prove to be slackers and dodgers.
> It is all very well to say that you interfere with individual freedom of action, but to thrust the burden-bearing of the whole country upon the shoulders of our very best—those who would come forward and volunteer—is certainly just as unjust as it would be to permit a chosen few to enjoy all the rights and privileges possible under the American flag and all it represents.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to ask the Senator, since he has made a number of references to what is popularly known as the slacker, if he considers the slacker morally deficient?

Mr. WEEKS. Well, Mr. President, I had not thought of it in exactly that way.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator knows that this bill exempts the morally deficient from the operation of the law.

Mr. WEEKS. That being the case, I do not consider him morally deficient.

Mr. THOMAS. I presume that for the purposes of this bill the Senator would include him as an individual subject to its terms?

Mr. WEEKS. I think so.

Mr. THOMAS. To my mind this is a remarkable bill in that it seems to me to exempt the very class the existence of which is one of the strongest arguments that the Senator is using in favor of this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it not a fact, from the Senator's observation and experience, that slackers are usually more than 25 years of age?

Mr. WEEKS. Not necessarily at all. If the Senator will take the trouble to walk down Pennsylvania Avenue between 5 and 6 o'clock in the evening he can see 500 or more almost any time.

Mr. McKELLAR. They are all over 25 years, and you are going to exempt those under the terms of this bill.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator is mistaken; they are not generally over 25.

Mr. McKELLAR. Most of them are.

Mr. WEEKS. Most of them are under that age.

I wish to add one further comment, because I think it is particularly pertinent and very well said. It is one of the strongest pleas for compulsory service which I have seen. It comes from Hon. Leslie M. Shaw, formerly Secretary of the Treasury. He says:

> Whatever number of men we raise I hope will be conscripted, for I want to see the ranks of the wealthy and the ranks of the poor, the ranks of the old American stock and the ranks of every shade and description of hyphenates, the ranks of the patriotic and the ranks of the pacifists, the good stuff within all ranks and the worthless stuff within each rank, to contribute proportionately.

The essence of the substance of this bill is stated there in those lines.

John Stuart Mill, in his essay on loyalty, almost every word of which could be used as an argument in favor of the principle of requiring the citizen to perform military as well as other service to the State, uses this language:

> If anyone does an act hurtful to others, there is a prima facie case for punishing him by law, or, where legal penalties are not safely applicable, by general disapprobation. There are also many positive acts for the benefit of others which he may rightfully be compelled to perform, such as to give evidence in a court of justice, to bear his fair share in the common defense, or in any other joint work necessary to the interest of the society of which he enjoys the protection; * * *. Though society is not founded on a contract, and though no good purpose is answered by inventing a contract in order to deduce social obligations from it, everyone who receives the protection of society owes a return for the benefit, and the fact of living in society renders it indispensable that each should be bound to observe a certain line of conduct toward the rest. This conduct consists * * * in each person bearing his share (to be fixed on some equitable principle) of the labors and sacrifices incurred for defending the society or its members from injury and molestation. These conditions society is justified in enforcing at all costs to those who endeavor to withhold fulfillment.

Mr. President, the United States is at war. Let us suppose for the moment that we are face to face with this possibility: We are about to be invaded by a vast army, a highly organized and efficient body of men. We have no reserve of trained men to recruit our existing organizations, bringing them to war strength and maintaining them during war at this effective strength, and consequently additional volunteer regiments will have to be called for, for troops must somehow be provided. As in the past, the patriotic young boys will join and go to the front. In every war we have ever had these volunteers—green boys, under inexperienced officers—lose from 22 to 28 per cent of their regimental strength in their concentration camps before ever actually going into a campaign, so a regiment of 1,600 will in a short time probably have lost 400. It will then be ordered to the front and in six months will have lost 40 per cent, and thus be reduced to 720 men. As there are no trained men to supply this wastage another 1,600-strength regiment will be raised and go through the same course, incurring the same losses, while the officers and men are learning the A B C's of the soldier's profession—that of keeping themselves well, properly fed, and properly supplied.

Such was the experience of our past wars, and such will be the experience of any future war fought by these volunteer soldiers. Can mothers and fathers of this Nation appreciate that the deaths of many of their sons are due to the ignorance of their officers and to the lack of training in their boys? Many a boy has become sick and has died from preventable disease because he did not know how to take care of himself and his officers were too ignorant to show him. Many a boy has been needlessly slaughtered by bullets and exposure because led by untrained officers.

Mr. President, I believe every real American man and boy stands ready to answer the call of his country, and I believe that every real American father and mother are willing to have their sons answer this call. Can not these same American fathers and mothers appreciate the fact that if their sons have received military training and are led by competent officers their chances of returning home alive are a hundredfold better than if they had received no training and are led by incompetents? If these sons do not return home, are not their parents better fortified to bear the burden of their grief knowing that their sons died on the field of battle, that their sacrifice was worth while, and that they rendered their country a service than if they had died in a concentration camp from some preventable disease, contracted through ignorance and lack of training? Moreover, how is the father and mother of a promising boy, one who quite likely would occupy an important place in life, to justify his sacrifice when they see the coward, the slacker, and the selfish in their midst who have made no effort to aid their country?

I have no patience with the sentiment which pervades that song, I Did Not Raise My Boy To Be a Soldier. I do not believe it represents American womanhood. I do not believe it represents anything but a skulking low desire to avoid responsibility. I prefer the sentiment expressed in an incident which took place in the town of Twin Falls, Idaho, recently. I happened to see an account of it in the New York Times. I do not propose to read it all; but a Mrs. Erwin, who had listened to some pacifist argument, made a speech which I think should be given general circulation:

> I have lived in peace and quiet under the Stars and Stripes for almost 50 years. I have helped to build a home and rear my children in this great land of splendid churches, schools, and institutions, and in all this time no sacrifice for my country was ever asked of me until now. Can I do less than give my boy?
> Let us send our boys with cheers and as few tears as possible. When one of our boys stands on lonely guard duty at night, thinking of home, let us be glad to have him say, as he remembers how mother cheered his going:
> "Gosh! Wasn't mother a great old sport? Didn't she buck up fine?"

That is the kind of sentiment I believe that moves the American mother and what they want to demonstrate to their sons. I recall very well an incident that took place on the U. S. S. Ranger after she had captured the Drake and had taken her into a French port. She had among her crew an 11-year-old boy. His name was John Downes. A visitor to the ship, seeing this small boy, said to him, "My boy, why did your mother let you go?" His reply was, "My mother did not let me go; she sent me." That is the kind of spirit that is the opposite of "I didn't raise my boy to be a soldier." That is the kind of spirit which I believe is in the breast of the American women.

There are undoubtedly many Members of Congress and many people in civil life who favor the volunteer system—it is a time-honored method of raising an army—but how would such advocates feel about a volunteer system of war taxation? There are men who have the habit of giving; they are free spenders of their incomes, and many of them feel the responsibility of their citizenship to such a degree that they pay their taxes with the same willingness that they contribute to any other public cause; but no one believes an attempt to establish a voluntary system of taxation would result in equality or justice or even in raising anything like sufficient revenue to carry on the Government. What would the average citizen say to giving to any of the well-known rich men of the country the privilege of paying taxes to support the Government in case of war or refraining from doing so, as he might see fit? He would say that the country can not trust to disinterested patriotism in the raising of taxes. No one would be simple enough to advocate such a plan, and yet the net result of a volunteer system in obtaining men does not greatly differ. The patriotic, the adventurer, the lover of excitement, and those men having an inclination to military life will be the ones to respond, and the other classes will be glad to have them to do so, because it will relieve them of their obligations to the Government. If the Government can not obtain revenue to run it in time of war by voluntary action, the same result will be bound to follow any attempt to obtain sufficient men, and from everyone's viewpoint, except to those who wish to raise units of volunteers for some specific reason, the universal training and service system is the correct one to follow.

There is another reason why volunteering is inequitable. It has been the experience of the past, I think almost without variation, that volunteering in the country districts is much greater than in the large cities. It is much easier to bring before the people of the country districts the requirements of the Government and to develop sentiment in those sections which will bring about a volunteer movement. Almost invariably in the past the recruiting officers have come across this situation. Perhaps it is due, to some degree, to the fact that a much larger percentage of the population of cities are recent immigrants, while people living in the country are naturally agriculturists, are more likely to become property holders, and thereby more readily recognize and accept the duties of citizenship. This being true, it naturally follows that if we depend on the volunteer system there is going to be an unequal contribution from the residents of the country, a most unfair and unreasonable result in itself and extremely harmful under present conditions.

when one of our greatest requirements will be a sufficient food supply.

In the United States there are unusual reasons for the establishment of a universal training system which do not exist in many other countries or in many other democracies. During the last 25 years we have received a vast number of immigrants, largely made up of men who have had no lesson and, to some degree, no instruction in loyalty to our American institutions, and many of them have come here not to assume but escape national duty. They have lived under a system of government where compulsion meant service to a sovereign and they are unable to appreciate the difference between service of that kind and compulsion to serve a commonwealth—that the latter simply represents the deliberate voluntary choice of the people of whom they are one. Therefore, from the standpoint of the desirability of the assimilation of these citizens, it is well that they should appreciate their obligation to the country they have chosen as their home.

Alan Seeger, a native of Massachusetts and one of those spirited young Americans who has been helping to repay the debt we have owed France for 135 years for the part she took in obtaining our independence, and who lost his life "somewhere in France," witnessing the complaisance, not to say criminal neglect, with which we have followed our own affairs and in failing to prepare ourselves for what has been demonstrated to be the inevitable, wrote a message to America, a part of which I shall read:

You have the grit and the guts, I know;
You are ready to answer blow for blow;
You are virile, combative, stubborn, hard,
But your honor ends with your own back yard.
Each man intent on his private goal,
You have no feeling for the whole.
What singly none would tolerate
You let unpunished hit the State,
Unmindful that each man must share
The stain he lets his country wear
And (what no traveler ignores)
That her good name is often yours.

Not by rough tongues and ready fists
Can you hope to tilt in the modern lists.
The armies of a littler folk
Shall pass you under the victor's yoke.
So be it a nation that trains her sons
To ride their horses and point their guns;
So be it a people that comprehends
The limit where private pleasure ends
And where their public dues begin,
A people made strong by discipline,
Who are willing to give—what you've no mind to—
And understand—what you are blind to—
The things that the individual
Must sacrifice for the good of all.

And then he made this appeal:

O friends, in your fortunate present ease
(Yet faced by the self-same facts as these)
If you would see how a race can soar,
That has no love, but no fear, of war,
How each can turn from his private rôle,
That all may act as a perfect whole,
How men can live up to the place they claim
And a nation, jealous of its good name,
Be true to its proud inheritance,
Oh, look over here and learn from France.

Can we not take this appeal, so graphically presented, to ourselves? Are we going to be a failure as a nation, governed by prejudice rather than reason, and do the thing which for the moment may seem to be popular, but which is really contrary to every principle of our Government? Can we not rise to the occasion presented to us, convert ourselves from individuals to a whole, and demonstrate that we have all the elements of real patriotism? We should not fail to follow the example of France and every up-to-date nation in the organization of our military forces and to take advantage of this opportunity to establish what will in years to come be of immeasurable benefit to our descendants; that is, a system of military preparation and training which will adequately protect the life of the Republic.

Mr. WADSWORTH obtained the floor.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator from Minnesota desires to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts, I yield to him.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks any amendment of this act is necessary to accomplish what he suggested, allowing in the various units the service of men from the various States and communities together.

Mr. WEEKS. I think that might be done, Mr. President. There is a question now raised about volunteers and there is a disposition on the part of some of our citizens to serve in the way they want to serve but not in the way they should serve. We need 500,000 men in our Regular Army and National Guard. They can enlist for the duration of the war. They are going to serve under the best trained officers there are in those two services, and yet they object to volunteering in this way because they say that they want to serve their country in the way they think best. The best way is the way our military experts have indicated. Probably it is not the way the amateur would prescribe. If the men are really patriotic and wish to serve, there is an opportunity for 500,000 to enlist at once.

Mr. KELLOGG. I quite agree with the Senator. I thought he said in his speech——

Mr. WEEKS. I did say that in forming a new army the additional 500,000 men could very well be segregated so that those from a State would serve in the same organization.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does not the Senator think it is advisable to immediately supplement this legislation by a bill for universal military training?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. At once?

Mr. WEEKS. I certainly do.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator does not agree with the recommendation of the Secretary of War that we should not do it during this war?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know what his recommendation is, but if he recommended that I do not agree with it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think he so stated. Does the Senator know of any reason why it should be put off until after the war?

Mr. WEEKS. I am in favor of doing it at once.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it not a fact that universal military service in this country at any time would be a mere name; that it would be only a selective service at best?

Mr. WEEKS. Universal military service in a military capacity?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is what I mean.

Mr. WEEKS. It must be selective, because there are a large number of men who for one reason and another will be employed for other useful purposes.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is not intended at any time to have all those serve of military age and qualification.

Mr. WEEKS. Of course not.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I make a suggestion to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have the floor, but I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish to point out just one thing, if the Senator will permit me. The bill authorizes the President to make such distribution that he may confine the men from any one State to regiments or divisions from that State. In other words, he can call them all together, and I think that has always been the policy of every administration, and it would be the policy of any President who had the best interests of the service at heart.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. WEEKS. I have yielded the floor.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator from New York permit me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly, with the understanding that I may obtain recognition.

Mr. KENYON. I heard nearly all the address of the Senator from Massachusetts, but he may have answered the question I wish to ask him. I should like to know if the Senator is entirely satisfied with the age limit prescribed.

Mr. WEEKS. I have never voted for a bill since I have been in Congress that I was entirely satisfied with. I might change many things in this bill if I were going to follow my own individual inclination. My judgment is that the boy who should be trained originally is the boy whose age is 19 years, and yet there are reasons why that should not be done, because one boy of 19 has frequently developed to a greater degree than another boy of 21. So there must be exceptions. But wars are fought by young men, and we say 19 years because that is naturally the period when the boy is passing from high school into employment or into college, and it would interfere less with his normal requirements than if he entered later.

Mr. KENYON. We will not get the slacker we hear so much about unless the age limit is raised.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator means above 25?

Mr. KENYON. Above 25.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think there is any age limit to the slacker. I think all ages contain the slacker. Even those of our age contain slackers, and I should like to put the slackers of our age out on the farm and see that they raised potatoes or something else.

Mr. KENYON. Then, the Senator believes that as to the unmarried men there should be a difference in the age?

Mr. WEEKS. Quite likely.

Mr. KENYON. Why should not the bill be modified so that the unmarried man can be taken, say, to 40 or 45 and let them go into this list of the draft? When a man reaches 40 he ought to be married, or he ought to be reconciled to war, anyhow.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not in a hurry. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. In regard to that matter, on which I have noticed there has been some question, in every army in Europe, if I am not mistaken, they take their youngest men from the first line. They are men who form the bulk of the army in active service. When the war comes the men under 25 are sent. Then up to 45 they are called in the respective lines. It is the universal practice to take the young men first. This is nothing new. It is simply following the line which, I think, has been adopted in all the systems of the world.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, an incident happened this morning during the morning hour which I believe should enable us to measure the extent and the scale of our efforts in this war. The Senate adopted a report of the conference committee having in charge the adjustment of the differences between the House and the Senate on the bill providing for the issuance of $7,000,000,000 of bonds and certificates of indebtedness. That bill goes, of course, immediately to the President, and without any question whatsoever it will receive his signature and become a law. It is the largest authorization for expenditures in our history, and I think it is the largest single authorization in the history of all nations. It indicates, if it indicates nothing else, that America intends to wage this war in earnest and to the full extent of her power and resources.

We all know the composition, generally speaking, of the Navy. We know the nature of its organization. We know that the Navy has been kept modernized and up to a high degree of efficiency. We know that it can not be greatly expanded upon a moment's notice; that probably, for the purpose of this war, it will not be greatly expanded; that with the exception of the creation of special services the Navy of the United States is ready, and that no legislation of great and far-reaching importance is necessary with respect to the Naval Establishment.

When we come, however, to judge of the effectiveness and the adequateness of the Army of the United States we find an entirely different state of affairs, and it is in the creation of an army capable of bearing its part in this war that America will make its most gigantic efforts.

It must not be forgotten, Mr. President, that we are building for great events; and that when we set out to build an army which shall be competent to meet the supreme test of those events we must start practically de novo and build from the ground up. It will not suffice for us Americans to stand here and be content with the building of an army, or rather the hasty throwing together of an army, merely for the purpose of our continental defense. We can not afford to proceed upon the assumption that the time will not come when American troops will be needed in France or upon other European battle fields. If we are to exercise a requisite degree of prudence and foresight and incidentally maintain our self-respect we must assume, in our preparations, that the sending of an American force across the Atlantic Ocean is inevitable. If we will get that assumption thoroughly grounded in our minds and prepare ourselves mentally and spiritually in that respect, then we will be better prepared to build a real army which shall be competent to carry the heaviest burden which may be placed upon it. Events may not come to such a pass, but we must not choose the easiest way. We are not the masters of events.

In creating a great military force which shall represent the power and the spirit of the United States, naturally, we must first make use of the weapons we have. This bill provides for such use. Our thought at first turns, of course, to the Regular Establishment, which upon April 1 last in its combatant force numbered in the neighborhood of 105,000 men. Since April 1 something like 25,000 men have been enlisted in the Regular Army, and it now contains about 130,000 men.

The bill provides, however, that the five-year increment laid out in the national-defense act of June 3, 1916, shall be accomplished during this one year. Accordingly the Regular Army will be raised to a fighting strength of 270,000. This is to be done by accepting volunteers; and in the event the President makes up his mind that volunteers are not forthcoming with sufficient alacrity, he is authorized under the terms of this act to fill the Regular Army up to the maximum war strength of 270,000 by the imposition of the draft.

When we contemplate, however, this great expansion of the Regular Army we must remember one or two phases of that expansion. In order to accomplish the five-year increase of the Army from approximately 130,000 men to double that number, it will be necessary to very considerably increase the number of units in the Regular Army. For example, I think there are to-day 37 or 38 regiments of Infantry. With the five-year increment completed and the maximum war strength accomplished, there must be, as I remember, 64 regiments of Infantry, and a like increase in the number of units must take place in all other branches, such as Cavalry, Field Artillery, Engineers, and so forth. So it will be necessary while we are expanding our most perfect instrument to split in two every existing regiment of the Regular Army, take half, or approximately half, the men and assign them to new regiments to form a nucleus of veterans around which new recruits may be clustered and receive their training, and be thereby the more rapidly trained as efficient soldiers. So within the next six months the Regular Army of the United States will pass through this phase of enlargement and expansion, and in a short time—what the period will be I can not tell—the Regular Army will be practically unrecognizable as compared with what it is to-day. It will be doubled in size; it will have a large number of additional units, half of them veterans and half of them, or approximately half of them, more or less green recruits.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to suggest to the Senator that that assumes, of course, that we are going to get the men by voluntary enlistment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We are going to get them, whether they volunteer or not.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is determined in this bill, if it shall pass.

Mr. KELLOGG. I mean for the next three or four months.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For the next three or four months.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator know whether or not we are now getting the men by enlistment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I said a few moments ago that my understanding was that the total number of enlistments in the Regular Army since April 1—which was approximately the date of the declaration of war, or a little bit before that time—is in the neighborhood of 25,000 men.

Mr. KELLOGG. How long will it take to secure the aggregate number at that rate of enlistment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not quick at arithmetic, but it will be seen that it will take many, many months to recruit to 270,000 men at the rate of 25,000 a month. However, when the program has been finally settled by Congress and enacted into a statute, to be followed by a proclamation by the President, I look for an increase in voluntary enlistments. To-day thousands of young men do not know what the military policy of the Government is; and it is not surprising that they do not know, because the Government has none.

Mr. President, I was about to say that this expansion of the regular force will very largely increase the number of the commissioned personnel. Officers in command of companies, batteries, and troops of the Regular Army have already been requested to send to the War Department the names of enlisted men who are under their command and who, in their judgment, are qualified to receive commissions in the expanded force. We shall find at the end of a few months that many a sergeant and many a corporal will be holding commissions as second lieutenants in the expanded Regulars or in other forces.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York a question for information?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. My understanding is, though I may be mistaken, that after this bill providing for a selective draft shall have been passed, if men volunteer the township or the precinct upon which there is a draft imposed will get credit for the volunteers who have enlisted; that is, the number who so volunteer will be credited on their draft quota.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true.

Mr. NELSON. That is my understanding. So that, after we pass this bill, in a township we will say, where there are five called for under the selective draft, if five men volunteer, the township will have filled its quota, will it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It will.

Mr. NELSON. So that the door for volunteering is open.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The door, Mr. President, is wide open. It is wide open to men who desire—and I should think that sensible men would desire it—to join units already organized and suitably officered.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from New York says that the door is open for volunteers; but does not the Senator think there would be a wide difference in the joining of volunteers if there were a call for volunteers to serve during the war, instead of asking them to join the Regular Army or to become members of the National Guard when it is almost impossible now to get out those organizations when one once enlists?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Idaho forgets that, as already stated by the War Department, the enlistment period carried in this act for the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the selective draft is for the emergency only.

Mr. BORAH. That is true; but is it not true that one can only enlist now to become a member of the Regular Army or the National Guard?

Mr. WADSWORTH. A man may enlist now, Mr. President, and become a member of the Regular Army for the duration of the war.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And may enlist in the National Guard to become a member of that branch of the service—which, incidentally, is to be thoroughly absorbed into the United States forces—for the duration of the war. They will be on a parity with the 500,000 men who are to be raised by the selective draft. All are treated exactly alike in the enlistment contract. That, to my mind, is one of the most valuable provisions of this bill, for it will give us a homogeneous army. There will be no enlistments expiring during the period of the war, and all the men who have enlisted subsequent to April 1 last at the conclusion of the war will be entitled to return to their homes.

As I was saying, Mr. President, a large number of sergeants and corporals of the Regular Army, and I dare say many privates, before this war is over will be serving as commissioned officers. The chances for promotion which are offered to an enterprising and intelligent and industrious young man who will take this opportunity of joining a unit that is already trained are greater than have ever been offered to the young men in the United States Army.

The same thing must be said also of the National Guard, as it is to be treated under this bill, and that ought to be thoroughly understood. The existing units of the National Guard under the terms of this bill are to be raised to maximum war strength. That will provide a force of approximately 330,000 men, practically double the number of the present National Guard. Those recruits will be accepted on the volunteer principle unless and until the President makes up his mind that the total of 330,000 can not be promptly obtained under that plan. In that event the existing units of the National Guard will be filled by the operation of the selective draft. And the Guard is to receive further treatment of a military nature which, in my judgment, is a very healthy one, and which I am sure the Senator from Idaho will agree to. Under the national-defense act of June 3, 1916, an effort was made to federalize the National Guard. In my judgment the Congress went about three-quarters of the distance. I am sorry they did not go the whole distance. I would have voted to have made the National Guard completely Federal in every respect; and I hope at some future time, when the discussion of these emergency measures is over, that I shall have such an opportunity.

The President has the authority, of course, to muster into the United States service the National Guard or the Organized Militia; but there has been grave doubt as to whether or not the President has the right under the Constitution to send these men outside of the United States. In the consideration of that very question during the session of Congress last year a provision was incorporated in the national-defense act, known as section 111, which authorizes the President, when the United States is in need of greater forces than are provided for by the Regular Army and in time of war, to draft the National Guard, complete and entire, into the Federal service. This bill provides for the drafting of the National Guard. In addition to being mustered into the United States service, they are to be drafted into the United States service as a collection of individuals; but the Secretary of War assured the Committee on Military Affairs that it would be the policy, and that it was certainly the desire of the War Department, not to break up the existing units of the National Guard when they were drafted as individuals. So the operation will practically amount to this: We will say that the First Minnesota—which I will say, incidentally, is one of the finest Infantry regiments in the United States—will be mustered into the United States service.

Mr. NELSON. I think they are already mustered in.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Minnesota tells me that they are already mustered into the United States service. The colonel of the First Minnesota Infantry will receive an order to parade his regiment. They will leave their quarters and march on parade, and the order of the President of the United States drafting the regiment, complete and entire, into the Federal service will be read to the men; the regiment will then march back to its quarters completely federalized, with all connection with the State of Minnesota severed, and in exactly the same condition, in a military sense, as is the Regular Army and as will be the 500,000 men to be raised by the selective draft.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, would that be any different than if the President should find that number of men out upon the commons somewhere and should draft them into service?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It would be much different, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. Except that they have had training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They have had about eight months on the Texas border, and are a very valuable unit.

Mr. BORAH. But the President must draft them as individuals.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He must. I thought I said quite distinctly that the individuals are to be drafted, but that the units will not be broken up. The policy of the War Department recognizes that that would be a very unwise thing from a military standpoint. As a matter of fact, the muster rolls of that regiment and of every other National Guard regiment would simply show on their face that on such and such a day the men—naming them—had been drafted into the Federal service. The machinery is automatic and does not disturb the existing units.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. The National Guard, having been completely federalized by this proposed draft, as the Senator says it would be, will it be State militia or National Guard after the war is over, or what will be its status?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, that brings up an interesting phase of the future of the Organized Militia, or the National Guard, which I did not intend to discuss; but let me say, in reply to the Senator from South Dakota, that when the National Guard regiments are drafted into the Federal service as individuals they cease entirely to have any relation whatsoever to the States, and when the war is over they are mustered out, but they do not go back to the National Guard of the States, because the Congress has not power, as I understand, to create a State force. I doubt if it is within our power to legislate in such a way as to say to the State of New York or to the State of Minnesota, "You must take back these troops when we get through with them." We might legislate in a permissive sense, and probably it will be necessary for us when this emergency has passed to deal with the question. In fact, Mr. President, I think it will be exceedingly necessary to deal with it, because it certainly should not be the policy of the National Government by the operation of the draft to deprive the States for all time to come of a military force which they have assisted in organizing. That is a question which must be taken up sooner or later.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. What the Senator states is true in respect of those who are drafted to fill up the ranks of the National Guard, but as to those troops that have already been enlisted under State law and then mustered into the Federal service, when they are mustered out of the Federal service they go back into the State service and become subject to State control. That is my idea. There is a distinction between those who were in a regiment while it was a part of the National Guard and those who are put into it after it has been mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is a close legal question, Mr. President, that I am not competent to discuss, and shall not attempt to discuss upon this occasion, because it looks only toward the future, to a condition of affairs that will arise when the war is over. This bill makes no attempt to solve that question, and it really ought not to demand our attention at this moment.

So it will be seen, Mr. President, that the National Guard is to be very largely expanded, and will go through somewhat the same experience as the Regular Army during the next few months, involving the selection and promotion of a large number of men to commissioned rank. With the guard drafted into the Federal service and placed upon exactly the same military footing as is the Regular Army, the commissioned officers of the two forces become interchangeable. The President has complete authority over the commissioned officers and over their appointment and promotion. No longer, while this war is in progress, will the governor of any State have any jurisdiction whatsoever; the two forces, Regulars and guard, are made completely homogeneous. There will be no distinction between them, and I believe that in a short time they will be equally efficient.

A good deal of stress, Mr. President, has been laid upon the desire of many men residing in the various States to create additional units in the National Guard under the provisions of law contained in the national-defense act of June 3, 1916. Senators will remember that that law authorizes the National Guard to be recruited to an aggregate number based upon a quota of 800 men to a congressional district. That will provide something like 450,000 men. To do that it would be necessary, of course, to create additional regiments, troops, and batteries of all branches of the service in the National Guard. The Judge Advocate General of the Army has ruled that the War Department has no power to prevent the governors of the States from organizing additional units of the National Guard up to that limit, but the Secretary of War, as I am informed, has urgently requested the authorities of the several States not to do so, but to confine their efforts to recruiting the existing units to full war strength. They are urged not to attempt to throw together hastily additional troops and companies and regiments in the towns of their States, and thereby incur the danger which, as the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has pointed out, has always accompanied and always will accompany the hasty assembling of volunteer forces. So it has been the policy of the War Department during the last few weeks to discourage the creation of additional units of the National Guard; and I for one hope very much that that advice of the Secretary of War and that policy of the War Department will be followed and that the present units, which have already reached a considerable degree of efficiency, certainly far higher than the National Guard has ever before enjoyed, shall be left as they are; that our military system shall be left unhampered by the sudden creation of additional units with officers named by the governors.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under present conditions, in view of the discouragement to the creation of additional units of the National Guard of the States, it practically leaves the Federal recruiting station as the only avenue through which a person desiring to enlist can offer his services. In that event what term of years would a volunteer who enlisted in the Federal service assume, seven years?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He would enlist for the duration of the war.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there any such limitation of the term of enlistment under the oath he takes under the present law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under the existing law?

Mr. SHERMAN. Under existing conditions. I am not having reference to the bill pending here, but I am having reference to conditions that would attend a recruit who goes to a station now and desires to enter the Federal service. He would be required, would he not, to enlist for the regular term of seven years if he desired to become a member of the Regular Army?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can answer "yes" and "no" to that question. At the present moment, of course, he would enlist subject to the regular enlistment contract; but the assurance has been given to all those who have presented themselves for enlistment since April 1 that, whereas they sign such an enlistment contract as is provided for by law for the Regular Army, they will, in fact, be discharged at the end of the war.

Mr. SHERMAN. That, however, is merely a regulation of the War Department, and there is no authority of law, is there, to recruit forces——

Mr. WILLIAMS. There will be after this bill passes——

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no authority of law, outside of this bill, is there, to recruit forces except under the regular terms of enlistment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is what we are waiting for.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that. I am not talking about the provisions of the bill; I am talking about the conditions attending enlistment under existing law.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just a moment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator knows that the President can discharge any man at any time for the good of the service; and if he can discharge one man, he can discharge a unit.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; but I know equally well, if the Senator from New York will permit me, that when war exists and any private or officer is discharged for the good of the service, he will be regarded as having a dishonorable record. So, practically it leaves, does it not, the recruiting stations in a condition where the recruit must enlist, outside of this extra legal contract, for the full term of seven years? He can not enlist legally for the period of the war, can he, under the present provisions of this bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true.

Mr. SHERMAN. May not that have something to do with the indisposition in many places to volunteer?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I said a few moments ago that I believed that the comparative indisposition of men to come forward and volunteer at this time is due to the fact that they do not know what the policy of the Government is going to be, and that when this act is passed we will find volunteers much more ready to come forward.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I ask further, if the Senator will permit me—because sometimes we can get a great deal of information as we go along in an informal way—if at the time the resolution declaring war passed the President did not have power to issue a proclamation calling for volunteers, in the absence of special legislation on the subject?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He did.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think he did. I believe that power has been exercised, Mr. President, a number of times in the history of this country, notably on the 15th day of April, 1861, the day following the surrender of Fort Sumter, when he called for 75,000 volunteers. The President convened Congress in extraordinary session on the 4th of July, 1861, not to pass a conscription act, but to consider legislation generally.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will conclude in a moment. The President at that time called for volunteers. Suppose the President of the United States at the time we declared war a few days ago had called for volunteers. He would possibly have had power then to limit enlistments for the period of the war. He did not do so. If such a call had been made, as it was made in 1861, would not that have completely demonstrated whether volunteers would offer in adequate numbers for the public defense?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee, with the consent of the Senator from New York.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from New York yield to me to answer the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to direct attention to the fact that the act of April 25, 1914, known as the volunteer army act, specifically provides that volunteers can only be called for by the President after the President has been authorized to do so by Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that. The information I am trying to get is what is responsible for the apparent indisposition in certain places of men to volunteer; and I think the Senator will agree with me that the difficulty I have suggested may have something to do with it.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Illinois has referred to the first call for 75,000 men by President Lincoln. He will find if he examines the form of that call that it was a call upon the National Guard, on the militia, for that number of troops.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On the militia of the States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have read the call. They were called for the Federal service.

Mr. NELSON. It was a call upon the militia to furnish that number of soldiers. It was a call upon the States.

Mr. SHERMAN. They were for the Federal service. I will ask further if the call of April 15, 1861, was not followed by the call of May, 1861—about the 22d of May, if my memory serves me aright—in the absence of legislation? Congress did not convene in extraordinary session until the 4th of July of that year. The second call was for 500,000 men. That tested the question of whether volunteers would offer themselves in sufficient numbers. Now, would it not have been fair, at least to the volunteer system, for the Executive to have made a call in this crisis, so that we might have some adequate information as to the response of the loyal sentiment of the country? That would have met any argument that might be offered by Senators if it had been done. There is no answer to arithmetic. All we can do now is to say what possibly would have happened if it had been done.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I ask this question, Mr. President, because I think the Senator from New York has a familiarity with the subject that is possessed by few of us. First, I should like to inquire, under the bill as it is now presented, how long, in the opinion of the Senator from New York, will it take the United States to have an effective fighting force?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, Mr. President, I hardly dare venture an opinion on that question. It depends upon the definition of an "effective fighting force." There are so many elements that enter into it that I hardly feel competent to answer it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The bill provides, first, for a half million men by selective draft. How long, in the Senator's opinion, will it be before that half million fighting force will be ready to engage in the present conflict?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, as was brought out in the debate on Saturday, it has been estimated that on or about August 1 those half million men produced by the selective draft will be in the mobilization camps in the 16 divisional areas, with all their equipment ready for them. We can only estimate the length of time after that which must transpire to make an effective force suitable for use in this tremendous war by having regard to the experience of other countries. It is generally understood that the British consume eight months in steady, unrelenting work teaching their men how to wage this kind of warfare. Then they are sent to France and there have a month or six weeks' additional training in conjunction with veteran troops, who, as it were, teach them the finishing touches. So that it would be 9 months or 10 months, in all probability, before we could send those 500,000 drafted men into the trenches.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator will allow me to continue my answer, much will depend also upon what sort of officers are teaching those 500,000 men.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Everything will depend upon that.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It would not be extravagant, then, Mr. President, to concede that, under the proposed legislation, it would take a year, substantially, to have any sort of effective fighting force in the United States?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; Mr. President, I do not concede that. My observations were directed only toward the 500,000 to be produced by the selective draft.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But, in the meantime, the expanded Regular Army will be far ahead of the selective draft army in efficiency, and so will the expanded National Guard. I think those troops, or, speaking generally, the average of them will be ready for effective field service long before the 500,000 secured under the draft.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is, if you succeed in having men volunteer subtsantially in those two branches of the service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; Mr. President, the success of filling those two branches is not dependent upon volunteering.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Substantially.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken, if I may say so. The bill provides that if volunteering does not produce them within a time deemed reasonable by the President, they shall be filled by the draft.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Oh, yes; but first you undertake to obtain the requisite number by volunteering. Now, there are a very large number of our citizens, are there not, who have had military training in one form or another, who might volunteer for service under a general call for volunteers——

Mr. WILLIAMS. They all want to volunteer for commissions.

Mr. JOHNSON of California (continuing). And particularly if they believed that they were to have actual service in the military department of the Government?

The point I should like to make with the Senator is this: If, after Sumter had been fired upon, a proposed measure such as this had been presented in order that there might be an effective force in this Nation, we can let our imaginations run rife as to what might have transpired during that effective force coming together under a selective draft. But the President then resorted to the two modes of seeking volunteers. He resorted to them in an emergency, it is true. In this instance, if we are going to fight our war otherwise than by money, and if we may obtain an army by a call for volunteers more quickly than by the proposed method, what objection is there to the call for volunteers being made in conjunction with all that is now proposed by this bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not think the analogy recited by the Senator from California is an accurate one. No comparison can be made between the conditions of 1861 and the conditions here in the United States with respect to the great world war of 1917. In 1861 there was no time whatsoever to lose. Both sides rushed to arms under the volunteer system. Of course it would have been impossible for President Lincoln to ask the Congress in 1861 to take a bill such as this and build up, through the processes of a selective draft, a carefully devised and constructed army. Washington would have been captured by the Virginians while the bill was being discussed here in the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is exactly the point.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But, Mr. President, fortunately the United States is in no such peril to-day. Our own Navy and the British Navy are protecting us from invasion and giving us, thank Heaven, time to build a real army from the ground up, which shall be efficient, carefully selected in all its elements, all errors, if possible, avoided, built upon the experience of other nations, lessons learned from their mistakes and their successes; assistance from such an army. It could not be done. Our duty is to build a real army, which can compare favorably with the best armies now fighting and hold its own against any enemy that confronts it. That is the purpose of this bill. This new army is to stand the test as long as this war lasts and bear every conceivable burden that can be placed upon it in this war of trained men. The two conditions are not analogous, I say, with all respect to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the reason I asked was because I knew the Senator was thoroughly prepared to answer any query of the sort.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not boast of that, Mr. President.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Oh, well, I grant it to the Senator, and grant it to him very readily, indeed; but I am still unable to understand why, if we are going to fight in this war, we should not take every available means—the volunteer system, the draft, begin with our universal military training, and the like. I assume that the Senator from New York perhaps is not familiar with what may be the ultimate policy, but may I inquire whether the ultimate policy is that this country shall or shall not send soldiers abroad?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not competent to announce what the policy of the administration is. I can state my personal view. My personal view and hope is that at the earliest opportunity a force of trained American troops shall appear upon the soil of France.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from New York will pardon me for the interruption, it seems to me that this bill answers the question just propounded by the Senator from California. There is no reason for the existence of this bill unless our object be to prepare an efficient army, ready to go to France or Belgium or Germany, wherever the war in Europe may call us and making ourselves fit to go when we are sent. If we were merely preparing an army to keep Germany from invading America we would not resort to this, of course, nor resort to the idea which the Senator has in his mind now. We would be making a useless waste of money. We had better turn the entire Army appropriation bill into the Navy and be done with it. The bill itself answers the question as to whether there is any intention to send troops to Europe if we ever get the troops, fit troops, equipped troops. We do not want to send boys there to be murdered—untrained, unequipped, unfit in every way.

One more word in this connection: If we had to meet conditions like those during the Civil War, of which Von Moltke said that for 12 months it was a war of armed mobs, that would be a different proposition, because the northern armed mob and the southern armed mob were equal to one another. Sending an armed mob to Europe to be shot down with machine guns and under modern conditions of trench warfare would not only be unwise but it would be brutal; and the very reason why we are undertaking here to prepare an army which shall be, individually and by companies and by regiments and by divisions, prepared to do actual service, is that we expect them to see actual service abroad. Nobody expects Germany to invade America, unless she invades the border down by Mexico, through Mexican machinations by German bribery with a few Mexican bandits.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I want to thank the Senator from Mississippi for a very definite answer to the query that I propounded. It is exactly in line with what I thought would be the answer to that particular query.

Let me set the mind of the Senator at rest by saying that there is no design upon my part, there is no design upon the part of any man who believes in a volunteer system, to send a mob, unprepared and unequipped, to be shot down in France or Belgium or any other place on the face of the earth. The insistence is that any army that we have shall be equipped and prepared, and the like; but the problem is whether you can not prepare and equip an army more readily and quickly under a call for volunteers than you can under the particular system that is suggested by this bill.

All of us agree, none of us disagree, that any men of our fighting force must be physically fit and must be fully equipped. There is no disagreement upon that score in the slightest degree.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield further to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise again for the purpose of saying that I did not misunderstand the Senator from California. I had no idea that a man of his good sense would have had the notion that we should send men unprepared to become merely food for cannon. I was merely answering the question and explaining, upon the basis of the bill, that the question answered itself, provided that the bill be passed, and that the question answered itself for the reason that I knew he would agree that we do not want to send abroad merely "food for cannon."

Now, there is one other thing. Do not make this mistake about the volunteer system: In the War between the States here were brothers quarreling in a family, and whenever brothers do quarrel, and reach the fighting point, each one is anxious to get at the other's throat, principally for the reason that he is so indignant that his own brother should be angry with him and should be fighting with him. Now, if you expect to arouse that sort of passion, which existed in the South and in the North both when the War between the States began where each man wanted to get at the other and kill him, you are not going to have that. There is no hatred of the German people in the American heart to-day, as there was hatred of Yankees in the southern heart and hatred of rebels in the northern heart at that time. You can not rely upon that spontaneous feeling that makes every fellow rush for fear the war may be over before he can get there. This is a different proposition. It is a matter of modern military machinery and mechanics, and the men have got to be taught to manage the machinery and the mechanics; and they ought to be taught it under men who at least have made a study of the science, whether they have succeeded in becoming masters of it or not, but at least men who are supposed to have some knowledge of it. My own father's regiment at the Battle of Shiloh ran over a whole brigade of Federal troops at their breakfast. Why? Because they were under the command of political general, a political brigadier, who had never known what to do with himself or his troops.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, just one word and then I am done.

I am very thankful for the remark of the Senator from Mississippi. He is quite right. I agree entirely with all that he has said. The idea that is in my mind, of the generation since the Civil War—and I may pause to say that the most charming thing in this whole debate has been to see the men of the North and the men of the South uniting for a common country—but of a generation since the Civil War, as I am, I have just this thought: If the Nation goes into war, it goes into war to fight, and there is something that is repugnant to me as an American in thinking that there is a possibility—which now happily is removed by the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi—of our fighting alone with our dollars.

We are going to fight, I see from the remarks that have been made, not alone with all of our resources, but we are going to fight with well-equipped men; and I quite agree, as well, that it is not a fight in animosity or in hatred or in bitterness at all. It is not at all a contest wherein the German people have from us anything but the kindliest sentiments and the kindliest feelings, and wherein we do aught else than desire to see a lasting and a just peace for that people as well as for every other people on the face of the earth. Nevertheless, we are in war, and when you are in war there is just one thing to do—to fight with every bit of force that you possess. That is why I asked the questions concerning the various modes of fighting, merely to elicit the information in that regard.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope to have an opportunity to continue.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One word, and I will cease to interrupt the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi for a brief statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say that one reason why I said what I said was because I agree precisely with the Senator from California that about the most contemptible thing any people on the surface of the earth can do, or has ever done, or may hereafter do, is to fight merely with dollars; and, above all people in the world, the people from my section of the country, who know how much a dollar does accomplish in war, have that feeling, because we suffered by it, and suffered a great deal.

There is no intention upon the part of this administration—and I am authorized to speak that far by my knowledge of the character of the President and of the men who are running the administration—to sink to the low level of defending American rights and avenging American lives and defending the liberty of the world and small States and defending the right of democracy to have a place to stand in under the sun with nothing but dollars. We are going to defend those American and humanitarian rights with dollars and with men and with endurance and with suffering, and with everything else of which we assert mastership. Whatsoever it shall cost, that we shall pay. Whatsoever suffering comes, that we shall endure; and whatsoever there may be of worse than suffering, that, too, we shall stand to the bitter end. Whatsoever must be borne, that we shall bear. One of the beauties of the opportunity that we now have is this: We can put an end forever to the infamous lie that the American people are not a nation but are nothing but a conglomerate association of dollar hunters and of dollar makers. I am glad that the Senator from California had in his heart and has expressed the very feeling that every man south of Mason and Dixon's line has—that is, every man who has a right to live there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I had reached that point in my remarks where I had about concluded a discussion of the use of the instruments which we now have at hand, or, rather, the enlargement and perfection of them, and had not reached that part of my discussion which has to do with the selective draft as contrasted with the volunteer system. However, at this point I desire, if I may, to impress upon the Senators some of the elements of the task that we are about to embark upon if this bill or a similar bill becomes a law.

Under this bill, and even under the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], it is contemplated that 36 tactical divisions shall be organized, equipped, and trained in the continental United States. They will total a little over 1,200,000 men. It will be seen at a glance that that is the biggest single effort that the United States has ever embarked upon. It will be recognized also, I think, by every thoughtful man that there is a very dire scarcity in the United States of trained and educated soldiers who can lead us in that effort, and that whereas enthusiasm is always good and outbursts of patriotism, of course, are valuable and never should be discounted, nevertheless, when we view the size of the task ahead of us, and the scarcity of the tools with which at the beginning we must work, it ought to be apparent that we would better go slowly and build surely than to act with haste and make a complete failure of it, as we have done on former occasions when we have attempted tasks which at the outset were nowhere near as big as the one we are going to attempt under the provisions of this bill and the plans of the administration.

Thirty-six tactical divisions, 28,000 men to a division; 12,000 animals, horses and mules, and at least 1,000 wagons for each division; approximately 600 motor trucks for each division; each division containing every element that is ever seen in an army, every branch of the service being represented in proper proportions; presumably 36 divisional mobilization camps, at which will be congregated, respectively, the 28,000 men and 12,000 animals, requiring a water supply equal to and probably exceeding that of a city of 25,000 people—all must be prepared from the ground up. No mistakes must be made. It can not be done in a hurry. If it is, you will have thousands of men ill in hospitals and wasted. Mile upon mile of cantonments must be built in which the men will live—for they can not be expected to live under canvas with any degree of comfort in the northern part of the United States subsequent to December 1 next. Mountains and mountains of sacked oats and baled hay for the horses and mules, exceeding anything we have ever attempted before; medical supplies accumulated to an extent that we have never comprehended before; hundreds of physicians as commissioned surgeons to take care of these

1,200,000 men, most of whom will be green recruits. The mind can scarcely picture the extent of this effort and the enormous undertaking it represents; and no man can exaggerate the utmost importance of building carefully, conserving our resources, controlling every stage of the progress, reducing to a minimum the waste in human lives and in the materials upon which the soldiers and the animals must live.

It will not do for us, Mr. President, to say, "Let us throw together a volunteer army of 500,000 by the mere proclamation of the President." That would be but the beginning, and the vice of such a process is this: That in the hasty throwing together of an army of volunteers of 500,000 men the Government would have little control over the qualifications of the officers. It would be compelled, in the very nature of things, to take the men who present themselves in units already organized. A patriotic and popular citizen in my town or your town under such a call can organize a company or a troop, and by his personal influence and his popularity he can get them together, no doubt; but he will want to be the captain. That is the way it will work; and the chances are he will not be an efficient captain. Likewise, it is said, regiments can be organized overnight. I have heard it stated that it can be done in 48 hours in some of the communities of this country, and probably it is true; but you have got to take the colonel and the lieutenant colonel and the three majors that are offered to the War Department under those circumstances. If the War Department attempts seriously to resist that pressure for commissions in the Volunteer Army, Senators will find themselves wearing out shoe leather between the Capitol and the War Department trying to get commissions for their friends. We will all have to do it under any such system, begging for special favors for men that we happen to know back in our home States; and this great effort of ours that I have tried to picture, and have failed utterly in painting adequately, will inevitably fail, and we will be the scorn and the laughing stock of the great military nations of the world, particularly the allies, who are fighting our battles to-day. But if they see us starting in by a process of careful selection to use our wonderful material in all those channels of effort in which it can be best used, when they see that we mean to build something that shall endure, that shall not stumble or fail in this great emergency, which can carry the burden, no matter how heavy it may be, then they will know that America's assistance is a real force in bringing this war to an early conclusion. That will be the sign that will tell England, and France, and Russia, and Belgium, and Serbia that America is enlisted for the war, no matter how long it lasts. But if we take the old-fashioned, haphazard methods under which we have wasted thousands and thousands of lives in the past, and prolonged our wars instead of shortening them, our efforts will not command the respect of the Governments of the allied powers, with whom eventually, I hope, we shall be cooperating actively upon the battle fronts of Europe.

I have just as intense a desire as the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] that we shall join in the fighting at the earliest possible date, provided we do it effectively. Should we send over a body of half-trained volunteers, it is true, enthusiasm would sweep over this broad land, and we would give them a send-off that no expeditionary force leaving the shores of America ever received; and undoubtedly the devoted people of France would greet them with an enthusiasm and a heartiness that would bring the tears of gratification to our eyes; but, my friends, when they got into the trenches such a force would be a burden upon France instead of an assistance.

Mr. HARDWICK and Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I was just going to inquire of the Senator whether he regarded Canada's efforts—in which three-quarters of a million men were raised, or some such number as that—as of the same character as the situation which he has just described; and, if not, why we could not try for a while the same system that Canada seems to have tried with some success and without exciting the contempt of the allies? Also, I should be glad if the Senator would state how many men England raised by voluntary enlistment before she undertook to enforce conscription, and why she delayed so long in putting into effect any form of conscription there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, those very topics were discussed in a running debate here in the Senate on Saturday afternoon, and at the risk of repetition——

Mr. HARDWICK. By the Senator? I did not hear the Senator on that subject.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from New York was one of perhaps six or eight Senators who took part in a running debate on this question of the volunteers of Canada and the volunteers of England.

Mr. HARDWICK. But, really, I am seeking information about this matter to a greater extent than is perhaps apparent from the latter part of what I have said. I am thinking about these things, and I should like to have the Senator's views on these questions.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, of course it is well known that the Dominion of Canada has sent approximately 400,000 men into the army.

Mr. HARDWICK. I saw the statement made very recently that the figure now was nearly three-quarters of a million.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Seven hundred and fifty thousand?

Mr. HARDWICK. Nearly that; yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am quite certain that the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, the statement was made yesterday in the public press of the country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The number, I am quite certain, is in the neighborhood of 400,000 men. True, that number was raised by a so-called volunteer system.

Mr. HARDWICK. Are not the Canadian troops the best the allies have had?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not denying their excellence for a moment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Why should not America have the same system under the same category?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was about to reach that. It is true, as I said, that Canada has sent in the neighborhood of 400,000 under the volunteer system. The truth of the matter is, however, that Canada in the first six months of actual fighting in France wasted the best men of Canada, who should have been carefully selected, and would have been under the provisions of a law similar to this, and been used as officer material. I mentioned a regiment Saturday afternoon as an example, two-thirds of which was well known to be of officer material, 1,600 men, the Princess Patricia Regiment. There has never been a volunteer regiment that I know of in the history of any country that had a finer and a more splendid personnel than that. In six weeks' time after reaching the trenches only 40 were left. They can never be replaced. They should have been officering the other Canadian regiments. The sacrifice of those men was infinitely more than that represented by the killing and wounding of, say, 1,500 of them, because they would have been of more service to their country in the positions for which they were best qualified. The same is true of the first troops sent by Great Britain to France in that wonderful response to the call for volunteers.

Mr. HARDWICK. May I interrupt the Senator again? Could not the selective principle be applied just as well to the volunteer system as to the conscriptive system?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not see how.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is not that exactly what Canada is doing?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If you could not fill your quota with volunteers you must resort to draft.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know, but I have been informed by a Senator on this floor that Canada is now applying the selective principle—the main principle the Senator is lauding now—to the volunteer system and in practically three years has not yet resorted to conscription.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is another reason, however, for their failure to resort to conscription.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator state it, because I should like to have all the information I can?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The political influence in the Canadian Government of the Province of Quebec, which is largely responsible for their not having conscription.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Province of Quebec is of very small influence in the Dominion.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is sufficient to have great power in the Canadian Government as now constituted, as the Senator can readily see. Of course, that is a mere expression of opinion and may or may not be well founded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not belittling the volunteers of Canada. The Senator misunderstood me. The Senator is mistaken when he says that the Province of Quebec is exerting an influence to prevent conscription. The truth is that the Province of Quebec furnishes a very small quota to the Canadian Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true.

Mr. GALLINGER. Inasmuch as the Province of Quebec is negligible, so far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned, it would seem as though the conscription would be resorted to so as to force those men into the army to the extent of other Provinces. I suppose the Senator knows that Australia rejected the system of conscription. So it is not universal. Yet the Senator contends that conscription is universally recognized as the best system.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In commenting on the first portion of the Senator's question or answer, as it may be termed, I do not know whether I am confusing cause and effect with respect to the Province of Quebec or whether the Senator is doing it. It is true a much lower percentage of men in the Province of Quebec volunteered in the Canadian Army than in the other provinces, and therefore it is not surprising that Quebec is not in favor of conscription.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me just one further observation. Is it not surprising, I will ask the Senator, that the Dominion of Canada with the Province of Quebec as a negligible quantity should not enforce conscription so as to make those men enter the service?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator's assumption that Quebec is a negligible quantity politically is correct, to which I can not agree——

Mr. CURTIS. Would not the objection the Senator urges against the manner in which the officers are now selected from volunteers be avoided by a provision in the law that no one shall be commissioned an officer unless he has had a sufficient amount of training?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That would leave the volunteers without any officers.

Mr. CURTIS. Not necessarily. The officers now in England according to the testimony before the committee must have served so many weeks in the ranks and then they must have taken a course at a training school before they can be commissioned as officers. Congress could make a similar provision relative to officers.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think the statement of the Senator with reference to the selection of these officers of volunteers is altogether one of the strongest arguments against the volunteer system. I agree that that proposition is one of the objections to the volunteer system. But I wish to ask the Senator solely for information, how are we going to supply the officers for the different regiments when we have such a limited number of officers now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The bill makes provision for that very thing.

Mr. BORAH. Have we enough officers in the United States to supply them?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We have not now.

Mr. BORAH. I mean trained officers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We have not.

Mr. BORAH. We must necessarily, then, resort to some extent to untrained officers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We shall have to train officers in large numbers. The first effort will be, as I understand it, to train 10,000 new officers.

Mr. BORAH. The thought occurred to me that we could train volunteers perhaps as early as we could train other officers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. With whom shall we train them?

Mr. BORAH. With whom are you going to train the men you are going to train?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The present trained officers will have to train new ones.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. Could they not train the new officers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They could not train the volunteers for an army of 500,000 at the same time. The system would break down.

Mr. BORAH. Gen. Sherman says, in his memoirs, some of the best officers who came out of the Civil War were men who were discouraged in the first instance to become officers. If we are going to select these men in the first instance without having been trained and having their capacity developed, I do not see why we could not select them just as well from volunteers as from conscripts.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator misunderstands the provision of the bill with respect to training officers and also the policy of the administration. These officers are not to be selected before they show their fitness. They are to be trained, and then they are to be given commissions after they show their fitness. That is the whole point.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know how the officer is to show his real fitness before going to war. It took the first year of the Civil War to get rid of the blunderers of West Point.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would first prefer to answer the question of the Senator from Idaho a little more fully, because he has brought up a very important topic. The Senator says the best way to develop the fitness of an officer is in war. Certainly the Senator would not urge sending green officers to Europe in charge of troops to see how many of them would turn out to be fit.

We must give them all the instruction we can and test them out—test their ability in mobilization camps and in handling troops—and pick the best men. That is what this bill contemplates, and even then, may I say to the Senator from Idaho, the commissions that are to be given under the bill, outside of commissions already existing in the Regulars and in the National Guard, are to be temporary. They are probationary commissions. They may be withdrawn, if need be, after troops have been sent to Europe—in fact, at any time—by the President for failure to come up to the standard. So every effort is made to prevent that horrible tragedy of sending troops into battle under officers who have never been tested anywhere.

Mr. BORAH. In order that the Senator may understand me, I say frankly I have what some would call hereditary prejudices against conscription; but the Senator has done much toward causing reconsideration.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My hereditary tendency should also be against it, because every member of my family above the age of 17 was a volunteer in the Civil War, and I volunteered as a private in the Spanish War myself. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. On the question of officers, which is the most important one of all to be considered, I understand that it would take 18,538 officers to command the first increment of 500,000 men. We have about 8,000 in the Army Officers' Reserve Corps now—young men who, for the most part, have filed applications and had their names put on the list. Does not the Senator think—and that was the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho awhile ago—that officers who have seen service in the Spanish-American War, for instance, or officers who have been trained in the military schools of our country would be more competent and just as easily trained as the 8,000 young men we already have on the roll and the 10,500 others we have to put on that roll from some place or other, we know not where?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the bill on page 3 provides exactly for what the Senator from Tennessee is contending. It proposes to make use of men who have graduated from military institutions at which courses approved by the War Department are prescribed, or "from the country at large," which would include Spanish War veterans. Now, if these men want to be officers in command of troops in the service of their country, all they have to do is to present themselves at an officers' training camp within certain reasonable limits of numbers, take the course of three months which has already been outlined by the War Department, mix in with the men who are now upon the officers' reserve list, mix in with the men who are graduates of military academies, schools, and colleges, take their chance with the rest, learn something of the care and sanitation of camps, of drilling and handling troops, show their efficiency, and they will get their commissions. But what many of them want to do, Mr. President, is to organize their own companies at home and get the commissions before they are trained.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. HARDING. I wish to ask the Senator from New York if he does not think the acquirement of a sufficient force under the volunteer method is entirely dependent upon the acceptance of these unfit officers at home?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Absolutely; you can not raise 500,000 volunteers unless you let down the bars in the matter of commissions.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I merely wish to ask the Senator a question for my own information. Does the Senator understand that with the bill as it is now prepared the National Guard would come under its provisions?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, Mr. President; I discussed that earlier in my remarks. The National Guard is to be drafted into the Federal service, and will be just as surely Federal troops as the Regular Army itself. I discussed that when the Senator may not have been in the Chamber.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I was not in the Chamber when that was discussed. Would not that eventually destroy the National Guard, the militia? Our law in section 11 of the national defense act reads that "all persons so drafted shall from said date of their draft stand discharged from the militia."

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I say to the Senator from South Dakota I have already discussed that. I am anxious to conclude my remarks within a reasonable time, and at the same time, of course, I do not wish to be discourteous to the Senator. That matter was discussed in a running debate while I had the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. In that case I beg the Senator's pardon for my interruption.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. The Senator discussed the point a few moments ago, to which I was attempting to direct his attention at the time before he got away from the subject of the terrible sacrifice of the few English troops Great Britain was able to send to France when the war commenced. Does not the Senator believe that that sacrifice was not only absolutely necessary but was justified, if ever a sacrifice was? In other words, is it not a fact that the flower of the English Army in France hanging on to the German right flank finally enabled the French to come out from Paris and hurl the Germans back? Had it not been for that would not Paris at that time have fallen into the hands of the German Army?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, I am not able to answer the concluding portion of the Senator's question; I do not know. But may I say in partial answer that undoubtedly the situation demanded that a terrific drain in the lives of men should be imposed upon Great Britain. In the first six months or year of the war she had to send men to France half trained. She had to take in the first few weeks the flower of the manhood of England, because always they are the first to offer themselves. But no such compulsion falls upon us, and if England had to do it over again I have not the slightest doubt but what she would have first trained, in advance of the events, a democratic army on the plan of universal compulsory service for her forces, and thus would not have wasted her best men.

Mr. FALL. I understand from the general trend of the bill it is the theory of some in this country, and evidently of the General Staff, that th United States is not to take any part in this war for a long time, not perhaps for a year or more.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is not my understanding of the bill or the purpose of the General Staff.

Mr. FALL. Well, that is mine. So Senators differ on those lines.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is not my understanding of it.

Mr. FALL. At the same time I would like to ask the Senator is it not his impression that the sacrifice of the Princess Patricia Regiment was absolutely necessary, and if it had not been made the Germans could have reached the coast of France and this war might have had a different termination?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It might be so.

Mr. FALL. Of course, if there is no emergency, I do not see any reason why we should not discuss this matter for a week or 10 days.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I say in regard to the matter of volunteers in our Army there is room for 600,000 of them, if these men desire to come forward to join units already organized and reasonably well officered. There is no room in the bill for any volunteers who are to organize themselves under officers of their own choosing, and who, according to the lessons of the past, will be 75 per cent inefficient.

This bill does not contemplate that method of recruiting an army. The bill contemplates that our new army shall be built up by a process of selecting the most available instruments, building it upon a sure foundation, and making it so strong that it will carry any burden imposed upon it, and that, furthermore, in that army all kinds and classes of Americans shall be represented.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WOLCOTT. For my own information, Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator a question. The Senator from New York has just stated that the present bill furnishes the opportunity for 600,000 men to volunteer. I desire to ask how many volunteers of the 600,000 under existing law may come into the Regular Army and how many in the Organized Militia? How much of an increase is to be made in the Regular Army and how much in the Organized Militia?

Mr. WADSWORTH. As I said earlier in the day—I feel as if I should call it a day now—the Regulars are to be increased to 270,000 men.

Mr. WOLCOTT. How many men are in the Regular Army now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. About 130,000. The Regular Army is to be increased from 130,000 to 270,000, and the National Guard up to 330,000.

But, in addition to supplying volunteers for the existing units of the Regulars and National Guard, it is inevitable that many thousands of Regular enlisted men and of National Guard enlisted men will become officers, so that the number of men necessary to fill up those two branches of the service on the present basis must be largely increased. That is how the War Department has computed, roughly, that 600,000 Volunteers will be necessary to fill these forces up; and if they do not come forward, the President may draft them.

Mr. FALL. The Senator is now speaking of officers. Does not the Senator think that the United States has power and authority to provide absolutely the qualifications of the Volunteer officers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has.

Mr. FALL. Then the Senator's idea is, so far as officers are concerned, that just as easily, under exactly the same conditions, officers for both the Volunteers and the drafted quota of 500,000 can be provided for.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not think it possible; politics would prevent.

Mr. President, I want to say a word with respect to the contrast between the volunteer system and the selective draft system. As the Senator from Massachusett [Mr. WEEKS] has so well said, when volunteers are called for the best blood of the country comes to the front. That is to be expected. Much of it should not be allowed to come. Under a volunteer system, practically speaking, there is no way of preventing that. If you are to get the requisite number of volunteers, you must take practically every able-bodied man who comes forward; and when you do that, Mr. President, you take thousands of men away from tasks at which they are of more value to their country in the waging of the war than they would be in the trenches themselves. That has happened time and time again.

The Southern Confederacy was much wiser than the North, generally speaking, in its military policy during the early part of the Civil War. They were the first to come to the conclusion that the volunteer system was inadequate. They were the first to come to conscription, and it was not solely because they lacked men. It was because the leaders of the Southern Confederacy were military men, competent to judge what the future would bring forth in the maintenance of the Confederate armies. For the first two or three years of the war the comparative success of the Confederate forces over the Union forces was due largely to the superiority of the Confederate military policy. Of course some of their advantage was due to the fact that they were on the defensive.

It was on April 16, 1862, that the Confederate Congress passed their conscription act. They had learned the lesson in just one year. It took the northern people two years to learn it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator give me the date that act went into effect?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the volume from which I am reading, unfortunately, on the pages which are before me the date on which the act went into effect is not given. I am reading from the Military Policy of the United States, by Maj. Gen. Emory D. Upton, where, on page 466, in the midst of a discussion of Confederate military legislation, he uses this language:

The next law, April 16, 1862—

Then follows the description and a copy of the conscription law itself. So it was either passed or went into effect on that date. I think the former is correct.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think that law did not go into effect until about the 1st of January following.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But, at any rate, I am correct in saying that the leaders of the Confederacy saw the wisdom of conscription at least a year in advance of the leaders of the North, and at the same time they provided in their military policy one of the most important things which we attempt to provide for in this bill, and that is the maintenance of a system of recruiting depots at home in order to keep the forces in the field filled to war strength, or approximately so, while they are doing the fighting. It was the fact that during the Civil War the average Confederate regiment at the front was equal in numbers to the average Union brigade, with the single exception, I may say, of the Wisconsin regiments. The State of Wisconsin apparently adopted an internal State policy by which they kept sending fresh men to the old regiments who were serving at the front and discarded the practice of organizing new regiments of green men under inefficient officers. The Confederacy knew better from the beginning. We have often wondered, as we have read accounts of battles of the Civil War, how it was that Confederate regiments "stood off" Union brigades. It was because the Confederate regiments were kept at nearly war strength and the Union regiments went down to 200 and 150 men each.

We are attempting in this bill to prevent with absolute certainty that very evil. You can not keep the regiments at the front full, you can not make good the wastage, unless you are sure to get the men from the rear, and the only way you are sure is by a selective draft. If you rely upon the volunteer system to keep your regiments at the front filled, you are gambling—you can not tell from day to day how many recruits there will be in the rear ready and trained to go to the front.

That is one of the phases of this bill that I wanted to bring to the attention of the Senate, because when armies are actually fighting the wastage is enormous and it must be filled.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to remind the Senator from New York that the very policy to which he so correctly refers followed in the Union Army added enormously to the expense of the maintenance of the service. There was always a colonel of the regiment to be paid a colonel's pay, a lieutenant colonel, a major, and other superior officers even with not more than a hundred men in the regiment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They generally had a full complement of officers.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would not that be so under the drafting system?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Except that the regiment would always be full.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is worth while to employ a colonel to command a regiment of 1,900 infantrymen, but it is not worth while to employ a colonel to command a regiment of 150 men. That is the command of a captain. A company of Infantry at war strength is composed of 150 men.

To come down to the basis of this whole discussion, Mr. President, we have to admit, so long as we are the devotees of a democratic system of Government, that the burdens of a great war should be distributed as evenly as may be upon all the men who are capable of bearing any share of that burden. If we are to be true to the ideals of a democracy, we must insist that every citizen owes it to his country to help in her defense. We want our defensive system so contrived that it shall not only be fair and democratic in its spirit but that it shall be employed in the most efficient way. Hence the necessity for selection, for selecting the instruments which we are going to use in waging our part in this great war.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I propounded an interrogatory to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], but the answer was not very conclusive to my mind. I am going to ask the Senator from New York the same question. When Great Britain resorted to conscription, she conscripted men from 18 to 41 years of age. Upon what theory or hypothesis has the committee restricted the age in this bill to from 19 to 25?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, Mr. President, as I understand it, there are 7,000,000 men in the United States between the ages of 19 and 25. That is a great many more than we could use for a long time to come. I suppose it was the policy of the General Staff, who have studied this matter for months and months, to select from our male population capable of bearing arms the most available material, and that material which could be drafted into the Army without inflicting unnecessary handicaps upon the industries of the country. They decided apparently—and I am disposed to agree with them—that between the ages of 19 and 25 a young man can be taken from his civil employment with less disturbance to his family or his industry than at any other age. So this bill provides that the selective draft shall apply to the men between 19 and 25. It is perfectly true that there are large numbers of men, aged 26, 28, and 30, who are fit to bear arms; but as we go up the scale in age the further we go we find the greater hardship inflicted on the country—not only on the men but on the country at large—if you take them away from industrial pursuits and put them into the Army.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but I am still puzzled as to the system pursued by Great Britain.

Mr. WADSWORTH. She had to do it, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not so sure about that. Great Britain called back a great many men from her army and put them into civil occupations, inasmuch as they were there needed; and yet, when she came to conscript men, she conscripted them from 18 to 41. I should think she would have needed a great many of those men in her industries, as much so as we would in the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, many of them were needed in her industries and were kept in her industries. If we wanted to apply this selective draft to all the men in the United States between the ages of 18 and 45, we should have available 20,000,000 men. It is the policy of the Government, or it should be the policy of the Government, to take the men whose departure from civil life causes the least hardship, and who at the same time will make the best soldiers. If this war should go on for 5, 6, or 10 years, we might very well find it absolutely necessary to draft men up to the age of 45.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator knows this war will not go on for 5, 6, or 10 years.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I certainly hope it will not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Still, I am puzzled to understand why Great Britain did not make similar exemptions. Now, I will ask the Senator from New York if any calculation has been made by the Senator or by the committee as to how numerous are the exemptions which are provided by this bill? The Senator from New York states the number of men who are liable to conscription. What about the exemptions? As I read the bill, there can not, under it, be conscripted a man who is useful on a farm.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is scarcely accurate, if I may call the Senator's attention to the language.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the way I read it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are certain specific exemptions established by this bill. One of them is on the ground of religious conviction.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; applying to three or four denominations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, there are discretionary exemptions, which are lodged in the hands of the President. Among them are those men who, in his judgment, would be of more value in industries at home than in the ranks at the front.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I should like to conclude.

Mr. KELLOGG. I merely want to ask the Senator a question. Is it not a fact that Great Britain could not get the number of men it was necessary for her to have by taking those from 19 to 26 years of age, and that she was forced to require the service of those 40 years of age?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly; that is the fact. England had to take men who were as old as 40 years in order to get enough. She had to create an army of four and a half million men out of a population of fifty-one or fifty-two million. Mr. President, I am very anxious to conclude, if I have a chance.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I desire to suggest that he is not consistent. He is insisting on compulsory military service, and I think he ought not to object if he is compelled to occupy the floor.

Mr. POMERENE. Particularly when he is speaking so well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Senators will kindly address the Chair.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, my great concern in this whole matter is that my country shall acquit herself creditably and in such a way as to bring this war to an early conclusion. I know that some of the ideas incorporated in this bill do not meet with the unanimous approval of the people of the United States; but, sir, I am looking toward the future, in which I hope to see our efforts, great or small—and I hope they will be great—crowned with a victory, achieved in such a way that every man in the United States will be able to say at the conclusion of this war that he has borne some part of the burden and thereby is entitled to look the rest of the world in the face and be deserving of his share of the blessings which our institutions have vouchsafed to us.

Mr. THOMAS addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time, he said:

Mr. President, the hour of half past 5 o'clock has arrived, and I am somewhat weary. If the Senator from Oregon will consent, I should like to yield the floor until to-morrow morning.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize the issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 24, 1917, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 23, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, Author of every great thought, of every high and holy aspiration, clarify our minds that we may think clearly, and fill our hearts with pure motives in the epoch-making period through which the world is passing, that we, as a people, may do our part in shaping the destiny of mankind. It is a gigantic undertaking for truth against error, righteousness against evil, liberty against oppression, democracy against autocracy, the divine right of men against "the divine right of kings." Without Thee we are impotent; with Thee we are strong, for Thou art mighty to deliver. Uphold, sustain, and guide us, and inspire every American heart with patriotic zeal, that no man, no woman, may be found wanting; that out of the great holocaust shall come a brighter day when men shall learn war no more; and liberty, justice, righteousness, and peace shall reign supreme and the old earth shall rejoice and blossom as the rose, to the glory and honor of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, April 19, 1917, was read and approved.

ALLEN F. COOPER.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great personal sorrow that I announce to the House the death of former Congressman Allen F. Cooper, of Pennsylvania, who died at his home in Uniontown, Pa., on Friday, April 20. Mr. Cooper was a Member of the Fifty-eighth Congress and each succeeding Congress, including the Sixty-first, and I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a short summary of his services in this body.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD, as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, Allen Foster Cooper was elected to the Fifty-eighth Congress from the twenty-third Pennsylvania district, and was reelected to the Fifty-ninth, Sixtieth, and Sixty-first Congresses. He was not a candidate for election to the Sixty-second Congress, and I was elected by the voters of the district to succeed him.

As a Member of Congress, Mr. Cooper was active, energetic, and always watchful of the interests of his district. He was chairman of the Committee on Printing, and gave to this work his close attention.

Mr. Cooper was a lawyer by profession, and was also identified with the large business interests of his home town and Fayette County. He was active and influential in the councils of his party, a man of high character and ideals, domestic in his tastes, and ever ready to take an active part in public affairs. His life and work have left an impress which will last, and his sudden death, which occurred at Uniontown, Pa., April 20, 1917, in the very prime of his life is a distinct loss to the splendid community in which he lived, the State, and the Nation.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STRONG, for to-morrow, Tuesday, on account of important business.

To. Mr. DIES, for several days, on account of illness.

WILLIAM H. PARRY.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, with much sorrow I announce the death in the city of Washington, Saturday last, of Hon. Will H. Parry, vice chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, a citizen of the State of Washington. I shall not take the time of the House further, except to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD concerning his life, character, and services.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1845. An act to authorize PETER GOELET GERRY to enter into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States, for the use of the steam yacht Owera;

S. 995. An act to authorize the issue to States and Territories and the District of Columbia of rifles and other property for the equipment of organizations of home guards; and

S. 1006. An act authorizing the county of Morrison, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said county.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 2338. An act to authorize the detail of additional officers to the Hydrographic Office;

H. R. 2339. An act to increase the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy until September 1, 1918;

H. R. 2340. An act to increase the age limit for persons appointed as officers in the Naval Reserve;

H. R. 1771. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to the Fleet Naval Reserve; and

H. R. 2008. An act to provide for the extension of minority enlistments in the naval service.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:.

S. 1845. An act to authorize PETER GOELET GERRY to enter into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States, for the use of the steam yacht Owera; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 995. An act to authorize the issue to States and Territories and the District of Columbia of rifles and other property for the equipment of organizations of home guards; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 1006. An act authorizing the county of Morrison, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said county; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 1771. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to the Fleet Naval Reserve;

H. R. 2338. An act to authorize the detail of additional officers to the Hydrographic Office;

H. R. 2339. An act to increase the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy until September 1, 1918;

H. R. 2340. An act to increase the age limit for persons appointed as officers in the Naval Reserve; and

H. R. 2008. An act to provide for the extension of minority enlistments in the naval service.

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an editorial from the Evening Sun, of Baltimore, on "Maryland does its bit."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. I shall have to object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

EMERGENCY BOND ISSUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present the conference report and accompanying statement on the bill H. R. 2762, authorizing the bond issue.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from North Carolina wants to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I do that, Mr. Speaker. I ask immediate consideration of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to consider this conference report, notwithstanding it has not been printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. What is the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. KITCHIN. To have the statement read instead of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement was read.

The conference report and accompanying statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 23).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, and 7, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to deposit in such banks and trust companies as he may designate the proceeds, or any part thereof, arising from the sale of the bonds and certificates of indebtedness authorized by this act, or the bonds previously authorized as described in section 4 of this act, and such deposits may bear such rate of interest and be subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That the amount so deposited shall not in any case exceed the amount withdrawn from any such bank or trust company and invested in such bonds or certificates of indebtedness plus the amount so invested by such bank or trust company, and such deposits shall be secured in the manner required for other deposits by section 5153, Revised Statutes, and amendments thereto: Provided further, That the provisions of section 5191 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the Federal reserve act and the amendments thereof, with reference to the reserves required to be kept by national banking associations and other member banks of the Federal Reserve System, shall not apply to deposits of public moneys by the United States in designated depositaries."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment of the title: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the title, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the title inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"An act to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

On amendments Nos. 1 and 2: These amendments make no material change in the bill and are in the interest of clearness; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 3: The bill as it passed the House limited the conversion privilege granted by this bill to December 31, 1918. The Senate changed the limitation to "the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, the date of such termination to be fixed by a proclamation of the President of the United States"; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 4: The Senate amendment provides that the certificates of indebtedness authorized in this bill shall be exempt from all taxation, except estate or inheritance taxes. While this amendment is probably not necessary, it is thought advisable to take this precaution; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 5: The purpose of this amendment is to encourage a great many financial institutions and trust companies to join in assisting in floating this large bond issue. The Senate amendment authorized the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to deposit in such banks and trust companies as he may designate an amount not to exceed the amount withdrawn from such bank or trust company for investment in United States bonds or certificates of indebtedness authorized and issued under the provisions of this bill. For fear that the Senate amendment might be construed to limit the amount that could be deposited in banks or trust companies to the amount withdrawn by depositors the amendment agreed to specifically states that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, may deposit in such banks and trust companies as he may designate an amount of money equivalent to the amount withdrawn from such banks and trust companies and invested in bonds or certificates of indebtedness plus the amount so invested by such bank or trust company.

The amendment agreed to further provides "that the provisions of section 5191 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the Federal reserve act and the amendments thereof, with reference to the reserves required to be kept by national banking associations and other member banks of the Federal Reserve System, shall not apply to deposits of public moneys by the United States in designated depositaries."

On amendment No. 6: This amendment changes the section number; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 7: The Senate amendment requires the Secretary of the Treasury, in addition to the reports now required by law, to make, on the first Monday in December, 1917, and annually thereafter, a report to Congress giving a detailed statement of all expenditures under this act; and the House recedes.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the title, and agrees to the same with an amendment which merely inserts a comma after the word "and" in the third line of the Senate amendment. This amendment is merely in the interest of clearness.

Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from North Carolina might state what it contains.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for one hour.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, amendments Nos. 1 and 2 simply make it more clear that these bonds and certificates of indebtedness are not exempt from the payment of estate or inheritance taxes levied by the Federal Government or by the States.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is that the Senate amendment did make them subject to the estate and inheritance taxes levied by the States.

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. MANN. Not by the Federal Government?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; as the bill passed the House, it exempted estate and inheritance taxes levied either by the State or Federal Government from taxation. The Senate thought that the language was not clear enough and repeated the words, "imposed by any State or local taxing authority." The Senate amendment made the language absolutely clear, and we receded from our disagreement and agreed to that. Now it admits of no doubt but that Congress intended to except from taxation estate and inheritance taxes levied by the Federal Government and by the State authorities.

As to amendment No. 3, you will recall that the House——

Mr. MANN. One moment; as to this amendment No. 1, the amendment, as I understand it—I do not know whether I am right—makes these bonds subject to estate and inheritance taxes levied by the United States?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. But not subject to the estate and inheritance taxes levied by the State?

Mr. KITCHIN. We intended for these bonds to pay the estate and inheritance taxes, whether levied by the Federal Government or the State governments. The Senate amendment makes it more clear that that is the intention of Congress.

Mr. MANN. That is not the way I read it. It says, "shall be exempt."

Mr. KITCHIN. "Both as to principal and interest, from all taxation except estate and inheritance taxes, imposed by authority of the United States, or its possessions," or shall be exempt from all taxes except estate or inheritance taxes imposed by authority of any State except the estate or inheritance taxes. That is the way we had it.

Now it reads:

And shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation except estate or inheritance taxes, imposed by authority of the United States, or its possessions, or by any State of local taxing authority.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is clear.

Mr. GARNER. The way it read in the House bill was sufficient.

Mr. KITCHIN. The way it read in the House bill was sufficient, but they thought it best to repeat that—

Or by "any State or local taxing authority."

This makes it clear that these bonds must pay estate and inheritance taxes levied by State or Federal authority.

Now, amendment No. 3, to which the House agreed, makes this change: In the House bill the period of convertibility of these bonds into those bearing a higher rate of interest, if Congress should pass an act authorizing the issue of bonds at a rate in excess of 3½ per cent, was limited to December 31, 1918. The Senate struck that provision out and made the convertible period the termination of the war with the Imperial German Government. The amendment just extends the time. If the war should last only a year, the convertibility would extend only a year. If the war lasts beyond December 31, 1918, this convertibility privilege is extended beyond that time. We thought there was no objection to that.

Mr. MANN. Now, referring to the other amendments—Nos. 1 and 2—I still think that the reading of the bill excepts those bonds from estate or inheritance taxes levied by a State, but makes them subject to inheritance or estate taxes levied by the Federal Government.

Mr. KITCHIN. No. The language is——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has read it. Let me read it.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right; you read it.

Mr. MANN. It reads:

Shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation except estate or inheritance taxes, imposed by authority of the United States, or its possessions, or by any State or local taxing authority.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is, excepted from the exemption.

Mr. HASTINGS. Exactly.

Mr. KITCHIN. In other words, the Federal Government taxes these bonds with respect to estate or inheritance taxes.

Mr. MANN. I believe the gentleman is right.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If a person of large fortune invests $100,000 or $500,000 in these bonds, will he be liable to any taxes of any kind to the Federal or the State Government?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not until he dies. He will pay no taxes except estate or inheritance taxes.

Mr. ADAMSON. And after he is dead he will not care.

Mr. KITCHIN. No. Now, amendment No. 4 simply makes it clear that the certificate of indebtedness shall be exempted from taxation in the same manner as the bonds.

No. 5 is entirely a new section. The statement of the managers on the part of the House fully explains the section and is as follows:

The purpose of this amendment is to encourage a great many financial institutions and trust companies to join in assisting in floating this large bond issue. The Senate amendment authorized the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to deposit in such banks and trust companies as he may designate an amount not to exceed the amount withdrawn from such bank or trust company for investment in United States bonds or certificates of indebtedness authorized and issued under the provisions of this bill. For fear that the Senate amendment might be construed to limit the amount that could be deposited in banks or trust companies to the amount withdrawn by depositors the amendment agreed to specifically states that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, may deposit in such banks and trust companies as he may designate an amount of money equivalent to the amount withdrawn from such banks and trust companies and invested in bonds or certificates of indebtedness plus the amount so invested by such bank or trust company.

The amendment agreed to further provides "that the provisions of section 5191 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the Federal reserve act and the amendments thereof, with reference to the reserves required to be kept by national banking associations and other member banks of the Federal Reserve System, shall not apply to deposits of public moneys by the United States in designated depositaries."

But for this provision the Secretary of the Treasury would have no power to make these deposits in trust companies or State banks and nonmember banks of the Federal Reserve System. So we enlarge his power to make deposits in trust companies and State banks as well as the banks of the Federal reserve, to the extent of not exceeding the amount of the money withdrawn by depositors from those banks to buy these bonds and to the extent of the amount which those banks may invest in the bonds. So it seems to put the trust companies and State banks, if they furnish money to buy these bonds, on the same terms as to deposits as the national banks or the member banks of the reserve system.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The Secretary of the Treasury can now deposit money in the national banks, or members of the Federal reserve.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is so much talk around me I can not hear what the gentleman says.

Mr. MANN. The Secretary now has the authority to make deposits in banks which are members of the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; if he names them as depositors.

Mr. MANN. This is possibly technical. The language is this:

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to deposit in such banks and trust companies as he may designate the proceeds—

And so forth. Here is a new authority covering all banks, not merely State banks and trust companies, but also by its language covering the present national banks. Well, that can do no harm, of course, except that having designated all banks in the first part of this amendment, in the proviso you say—

In no case shall an amount so deposited exceed the amount withdrawn from such bank or trust company for investment in United States bonds or certificates of indebtedness authorized and issued under the provisions of this act.

Now, that is all banks. That was not the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; it is not all State banks or trust companies, but such as he may designate as depositories.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman inserts a word which is not in the amendment. The gentleman says "State banks."

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The language of the amendment is "banks," which covers all banks.

Mr. KITCHIN. It means State banks or trust companies, for the reason that now he has power to designate only members of the Federal reserve or national banks. Now we make it all banks. Therefore it includes the State banks and trust companies.

Mr. MANN. I understand that; but you say "banks." That covers all banks.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; all that he may designate.

Mr. MANN. Then you say below:

In no case shall an amount so deposited exceed the amount withdrawn from such bank or trust company for investment in United States bonds or certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That was not intended to restrict the amount that he may deposit in member banks to the amount withdrawn from those member banks.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it is this——

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it was. That proviso was in for this purpose——

Mr. MANN. I know what the purpose is.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us see if it does not carry out the purpose. If that proviso were not in, then we will say here is a trust company or State bank right across the street which would take $500,000 of these bonds, and without that proviso and this section 7, the Secretary of the Treasury could take that money right out of that bank and put it in a national bank, its competitor, on the other side of the street.

Mr. MANN. That does not come from the proviso; that comes from the main part of the section.

Mr. KITCHIN. Here is what it does. Suppose the national bank right across the street had put in $500,000 and the State bank on the other side had put in $500,000. If you did not have that proviso the Secretary could take all of the $500,000 from the State bank and put it over in the national bank, which would then have $500,000 more than the national bank had paid for the bonds.

Mr. MANN. I understand the purpose of it. If money is withdrawn from the State bank, then that money may be deposited in the State bank, so that the money will not be taken out of the bank before it is used; but I am calling the attention of the gentleman to the language. The first provision in the section covers all banks, and the second provision is a proviso that he can not deposit any more in any such bank than the amount withdrawn. It was not the purpose, as I understand it, to put that restriction on the present member banks. They must have some place to deposit the money.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it was.

Mr. MANN. It will not all be redeposited in the same banks.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is right; but if the national bank across the street to which I referred had taken only $500,000 of the bonds, this proviso says that he shall not put more than $500,000 in that bank. It does not say that he shall put as much as that, but not more than that. He can leave $300,000 in that bank, but he can not put in more.

Mr. MANN. Where will he put the balance?

Mr. KITCHIN. He would put the balance if he needed the balance into the Treasury and pay it out.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it would not be put in the Treasury. It might be half a million dollars. You do not want to remove the money from circulation.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; not from circulation.

Mr. MANN. Here is a State bank which the gentleman says takes $500,000, but it may be only $10,000. They may not desire to put up the security in order to retain this money. The money is going to be deposited in some banks, it is not going to be deposited in Washington or in a Subtreasury, because that would take it out of circulation. I am sure that it was not the intention in preparing this amendment to say that the Secretary was limited in the amount that he could deposit in the member banks, but when you say "such banks" then "such banks" refer to all banks, and I am afraid you do put that limitation on.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman that that very matter was discussed, and it was the bone of contention for two days, that very point that he raises. I do not know that I ought to say anything about what took place in the conference, but some of the conferees felt that if you did not put this limitation on, the funds would go to the State or the trust bank right across the street——

Mr. MANN. I am not objecting to that limitation.

Mr. KITCHIN. Wait a moment—get this money out and put it over here in a competitor bank that is a member of the reserve, and if you can put in the Federal reserve or the member bank more money than it has paid for bonds, then you can do this, because the law does not say that you shall keep the amount in each bank which has been taken out for investment, but it says that you can not keep to exceed that. That is to protect the State banks, and I would say the Secretary of the Treasury and some of the conferees would prefer to have exactly what the gentleman claims, but the conferees could not get together on that.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I think possibly the gentleman from North Carolina does not get quite clear the points of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I do get the points clear.

Mr. HARDY. Let me see if I understand it the way the gentleman does. As I understand it, the gentleman's objection is that under the present law the national banks, the Federal reserve banks, may receive more of these deposits than are taken from their vaults?

Mr. KITCHIN. They would have to receive all but for this section 7.

Mr. HARDY. They may receive all that they paid out and other sums invested in this money.

Mr. KITCHIN. All other sums, except for this section 7.

Mr. HARDY. This section 7 will prevent even a national bank from receiving any more sums than were paid out from that national bank.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman think that is wise?

Mr. KITCHIN. To be absolutely candid, personally I did not think that was the wisest course, but the conferees could not agree on anything else than that.

Mr. MANN. I am sure that will not be the construction in the Treasury Department, although that is what the language says.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think that is what the conferees intended, or some of them, because they would not agree to anything else, to be candid with the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman tell how long this money is to be left in the member banks or the banks that purchase these bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. He will keep it there as long as practicable, no doubt.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. When the bonds are purchased the purchasing bank pays the money to the Government or the Federal Reserve Bank. This bank is out that money. Now it reimburses itself by sales to customers and also by the deposits of money received there. It does not send it away, as I understand it.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is to keep it in the bank as long as practicable.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is equivalent simply to depositing these bonds with the member banks.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the great inducement to the banks to help float these bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is the same with the certificates, as I understand it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, of course, section 6 is simply a renumbering of the section——

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman gets away from section 7 I wish the gentleman would advise us what was the reasoning that led the conferees to agree to the last proviso of section 7.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, now, banks outside of certain cities, such as Albany, Philadelphia, Boston, and so forth, are required to keep a certain reserve as against the amount of deposits and their circulation.

Now, that is simply a security for its deposits. When the Government makes deposits of public money it requires gilt-edge security for them. We thought it was nothing but right to release those reserves and not have further security for Government moneys than the security they must put up in order to get those moneys, and that that would release the reserves and get them in circulation and in use by the people.

Mr. WINGO. I do not agree that the only function of reserves is security for deposits; but that does not meet the question that occurred to my mind. As a matter of fact, the practical operation of this act will be this: That the banks will purchase these bonds offered on their own account or for their customers, and under the deposit feature there will be no money paid out by them, but the deposit account will be altered so that instead of it being that of their customers it will be that of the United States Government. In other words, these banks will not be out a single dollar.

Mr. KITCHIN. Wait a minute. Why will they not be out a single dollar?

Mr. WINGO. I do not think they will be. I think that the object of this very deposit provision is to enable the Government to procure credits to the extent of the bonds sold without disturbing the finances of the country, and with that we all agree. The very object of this deposit provision is to prevent a financial stringency that would be produced by withdrawing this great, enormous amount of money.

Mr. KITCHIN. The object of this is to do exactly what I said, to release the reserve that under the present law is required to be kept as security for public moneys deposited. Now, when that public money is deposited ample security must be given. No man on the conference committee questioned that at all. We all thought it was right and proper.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will permit me to conclude, I was making a statement; and he is thinking about one thing, and I am discussing another. At the time I was talking about the deposit proposition and now——

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman referred to the last proviso, and I thought he was discussing that.

Mr. WINGO. I was discussing the deposit of the proceeds of bonds, and I was getting down to the effect of this reserve provision——

Mr. KITCHIN. I thought that was what the gentleman was discussing.

Mr. WINGO. No; I think the gentleman did not pay attention to what I was discussing, or he would have seen that I was discussing what is in the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. But the gentleman referred to the last proviso.

Mr. WINGO. There is no use discussing the effect of a thing unless you get at the cause of it and what you are doing; and I was leading up to my question, which was this: The object of this deposit provision is to prevent a disturbance by withdrawing from the vaults of the banks this enormous sum of money, and I approve that. Now, against these funds at the present time they are required to maintain a reserve. Now, under the deposit provision these funds will not be withdrawn immediately. It is intended that this loan shall be a credit to the allies, and consequently the only effect of this whole bond issue will be a transference of the credit in the banks of the country. That is the reason it will be easy to float the bond issue. You will not change the status of the banks so far as the funds are concerned, and yet you are creating a greater inflation at this time of inflation by taking off the reserve requirements of the law, which all agree are low enough.

You have not placed any burden upon the banks, because with this deposit provision you have removed the burden, the danger you wanted to avoid, and in addition to that you go further and say, "We will free you from the reserve requirements so far as these deposits are concerned."

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman does not state it right. We remove them from requirements of reserves against the proceeds of these bonds which will be deposited in banks.

Mr. WINGO. And the funds will still be there and still be used for financial purposes, and the release of that much of their funds from reserve requirements will enable them to extend their credit much more.

Mr. KITCHIN. And enable the people to have much more money to use.

Mr. WINGO. And result in additional inflation.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know whether you would call it inflation or not. It releases so much more money for the use of the people. It does not create any new currency. It may permit a transfer of credits.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a bank or its depositors subscribe for a million of dollars of these bonds. That money is in the bank. The bank is to keep $120,000 of it, say, as reserve. The moment it subscribes a million dollars that reserve is wiped out, and it does not have to keep any reserve on account of that million dollars. That is inflation. Then when the Government draws the money out and it gets back into the bank through depositors then they have to keep the reserve of $120,000. That is contraction. One of the two is sure to make trouble.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that if a bank in Washington has $100,000 now, and if I go there and borrow that money, according to the view of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], and I pay it out for building, and so forth, the currency is inflated. When I pay it back it will be contracted. It will be that kind of contraction and inflation, and that is the only kind of inflation and contraction that will take place. It matters not whether you call it contraction or inflation if the Government puts in a bank $1,000,000 of deposits, the Government would require that bank to keep in there under the present law $120,000 of reserve. It could not loan it out, but it would be tied up in their security for this $1,000,000 of Government deposits. Now, as the law requires the Government to give gilt-edged security, Government bonds, or State bonds, or other gilt-edged security, in that bank and requires the bank to put up this security for that $1,000,000 of deposits, we thought it was only right that this $120,000 of reserve required should be turned loose to be loaned to the people, because the Government does not need that additional security, for the reason that it has got security from the banks in the form of United States bonds, or State bonds, or other gilt-edged securities.

Mr. MANN. Now, to-day, if they buy $5,000,000 of bonds under existing circumstanes with that $1,000,000 in the bank, they can only loan $880,000. To-morrow, if they buy bonds, they can loan the whole $1,000,000 of it. The next day, if it comes back to private deposits, they can loan only $880,000 of it.

Mr. KITCHIN. You have that kind of contraction and inflation. You can not prevent that. I think the people will need all these reserves when they begin to borrow this money or begin to pay it out.

Mr. MANN. That is the only reason we have the high cost of living. They reduce reserves and inflate the currency.

Mr. WINGO. We have never been asked to do this before. We considered this matter when we lowered the reserves by the Federal reserve act, and we lowered them to a dangerous point. And it is one of the elements of the high cost of living now, and the issuance of this large volume of bonds is going to increase the cost of living sufficiently without taking off the reserve on $5,000,000,000 at one fell swoop. This is not a mere bugaboo that I have raised, but it is a dangerous proposition, and the banks that demand this have no right to demand it. It is not necessary. You can float these bonds without giving them this additional privilege.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think there is something in what you say.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Was the question of the disposal of these bonds considered by the committee? Can the chairman tell us what becomes of them, how the bonds will be disposed of, whether by the Federal reserve banks or by the United States Treasury or by these large banks, and where they will be placed for sale?

Mr. KITCHIN. That will be left to the Secretary of the Treasury. He will dispose of them in the way that he thinks he will get the most for them. I think the banks will take a large portion of them and sell them to their depositors.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will they be sent to these banks to be disposed of?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; they will just subscribe for them and advertise them.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina how the banks will ascertain what these withdrawals will be used for?

Mr. KITCHIN. It does not say what they are to be withdrawn for, but it would be an actual investment.

Mr. McFADDEN. This will be only for actual investment?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. If a depositor withdraws $100,000 from your bank and puts that $100,000 into a bond, the bank of course will know that, and the Secretary of the Treasury can deposit that amount of money in the bank.

Mr. McFADDEN. The question I wish to propound is this: In many instances there will be withdrawals by individuals who do not care to have anybody know about them.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then the bank will not get those deposits.

Mr. McFADDEN. I would like to ask just one more question.

Mr. KITCHIN. Very well.

Mr. McFADDEN. Under this authorization it gives the Secretary of the Treasury the discretion to deposit bonds in any bank?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. McFADDEN. This applies to the 27,000 banks in the United States. Do I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury will distribute these deposits equitably to all the banks?

Mr. KITCHIN. Only equitably so far as practicable to those banks that subscribe or whose depositors subscribe and take bonds.

Mr. McFADDEN. One more question. There is in hiding, it has been stated frequently on the floor of the House, about $800,000,000 or $900,000,000. Suppose this should draw out $600,000,000 of that money. Where is that money to be deposited—idle funds in people's stockings and in hiding?

Mr. KITCHIN. That will be deposited in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. McFADDEN. We are limited to the amount that is withdrawn from these banks?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; you can not exceed that amount withdrawn from the banks. I imagine that will be deposited in the regional banks or the Treasury.

Mr. McFADDEN. In the 12 regional banks?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; either in the 12 regional banks or in the Treasury Department.

Mr. McFADDEN. And the surplus can be deposited in any one of the 12 regional banks?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; or in the Treasury. That will be paid up.

Mr. McFADDEN. You mean the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, just a word further regarding the deposit of the proceeds of this big bond issue by the Secretary of the Treasury in national and State banks of the country. So far as the national banks or member banks of the Federal Reserve System are concerned, the per cent of reserve is fixed for all of them by the Federal reserve law, but for State banks the required reserves differ in the many States, the legal requirements being fixed by the States themselves. These State banks and trust companies, if they are to receive these deposits, should be made to keep a reserve against these deposits the same as the national banks; and a good plan to cover this would be that the Secretary of the Treasury make a ruling that all State banks receiving deposits from the proceeds of this loan be required to keep the same reserve as do the national or member banks of the Federal Reserve System, and, further, the Secretary of the Treasury should leave or deposit these funds in the banks in the localities in which the subscription originates until the United States uses the same instead of transferring or consolidating the same in the few large city banks, thus to preserve the even tranquillity of our financial institutions the country over.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; they could keep it in that, or the Secretary of the Treasury could put it in the regional reserve.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. This does not interfere with the present arrangements for deposits?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. It gives an additional right to others.

Mr. PLATT. So that if money comes out of hiding it can come out under the present arrangements?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. This section here refers only to the proceeds of those bonds and not withdrawals from the banks.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. What will be the security? Will the bonds be the security of the Secretary of the Treasury for these deposits?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think under the law he will have the right to do that.

Mr. WINGO. Does not the gentleman anticipate that these bonds will be the security that will be placed there?

Mr. KITCHIN. Some of it.

Mr. WINGO. Where else will you get sufficient?

Mr. KITCHIN. We have a law now with reference to the security required by law.

Mr. WINGO. He naturally would give the preference to the bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. Suppose a bank in my town, for example, has no United States bonds and no State bonds or any of these securities, and say a $40,000 depositor would take these bonds. My bank could not get any of that money, for the reason it would not have any of the security to put up, unless it would go and rent this depositor's bonds, so to speak; and if he turned those bonds over to it, it would get security.

Mr. WINGO. I am not objecting.

Mr. KITCHIN. I know that. I know the gentleman is only asking for information. There are a great many of these bonds that will not be deposited for security.

Mr. WINGO. There will be many that will be, though.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have in mind parties that have money in savings banks and in local banks who will take that money out and buy these bonds and put the bonds in their pockets. They will not put them back into the banks, and the banks have not the securities to get the deposits. There are many banks in that situation.

Now, the seventh amendment requires the Secretary of the Treasury to make a report as to all expenditures under this act.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman give me five minutes before he does that?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I will do that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to agree to the conference report on this important matter, because I recognize the fact that we do not want a delay. But, understanding this reserve question as I do, and knowing the dangers of this very provision, I can not conscientiously agree to the conference report, and I shall vote against it, even though I am the only man to do so. I want briefly, in the five minutes allotted to me, to call your attention to what the effect of this provision is.

If you will refer to section 5191 of the Revised Statutes, you will find the provisions with reference to reserves, as amended by the Federal reserve act.

We are voting under this bill $5,000,000,000 of bonds. The President of the United States, in his address that he delivered here a few days ago suggesting this issue, very wisely called attention to the danger of such a large bond issue, and the President was not unnecessarily alarmed. It was not an imaginary danger that confronted the country, but it was of such importance that the President felt it necessary to warn this Congress.

What do you do gentlemen? This $5,000,000,000 of bonds, reduced to a mathematical proposition under this last proviso of section 7, means a possible inflation of credit in this country of exactly $3,000,000,000. Do you want that additional inflation at this time? It is admitted by all that one cause of our present high prices in this country is the inflation of the currency and of our credits. Yet at one fell swoop you propose to swell the credits of this country $3,000,000,000. It is bad enough to issue $5,000,000,000 of bonds. That may well make men hesitate at the danger that would come from such a great bond issue. It made the President hesitate, and for that reason he called the attention of Congress to the danger. We can obviate a part of that danger by not waiving the reserve requirements on deposits of the proceeds of these bonds, as is done under this last proviso. What is the necessity for it? Do you mean to tell me that the banks of this country and their depositors and customers will not buy these bonds unless you grant this privilege? The wise bankers of this country do not ask for this provision. The wise bankers of this country for the past two years have been warning their associate bankers throughout the country against the dangers of inflation, caused by the extraordinary conditions which exist in this country.

The gentleman says the proceeds of these bonds will be deposited in the banks, and that in the course of a few months they will come back as deposits, against which there must be maintained the legal reserves. But you will immediately inflate the credit of the country to a possible $3,000,000,000, and soon thereafter—within the course of six or eight months—you will contract the credit of the country to an equal extent. Does any sane or sensible man think that is not going to have an effect upon prices and upon financial conditions in this country? Do you think you are at the end of your needs when you issue these $5,000,000,000 of bonds? Do you not know that when you meet next December you will be faced with the necessity for another issue if this war goes on? Do you want to have unsettled the financial conditions in this country when next year you want to issue additional bonds? There will be but one answer, and that will be that the unsettled conditions produced by this cause and other causes that will exist will compel you to pay a higher rate of interest for the next issue that comes on and automatically reconvert the present issue into a higher rate of interest.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not mean to convey the idea that we will inflate credit to the extent of $3,000,000,000, but he means only to the extent of 15 per cent of $3,000,000,000.

Mr. WINGO. To the extent of $3,000,000,000. There will be $5,000,000,000 of bonds issued.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. And 12 per cent of that will be $600,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. And on the basis of 5 to 1, the usual credit basis, that will be $3,000,000,000—five times $600,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the loaning power.

Mr. WINGO. I am talking about the inflation of credit. I am not inveighing against the banks. The wisest bankers in this country have been warning this Congress of this very condition during the last two years, and whenever they have spoken in their association meetings they have warned the country bankers and have warned Congress of the dangers of inflation. That is one of the causes of the high prices right now. Through this provision you can enter upon this policy, and having once taken the step, the next act for issue of bonds will carry this same provision, and the people of this country, through increased prices, will pay these bonds over the counter when they purchase supplies and food and clothing, and still the next generation will have these bonds to pay.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman think there would really be an expansion in loans of 5 to 1?

Mr. WINGO. I do not think there is any question about it.

Mr. PLATT. I think it is very unlikely.

Mr. WINGO. Of course, it will not go to the maximum. There are a great many wise bankers in the country who see the danger, and they are now guarding against it as best they can, but the history of every war tells you what the effect is on business.

These older men who sit here know the history of the expansion of credit in the Civil War, in the purchase of great volumes of supplies, and they know what is in danger of happening in this country in the course of a few months when the $5,000,000,000 are going to be spent by the allies. They know what is going to happen. They know what is going to happen to credits.

Mr. PLATT. But $3,000,000,000 of this are to be exchanged for bonds of the allies. Does the gentleman think that would make any such inflation?

Mr. WINGO. I do not think that will have anything at all to do with it, because the $3,000,000,000 of bonds of the allies will simply be security for the money that our Government is going to loan to the allies. Our Government is going to loan this money for the purpose of providing credits in this country. They are going to spend that money in the purchase of supplies.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield me five minutes?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think there is something in the statement made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], but here is the situation. We expect to have national banks—under which term I include members of the Federal reserve as a matter of convenience—and State banks also subscribing for these bonds and getting their depositors to subscribe for the bonds. If a national bank subscribes for the bonds and the money is redeposited in the national bank, the national bank would be required to keep, say, 12 per cent of those deposits as reserves under existing law, while the State bank would only be required to keep that portion as reserves that is redeposited, which the State law requires, and in most cases, or in many cases, that is a negligible amount. Of course, we can not change the requirements of the State laws concerning reserves in State banks.

I assume that the purpose of the proviso referred to eliminating reserves entirely as to redeposits made by the Government in banks which have subscribed for the bonds is an effort to put the national banks on at least as good terms as the State bank. I doubt very much, however, the propriety of eliminating reserves on account of any deposits made by the General Government. How long this money will stay in the banks no one knows. If it stays long and the reserves as to those deposits are wiped out, that will mean a considerable increase in the loaning power of the banks and probably a large increase in the amount of loans of the banks. That is expansion, inflation. When, however, the money is paid out by the Government and put back into the banks by private depositors, then the banks will have to keep their reserves, and that means contraction. I doubt the advisability of the inflation in the first place, and, if it occurs, everyone knows that there will be trouble when it comes to the contraction.

Mr. MADDEN. That would require the banks, then, to call their loans in many cases.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. All of these deposits will have to be backed by security.

Mr. MANN. The security has nothing to do with the question of reserves.

Mr. PLATT. It has this to do: According to the theorists on this matter, every bond or security has a potential credit and can be put up and borrowed upon somewhere else. The banks have got these securities, which they can borrow on somewhere else. If they pledge them, then that much currency is taken out of circulation.

Mr. MANN. A bank is supposed to have security for all of its deposits upon which it can obtain money. It is supposed to have securities for all of its deposits, and whether in the hands of the bank or in the hands of the General Government does not cut any figure at all, except as to the security to the General Government, and the General Government in addition to the security claims a first lien upon the deposits of the bank. In the national banks I do not think the question of security has anything whatever to do with the question of reserves or with inflation or contraction.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Take this example. A bank in Chicago buys $1,000,000 worth of these bonds of the Government of the United States. The Government of the United States pays that million dollars back into the bank in Chicago. The Chicago bank sells those bonds to the member banks or national banks throughout the country. How can the Government put that money that the national banks pay to the Chicago banks back in the member national bank?

Mr. MANN. It leaves it there, of course.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. You could not get the bonds without disturbing all of the finances of the country, if you take the money out when they buy the bonds. They have to leave the money in circulation, or you would have a cataclysm.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The money would be put in the Chicago bank instead of in the member bank, because the United States could not take that money out of the Chicago bank.

Mr. MANN. The member bank will buy its own bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; and the Government will not put any money back into that member bank.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] seems to think that the sale of those bonds to the people of the country is going to inflate values. Did anyone ever hear tell of a war in any country on the face of the earth the result of which was not to inflate values? If so, I would like to have him tell me what war it was and when it happened. My good friends, the sale of those bonds among the people of the country is going to cause a more stringent money market. It is going to divert the funds of the banks of the country into channels other than those used now, and it is going to cause money borrowers of this country to pay more interest for the money they get. There is no question about that. That is going to have a tendency to inflate values. The more interest you must pay for money to carry on your business the more you must get in value for the product of your institution, and the consumer in the end must pay that increased cost. I do not know that I grasped the real point the gentleman made about the reserves in the Federal banks. Under the law there is a certain amount of money required to be held as reserves in national banks.

A certain amount of that money must be put into Federal banks by any bank that becomes a member bank. This proposition permits that money to be used as collateral security for the money deposited in local banks by the Government, which money went for the purchase of those bonds, and if you do not permit that reserve to be used as collateral security, it means that the banks of the country must put up that much more money for security and divert it from the natural channels of business in local territories. Which of the two is the most likely to inflate values?

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will yield, he misunderstood me. I did not discuss the matter that he is discussing. I agree with the gentleman, and I think if the gentleman had listened, he would have understood. I called attention to the fact that wars cause inflation in prices. Does the gentleman want to further inflate the credit in this country by removing the reserve requirements of banks by legislation? I think the gentleman will agree with me when he sees what I am driving at.

Mr. FORDNEY. Perhaps I did not understand the gentleman. I do not want to do anything by an act of legislation that will inflate the values beyond what they are naturally going to be inflated because of the war.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman will admit that the decreasing of the reserve inflates the credit.

Mr. FORDNEY. The question is whether you use it as collateral security or put up another like amount as security and thereby double the amount in the Federal bank. Which of the two is most likely to cause a tight money market and increase value of interest, and consequently inflating values?

Mr. WINGO. I may not understand, but I think both will, and for that reason I am opposed to either.

Mr. FORDNEY. Of course both will; but the two together will make it double.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman and I agree; I do not want any more inflation.

Mr. FORDNEY. This bill does not do anything of the kind.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will yield further, will not the decrease of the reserves inflate credit?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know that I fully understand the real sense of the gentleman's question. Here is a certain amount of money in the reserve bank to-day, put up for membership. Is not that true?

Mr. WINGO. There is so much confusion in the Hall I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does not the national bank to-day which becomes a member of the Federal banking system put up a certain amount of reserve in that bank?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; for a certain purpose, but that is not the reserve that I am talking about.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. FORDNEY. That money is now in the banks, and the bill permits it to be used as collateral security for Government money deposited in the banks or invested in the bonds. Does the gentleman want to double it?

Mr. WINGO. That is not the proposition.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, it is.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is talking about the reserve required to be maintained by the member bank with the Federal reserve bank. He is talking about another reserve.

Mr. FORDNEY. Do you not, as a member bank, have to put up money to become a member of the Federal bank?

Mr. WINGO. Every bank whether or not it goes into the Federal Reserve System must maintain lawful reserves.

Mr. FORDNEY. What has that got to do with this bill?

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to me for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER. I think the gentleman from Arkansas refers to that clause in the conference amendment by which we exempt from reserve requirement the deposits from sales of these bonds. That is what the gentleman has referred to, is it not?

Mr. WINGO. That is one of the undisputed facts.

Mr. GARDNER. Will not the gentleman admit that the issuance of this great amount of bonds will of necessity force up the rate of return on money unless there is something else done to offset it?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I have not heard the reason given by the members of the conference committee for this provision in the bill, but I assume that one of the reasons is—and I ask the gentleman from Michigan if it is not true—that the Treasury Department apprehends that it will have to invoke the aid of thousands of nonmember State banks and trust companies in placing this loan?

Mr. FORDNEY. I wish the gentleman would be brief, as I have only two minutes.

Mr. GLASS. Very well, I have not the time to ask the question.

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to say that the Government must, in the sale of these bonds, appeal to other banks in the country to buy the bonds aside from those that are member banks of the Federal Reserve System, and must go to banks operating under State laws that are not now members of the Federal Reserve Bank System. Their reserve is not affected at all by the security put up as collateral for deposit in their banks. It is only the national banks that are member banks that have a deposit put up that is required under the law in order for them to become a member bank.

The real point and gist of the law is that the Secretary of the Treasury must permit to remain in the bank all the money which is invested in these bonds, or practically so—a very large amount of money so invested—because if the State banks invest heavily in bonds the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the withdrawal of that money from the State banks and deposit it in a national bank—take all the money invested in these bonds from all the banks of the country and send it to New York or anywhere else and deposit it in one of the national banks—it would immediately cause a contraction of the currency all over the country, would it not?

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York—I will yield three minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Two minutes, I think, will be sufficient. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there is something in what the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] said, but I do not think there is very much in it as a practical matter. It must be remembered that very few other countries have any reserve requirements for their banks at all, and reserves are kept as a necessity of good banking practice and not generally because of the requirements of the law. The banks that may have these moneys redeposited in them, after having invested their own funds or the funds of their customers in these bonds, would never dare to loan that money out down to 12 per cent. They will keep, in my opinion, more than a 12 per cent reserve anyway whether they are required to do so or not, and as a matter of fact the law does not now require a full reserve to be kept against Government deposits in banks of the Federal Reserve system, when secured by collateral. This provision, I have no doubt, was put in to equalize the National banks or member banks and State banks. Personally I do not believe that it makes any real difference as far as inflation is concerned whether it is in there or not.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not believe in requiring a reserve at all?

Mr. PLATT. That is not quite true as a general statement. In a system like ours with so many small banks I believe a reserve requirement is essential, but without a reserve requirement for any deposits most of the banks would act just as they do now, and would keep about the same reserve or larger.

Mr. WINGO. But it is an indisputable fact that a decrease of reserve increases credits, does it not?

Mr. PLATT. Potentially and theoretically it does.

Mr. WINGO. And makes it possible——

Mr. PLATT. Now, the gentleman knows this: That according to the last statement of the Comptroller of the Currency the national banks of the United States are holding way above their reserve requirements to-day in spite of the great demand for money. I think it was something over $1,000,000,000 on the date of the last call, that of March 5. Now, why are they doing that? Simply because good banking demands that they shall, and the same thing will apply whether you put in this exemption or take it out.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Is it not known there are a great many bankers of this country who recognize that the present reserve requirements are too low and they keep a higher reserve than they are required to keep, and that is the reason——

Mr. PLATT. I think that is part of it, but the gentleman knows there is before the Committee on Banking and Currency now, or will be shortly, a proposition coming from the Federal Reserve Board to still further lower the requirements of the reserve.

Mr. WINGO. That may be true, but that does not change the fact that as you decrease the reserves you make it possible to increase credits.

Mr. PLATT. Potentially, yes; but the banks know what they have to do, and they generally keep their reserves about right, anyway. What I mean to say is this: The gentleman from Arkansas can not say with any confidence that the waiving of the reserve requirements as to these special Government deposits will actually result in any inflation at all.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KITCHIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3545, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be continued during to-day, one half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the other half by myself, and that the committee rise at 6 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not mean that general debate will close to-day?

Mr. DENT. Oh, no; not at all; that general debate shall continue to-day and the time to be controlled one half by the gentleman from California and the other half by myself and that the committee rise at 6 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3545, and pending that he asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill shall run to-day, one half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and that the committee rise at 6 o'clock.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question to see if I am mistaken in my impression. It is not the purpose of the chairman of the committee to close general debate on the bill after the debate to-day, but that debate to-day shall extend until 6 o'clock.

Mr. DENT. It is the purpose not to close general debate.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And as to its conclusion there will be an agreement?

Mr. DENT. In other words, there will be an agreement later.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I desired to know that so there might be no misunderstanding.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Is that the way the Speaker understands it, that part of the unanimous-consent request that general debate continue to-day, but is not to be concluded to-day?

The SPEAKER. Why, of course, this simply provides for to-day, and sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. [Applause.] So that everybody will know what the request of the gentleman from Alabama is the Chair will state again. That this simply provides for to-day, and there is no attempt to shut off debate when we adjourn to-day, but that will be another matter. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3545, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3545, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill may be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I think I may fairly state at the outset that there has been more misrepresentation of the attitude of the Committee on Military Affairs, or a majority of that committee, on the pending proposition than has ever heretofore occurred in the history of this Republic. [Applause.] There is no question that the Congress of the United States, after having declared war, stands ready and willing to back the President of the United States in order to make that declaration effective. [Applause.] The only feature that hurts me in all of this program is that there should be a feeling that the method by which this declaration should be carried into effect should not even be considered by Members of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if we are willing to say that we will adopt a resolution authorizing the President to draft or to call for volunteers, authorizing the President to call for all the resources of the country in his own good way, without any other action on the part of Congress, then we might as well adopt that resolution and adjourn to-day. [Applause.] This has been a most embarrassing situation to me. I hope the committee will pardon me for this personal reference, but I wish to say that I have been to the President and I have been to the Secretary of War with every proposition of compromise, upon the theory that I think unity of action at this particular time is more important than the method of raising an army. And I think so yet. I think that it ought to be known to the country that we will do what is necessary. But the method of getting the army should be one that is worked out by the proper legislative process.

Now, let us see what this bill actually does according to the majority report. In the first place, it authorizes the increase of the Regular Army up to war strength, which will produce an army of about 287,000 to 290,000 men. That increase to the Regular Army is authorized, first, by voluntary enlistment, and in the event that fails the President is authorized to fill up the gap by conscription. In the next place, this bill authorizes the increase in the National Guard up to war strength, first, by voluntary enlistment, and if that fails, then by conscription. If that is increased to war strength as authorized by the national defense act, which provides for 800 men for every Member of Congress, you will have a National Guard composed of about 625,000 men. That gives you an army, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, of over 900,000 men—practically a million. So that this bill, first, by utilizing the voluntary enlistment system, and, second, by using the draft, if necessary, gives to the President an army of practically a million men, an army of the size that he is asking us to appropriate for. He is not asking us to appropriate for more than a million men as it is. Now, the only difference, the only real difference, between the majority of the committee and the President and the War Department is this: They want authority to conscript a half million more. Then they want additional authority to conscript still a half million more if necessary, so that the army will eventually amount to about 2,000,000 men. I say, then, the only real difference between the majority of the committee and the President is this: That the majority of the committee of the House believes that while the President is proceeding with his census of the men between the military ages, that while he is finding out by registration who will be liable and the class from which he can draft this half a million men, an opportunity shall be given to the country to volunteer that number of men. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not there also a very important and fundamental difference between the two propositions in regard to the range of the ages of those whom it is proposed to enroll, the War Department asking that the entire burden of the war be placed upon boys and men from 19 to 25, and the committee proposing that the burden shall be spread on all the mature men of the country from 21 to 40?

Mr. DENT. The gentleman is entirely accurate and exact in his statement of the proposition. I had not reached that. I was simply speaking of the method of raising the army first and will refer later to the details of those who will compose it.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman inform us whether or not the War Department is opposed to the age limit being fixed at 40?

Mr. DENT. The Secretary is.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, a great many of us are interested in this matter, and I suggest that the gentleman be allowed to finish his statement before he is interrupted further. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to finish the statement I am going to make, and then I am willing to answer any question I can answer, if any gentleman wishes to ask.

Now, I stated, Mr. Chairman, that I thought the most important consideration at this time was unity of action on the part of Congress in backing up the declaration of war and not the method of selecting an Army, because I believe there will be no difficulty in getting an Army of 2,000,000 men in this country in order to carry on a war if necessary, by either the voluntary process or by the draft system. I have not the slightest doubt about that. But the misconception that exists among many people and the misrepresentation that has been deliberately indulged in by a certain portion of the press of this country, and especially those of them that have been on every side of every important question in recent years and not loyal to any [applause], has resulted in the charge that a majority of the committee was opposing the President in allowing him to have a bill that would give universal liability to military service.

There never was in all the history of this country a greater misrepresentation of the facts. As the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] suggested a little while ago, there is a suggestion of universal service and universal liability to service. Let us see what the bill drafted by the War Department and sent to the committee proposes to do. It proposes to select from the male citizenship of this country every person between the ages of 19 and 25. Is it universal liability for service to take a selected class between the ages of 19 and 25, and then to exempt certain members of that class, those that are physically defective, those that have religious scruples against war, and so forth, and so on? The statement is made that the male population of this country between those ages is 7,000,000; that of that 7,000,000 about 42 per cent will be exempt from one cause or another, so that there will be left about 4,000,000 people between that age from which to select an Army of 500,000 men. And yet that is called universal service and universal liability to service. It is one of the most arbitrary systems of stating who shall go into the Army and who shall serve in the Army that could possibly be conceived of. [Applause.]

Now, as to the military committee: As I understand it, there is no difference between us so far as that feature is concerned. I have no authority, however, to speak for them; but, I repeat, there is no difference between us upon this point. The Committee on Military Affairs, or the majority of us, decided that we would never vote for a bill that would authorize the Government of the United States to conscript a boy 19 or 20 years of age and who did not have the right to vote. [Applause.]

As I have touched upon this age-limit proposition, I may say here that while the committee changed the age limit in the bill proposed by the War Department from 19 to 25 to 21 to 40, the Secretary told me on yesterday that he thought that that limit was too large. They do not approve of going that high. The committee adopted that program because of the recommendation that had been made by the Secretary of War to change the enlisted age in the Regular Army and in the National Guard in this bill. Under the present law the enlistment in the Regular Army is from 18 to 30 and in the National Guard it is from 18 to 45, and the Secretary of War recommended that should be changed to from 18 to 40 in both branches of the service. That is the reason why the committee finally agreed upon the maximum age limit of 40 in the bill that was presented by the majority.

Mr. Chairman, that proposition, as I understand, is practically unanimous in the committee. The minority report certainly does not say anything in regard to it and does not offer any proposition changing the age limit as fixed by the majority of the committee in this bill.

And I may say another thing while I am on this proposition: The minority does not offer as a substitute for the majority bill the bill that was proposed by the War Department. There stands to-day before this House no one who sponsors that bill. [Applause.] There is no proposition pending before this House, as a substitute for the majority report, to enact just exactly the bill that was drafted down at the War Department and submitted to the committee. The minority report simply criticizes the proposition of the majority—that we want to recognize the traditional history of the Anglo-Saxon race and give every patriotic and loyal American citizen the right at least to tender his services to the Government. [Applause.]

That is the only criticism that is made; and I assume from that minority report that all that will be done is that, when we come to section 3 of the bill, a proposition will be made to strike out of the bill the provision authorizing the President to call for volunteers while he is taking a census of the people between the prescribed military ages.

Now, I believe, Mr. Chairman, that states in substance the bill, except I wish to make this statement, which, I think, ought to be known to the House and to the country: The majority report does not delay the President in getting an Army. If the bill as reported by the majority of the committee is adopted, the President is still authorized to proceed with a registration of all the male persons between the prescribed military ages for the purpose of determining who is on the list from which the draft is to be made. It does not stop the President from proceeding with that plan. He has ample and absolute authority to do it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. TILSON, and Mr. STAFFORD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain the provision as to the increased number in addition to the increased force in the Regular Army and the National Guard?

Mr. DENT. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain the provision made in the bill for an additional increment of force of half a million men for the Regular Army and the National Guard?

Mr. DENT. I thought I had done so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. DENT. I thought I had, but I will state to the gentleman that it means this: Under the bill as reported by the majority of the committee this increase of half a million in the first instance and an additional increase of half a million in the next instance, if necessary, shall be resorted to by the voluntary system while they are taking the census of the people if the President wishes to resort to it. But if, after the completion of the registration, after every male citizen between the prescribed military ages has been registered, the President decides he can not raise the army by the volunteer system, then he has the right to draft these 500,000 men in the first instance and an additional 500,000 men afterwards.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILSON. In order that the debate may center about the one point that is really in controversy between the majority of the committee and the minority, will the gentleman permit me to say that, so far as I understand the minority's intention, it is that when we reach section 3, at the top of page 3, of the gentleman's bill, we will move to strike out all of page 3 and page 4 down to the word "authorized," in line 6, and on page 5 strike out the words "volunteers or." That is all the difference, so that we may bring all the debate upon that point that is really at issue. Now that leaves the matter of age, referred to by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and brings it down to the matter of volunteers, paragraph 3 of section 1, beginning at the top of page 3 and going down to the word "authorized," on page 4, in line 6. The word "authorized" is the last word to be stricken out; and on page 5, paragraph 5 of section 1, in line 19, strike out the words "volunteers or."

Mr. DENT. I will state, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. I should like to make a statement in response to what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] said, and then I will yield to the gentleman. I thought I had stated—not specifically, as the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] says—exactly what the proposition was, but that was the substance of what I had already stated, that that was the only real issue between us; that the majority of the committee recognized that the old volunteer system should be resorted to while they were trying to get ready for the draft, and leave it to the President finally to decide that question; and the minority say that it should not be recognized at all. Now I will yield, first, to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. My colleague from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] stated the major proposition, but it was understood in the committee that if further amendments were desired by any members of the minority they should have leave to do so. The majority in their report thought it best to center their fight on selective conscription, but the minority reserved the right to offer such other amendments as they saw fit.

Mr. DENT. In connection with what the gentleman from California states I want to say that I understood that both the majority and the minority reserved the right to offer amendments that would go to the details of the bill, but nobody reserved the right to change the policy or the principles of the bill.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to my colleague on the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I wish to have the gentleman make a little more plain, if he will, the opinion of the majority of the committee and our reason for authorizing the President to call for volunteers, that in no way will it result in a delay in securing the Army, but, on the contrary, it is a matter of record that when volunteers were called for in England and Canada and Australia they presented themselves so rapidly that the Government could not take them all. Millions of men presented themselves for service before the time when they could be accepted, and before the time we were told that it would take to install the conscription system in this country.

Mr. DENT. That is absolutely true, and I will go further and make this statement: That we were told by the Secretary of War and his advisers that they did not have sufficient equipment right now to muster in the National Guard up to its war strength.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to inquire whether the gentleman is at liberty to state the position of the President upon the bill that we have presented here?

Mr. DENT. I can not state the position of the President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understood the gentleman to say that he had been to the President and had talked with him.

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And also had talked with the Secretary of War.

Mr. DENT. I did; but I would not like to undertake to say what is the reason which inspires the President to say that the bill should be adopted just in the form in which it is submitted.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman referred to certain exemptions in the bill. I do not know the bill thoroughly. I should like to inquire if there is anything in the bill that would exempt from the service those Americans who still have fresh or warm blood ties applying to their relatives in Germany or Austria or Hungary? That was done in Australia and in Canada.

Mr. DENT. I will answer the gentleman's question. The only exception in the bill on that subject is the exception of alien enemies.

Mr. BRITTEN. Then there is no exemption in the bill of persons having relatives in Germany or Austria?

Mr. DENT. The only exception is "alien enemies."

Mr. BRITTEN. Did the gentleman's committee consider that point at all?

Mr. DENT. Yes; that point was presented to the committee.

Mr. BRITTEN. And it was decided not to make those exemptions?

Mr. DENT. The only exception in the exemption in the bill is as to alien enemies.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. In order that we may get a clear conception of the issue or the difference, is it not a question between the volunteer system as a preferential system for raising armies in this country in the first instance, or the conscriptive or draft system in exchange for it as the preferential system? Is not the real fight between those two systems, more than it is over mere details in working out the respective systems?

Mr. DENT. That is absolutely true.

Mr. SIMS. And I understand the volunteer system has always been the established system in this country, and conscription has been resorted to only as exceptional, unusual, and to meet an emergency that could not be covered in the regular way.

Mr. DENT. As I understand the history of the country, conscription has been used only once, and that was two years after the beginning of the Civil War. It never has been used in the beginning of any war.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. I should like to ask the gentleman to explain to the committee how the selection will be made, or the first increment, or any additional increment provided for under the conscription plan?

Mr. DENT. Under the conscription plan?

Mr. CRISP. Under the conscription plan, and how this selection will be made? The bill does not deal with that, except to say under departmental regulations; but from reading the hearings I think the chairman and the committee have some idea as to how that selection is to be made, and I would like to have the gentleman explain that.

Mr. DENT. Perhaps I did not go into details upon this point. It is proposed to take a census in the first place of all the male citizens between the ages that the bill may provide for, 19 and 25, according to the War Department bill, or 21 and 40, according to the bill reported by the committee. The first thing that must be done, of course, is to take this census. Then it is proposed to put the names in a box and draw them just as you would draw a jury. Of course, the right is reserved to determine who are physically unfit and to reject them, just as a juror whose name was drawn from the box if he was found to be incompetent or disqualified for any reason would be rejected. Finally, the 500,000 men are selected by lot out of the names drawn from the box.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I have frequently heard that the conscriptive plan is the only one that would be sure of not taking the ones who ought to be at home engaged in something else.

Mr. DENT. Yes; that idea is expressly incorporated in the volunteer plan by an amendment to the act of April 25, 1914, providing for the call of volunteers. That act is amended by this bill so as to preserve exactly the same exemption features as the bill of the War Department under the draft scheme.

Mr. FESS. Then the voluntary system would not necessarily rob the country of the munition makers?

Mr. DENT. The gentleman is absolutely correct. If we adopt the volunteer system under the provisions of the bill the President can refuse to accept any volunteer whose services are more important in some industrial enterprise. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to ask whether I am right in believing that the enlistment law has been changed so that enlistments both in the Regular Army and in the National Guard are for the period of the war? Has there been such a change in the period of enlistment?

Mr. DENT. There has been in this bill.

Mr. BORLAND. I understood the gentleman to say that the Regular Army could be enlisted up to 287,000 and the National Guard to 625,000 under existing law?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not that furnish all the opportunities for voluntary enlistment that is likely to take place in the immediate future?

Mr. DENT. I am sure that it does.

Mr. BORLAND. Then why is it necessary to create a third branch into which voluntary enlistment may be had?

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman mean to ask me if the additional 500,000 men are necessary why they should not be given an opportunity to volunteer?

Mr. BORLAND. Assuming that we need all the men that the President thinks we need, why are we not testing the enlistment of the 925,000 already provided for?

Mr. DENT. If I understand the gentleman's position or his question, it is this—that in the Regular Army and in the National Guard the volunteer system is recognized, but when you come to the additional force it ought not to be recognized.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is not quite accurate; he has not quite hit the mark. The question is—the law already provides two branches of the service in which the voluntary enlistment is provided for by law, embracing nearly a million men. If it is desirable to raise an additional force than that already provided for, why should not the additional force be raised by the same method?

Mr. DENT. I thought I stated that a little while ago, but perhaps I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BATHRICK. The gentleman has explained very plainly the method of selecting the men who will be considered under the conscription method, but he has not explained who the authorities are that will make that selection—that will carry on the process of selection. I would like to have him do so.

Mr. DENT. I am glad the gentleman asked me that question.

Mr. BATHRICK. And I will ask the gentleman two questions in one. After he explains how the selective conscription will be carried on and by what authority, I would like to have him explain how the selection can be carried on by the volunteer system?

Mr. DENT. I will try to answer the gentleman. I will answer the first part of his question first. This process of raising 500,000 men from 7,000,000 men in the country will be conducted primarily through the War Department. The bill authorizes the President to use all agencies of the United States and all of the States in order to carry it into effect. But the bill goes further and provides that there shall be a tribunal to pass upon the question of exemption and pass upon the question of the rights of every man under this law, a majority of whom shall be civilians. Now, what was the gentleman's other question?

Mr. BATHRICK. The other question is: The question of selection is most important; and how are you going to do it with the volunteer system?

Mr. DENT. The same proposition would apply to the volunteer system that applies to the draft system, so far as excluding men that are not fitted for the service but are more suitable elsewhere.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. FIELDS. Is it a fact that whether we operate under the volunteer system or the draft system they are safeguarded in the same way?

Mr. DENT. The same way; exactly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I listened to the question put by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] to the chairman of the committee, and I thought that the chairman failed to catch the significance of the question. If I understood the gentleman from Missouri correctly, it was why the volunteer system is not tested by the opportunity now to go into the Regular Army or into the National Guard.

Mr. BORLAND. That is it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Now, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not believe that the cases are not alike for this reason: That under common American understanding of the volunteer system boys of the same neighborhood can organize, or have themselves organized, into companies, where when they go to war they will touch elbows with the man from the same shop or from the next farm, whereas if they go into the Regular Army some may be sent to California and some to New York and some to Panama or to any service in the Army or any branch that the authorities at Washington may determine that they should go. Concerning the wisdom of that I have nothing to say, but is not that it?

Mr. DENT. That is unquestionably true. As the bill was originally drafted by the War Department and sent to the Military Committee it provided that all enlistments hereafter should be in the Army of the United States. I asked the Secretary of War when he was before the committee what that meant. He said it meant the destruction of the present establishment of the Regular Army and the National Guard, and the creation of an entirely new Army; so that he could wherever a man enlisted in the service send him anywhere he wanted to, with any branch of the service he desired, and separate him from his neighbors, and the committee repudiated that proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman one additional question. Was not that a confession on the part of the Secretary of War that the new Army, volunteer Army, would be too popular; that the young men would go to that instead of to the Regular Army? [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. I would not say what the Secretary had in his mind.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Alabama, of course, in all fairness to the Secretary of War, states that subsequently——

Mr. DENT. He yielded on that.

Mr. KAHN. He sent an amendment to the committee that all units coming from certain States should be enlisted as far as possible as State units?

Mr. DENT. He did yield on that, and sent me a letter to that effect.

Mr. CANNON. And will the gentleman allow me to sandwich in two words right there?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] makes a distinction without a difference. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I want to call the chairman's attention, replying to the question of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], to the fact that one of the essential matters about this contest is whether or not a real call for volunteers has been made in this country. The bill as reported by the majority of the committee authorizes the President to call for volunteers, and let the country know that we want a volunteer army, and, further, in this bill it is provided that the army shall be raised in regimental units. In other words, it provides that in the call for volunteers regiments and companies shall be permitted to be organized and brought into the Army just the same as is the National Guard. Those of us who believe in a volunteer army feel that is the only way you can raise a volunteer army—that is, to raise it in units, as is provided in this bill. That is the difference between the plan of enlisting men, as they now are, in regimental recruiting stations scattered all over the country and enlisting them as volunteers in units, as we do now in the National Guard.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. DENT. I would rather not yield for a question now.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, is it not true that the Judge Advocate General has recently ruled that the States have the power now, by their own initiative, to create additional units of the National Guard up to the full authorized limit?

Mr. DENT. He has.

Mr. BORLAND. Under that system is it not possible to organize these very neighborhood companies or battalions or regiments that both these gentlemen have spoken of?

Mr. DENT. That is very true.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I wanted to inquire of the gentleman from Alabama if the War Department offered any proof positive of their inability to get an army by a proper call under the volunteer system before proceeding with this?

Mr. DENT. They did not. The only argument that was made was that we ought to learn from the experience of England. We had an English Army officer before us, and I asked him the question, "How many men did you raise in your army under the volunteer system?" and he answered, "5,000,000." I said, "What is the total strength of the British Army," and he said, "Six and a half million"; so that five million of the six and a half million were raised under the volunteer system.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. As bearing upon the question as to whether sufficient opportunity for volunteering is given by enlistment in the Regular Establishment and the National Guard, is it not true that until very recently the War Department held there was no authority for raising additional units of the National Guard, and only recently, and with reluctance, admitted there was such authority, and even now the War Department is not encouraging, aiding, or assisting in the organization of such units?

Mr. DENT. I can not say that. I will state to the gentleman that I think there has been a change in the opinion as to the authority to organize the additional units provided for in the national-defense act, and now they admit that the entire war strength of the National Guard can be had.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], if the selective conscription be adopted whereby you fix the age, as your bill provides, from 21 to 40, I understood the chairman to say that those of that eligible list would have their names put in a box, and that they would be drawn out by lots?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. If that is done, and you are trying to fill up an increment of 500,000, and there are 10,000,000 names in the lot, and 500,000 are drawn out, what discretion, if any, under this bill is given to those officers as to whom they shall select and whom they shall not select, and if any discretion is given, where will that authority eventually lodge?

Mr. DENT. Well, they have no discretion, I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky, except to pass upon the question of their eligibility under section 3 of this act, which is the exemption clause and which eliminates those who are physically and morally unfit. In the first instance, as I said, that would be done through the instrumentality of the War Department, but there is a provision that a tribunal shall be created that shall have a majority of civilians to pass upon this question.

Mr. KINCHELOE. One more question: If the volunteer system is adopted and there is a call issued for, say, 500,000 men and there were a million men who responded to that call, will they be selected in the same way through being drawn out of this box?

Mr. DENT. No.

Mr. KINCHELOE. How would they be selected?

Mr. DENT. They would not be put in a box at all. If they call for volunteers, the call would come under the act of April 25, 1914, with such exceptions as we have made by way of amendments authorizing the exemption features of this draft system to be applied to the volunteer system.

Mr. KINCHELOE. How would you select 500,000 men out of a million men who volunteered?

Mr. DENT. The President would do as he has always heretofore done, call for a certain number for each State.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Where is this tribunal of civilians to be located?

Mr. DENT. There are to be a number of them; they are innumerable.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is exactly what I wanted to get at.

Mr. DENT. They are innumerable; just such number as may be necessary.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. So as to be within easy reach?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. With reference to the question propounded by the gentleman from Missouri as to the opportunities of every State for the creation of additional units. I want to inquire if it is not true that when the Secretary of War Saturday a week ago informed the States that under the different construction placed upon the national defense act they could now raise additional units, but accompanied that statement with a letter to the governor of each State urging them not to do it?

Mr. DENT. It is a fact, as I understand.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. MASON. Upon the question of encouraging volunteers, is it not true that a former Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of this country, a man who has served in the field, Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, has offered to furnish to this Government and this administration volunteers in a large amount to serve his country abroad if necessary, and that that offer has been declined?

Mr. DENT. I know the offer has been made, but I have no authority to answer that it was declined.

Mr. MASON. Then I ask if the gentleman does not believe a resolution of inquiry should be sent to the Secretary of War, if it be consistent with public propriety, safety, and welfare, that he may answer to the Congress of the United States and the people whether he declined Col. Roosevelt's offer; and if so, why? [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DENT. I yield to my colleague from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, referring to the recruiting of the National Guard up to the full war strength, which will give 641,000, is it not a fact that the War Department has not supplies for these new units—has no guns, uniforms, machine guns, or anything else for them to use, and it has no desire to bring them in the field at this time?

Mr. DENT. Well, I will say to my colleague from Alabama that I think the War Department has a sufficient number of rifles to supply an army of about a million and a half men but not the other necessary supplies.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Permit me to call the attention of the gentleman to the statement of the Secretary of War recently made before the gentleman's committee that they have only 690,000 Springfield rifles all told, both in reserve and in the hands of the troops, and that they have only three or four hundred thousand of the old Krag guns, which are not suitable for service but are merely suitable for training purposes, and they have no large cannon—no cannon suitable to equip an army of 500,000 men—no cannon of as large as 9-inch caliber and could not get them inside of seven months and would not be in a position to put 500,000 additional men in the field until after the 1st of July; that they could not get the necessary supplies.

Mr. DENT. That is substantially the statement of the Secretary of War, as I recall.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. I desire to ask the gentleman whether there was any expression of doubt on the part of the President, as the gentleman understood it, or by the Secretary of War as to the ability of the country to raise 2,000,000 men by the volunteer system, in the presence of the fact that more than that number were raised during the Civil War on both sides, the North and South, when brother was fighting against brother? Now, is it possible that anybody would doubt our ability in this country, a land of intense, consuming patriotism, to raise 2,000,000 to fight a foreign foe? [Applause.] During the Civil War we had a population of about 30,000,000, and we now have a population three times as great. It seems to me that, whatever merit selective conscription may have, the suggestion that we can not readily raise two or ten million volunteers is an absurdity and a poor tribute to American loyalty. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman in order to be perfectly fair to the President and to the Secretary of War they have not contended in any conference that I have had with them or in any hearing before the committee that you could not raise these men by the volunteer system, but they said they thought the other system the better.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman state what the difference would be in the time required under the two system to raise this number of men? Under which system could it be done the quickest?

Mr. DENT. Under the volunteer system, of course. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state a little more elaborately his reasons for making that statement?

Mr. DENT. I will, and I am very glad to do it. I am pleased that the gentleman asks the question. We have not had a census of the people of this country since 1910. We must take a new one. It will require, according to the statement made by the Secretary of War before the committee, at least 3 months to take that census and at least 30 days longer in order to go through the list and weed out those that are unfit and exempt, so that it will take, according to the Secretary of War's own statement before the committee at least four months before you would get the names from which you are going to draft the men. In my humble judgment, it is going to take from 8 to 12 months, because you can not take a census of 7,000,000 to 15,000,000 people in this country in any short time.

Mr. LANGLEY. Permit me to suggest that it has taken longer than that heretofore.

Mr. DENT. Under the volunteer system all the President would have to do would be to say how many men he wanted from Alabama or Massachusetts or from any other State in the Union, notify the governor of the State, and in less than 48 hours you would have the men. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not think the gentleman caught my statement a moment ago, and that is—and I know what I am talking about, because I was connected with the Census Bureau—it has taken a much longer time than the gentleman has suggested to take every census that has been taken.

Mr. DENT. That is true. It has taken several years to take a complete census of the country, and I am sure it can not be taken in three months.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman states that under the volunteer system the required number of men could be raised in 48 hours. I want to ask him whether he thinks that food production is just as necessary to win this war as fighting men?

Mr. DENT. I certainly do.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I want to ask him whether under the terms of this bill, whether the enlistment be voluntary or by conscription, the President will be authorized to exempt all those engaged in agriculture, if he sees fit?

Mr. DENT. He will.

Mr. LENROOT. Or those in any other industry whom he thinks should be exempt?

Mr. DENT. Under the volunteer plan or draft plan the President has the right absolutely to refuse to accept into the service or to discharge from the service any person who is needed in any industrial pursuit.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, if the gentleman exempts from volunteering all those engaged in agriculture, all those engaged in industries that he thinks necessary for the welfare of this country at this time, how many months does the gentleman think it would take to get 500,000 volunteers from the nonexempt classes?

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, if you would exempt everybody you would never get an army. [Laughter.]

Mr. DENT. Now, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended 10 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] asks unanimous consent that his colleague be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I understood that we agreed the time should be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and myself during the general debate to-day.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. Was there not a unanimous-consent agreement that the time on each side should be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from California?

Mr. DENT. That is the understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. If that was the fact, the Chair has not been so informed.

Mr. DENT. That was the understanding.

Mr. MANN. That was the request made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. I am not sure whether the Speaker stated it, but I think everybody so understood it.

Mr. DENT. He stated it, and it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If it is true, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is in control of his own time without further motion. The Chair had not been advised to that effect.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. FERRIS. A few moments ago I made an inquiry of the chairman of the committee to know what proof, if any, was presented to the committee showing we could not get a volunteer army?

Mr. DENT. None in the world.

Mr. FERRIS. He supplemented that by saying that the statement had been made that it was shown that in the past it was a failure. Who presented this to the committee and said that it was a failure in 1776, in 1812, in 1861, or in the Spanish-American War? Who advocated that?

Mr. DENT. Nobody.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. In answer to the gentleman I wish to say that the statement was made that the Civil War was the only exception in which the conscription plan had been used.

Mr. GORDON. By Congress.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. If I remember the figures correctly, from first to last the United States called out approximately 2,800,000 men and the Confederate States, from first to last, approximately 600,000 men. Can the gentleman tell me what proportion of those figures were conscripts?

Mr. DENT. My recollection is that the statement was made before the committee that in the Union Army during the Civil War not over 60,000 of the 2,000,000 and more they had were conscripts.

Mr. KING. Two and one-half per cent.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I saw in a statement that was sent out to the effect that they were 2½ per cent.

Mr. DENT. It was approximately 60,000 men, according to the statement made to the committee.

Mr. GARDNER. As a matter of fact, there were 2,200,000 and odd men, different individuals, enlisted in the Union Army. Counting reenlistments there were about 2,900,000 different enlistments in the Union Army. Forty-six thousand men were raised by draft and 73,000 drafted men sent substitutes. In the Confederate Congress the conscription law was passed April 16, 1862. After that time no law was passed by the Confederacy raising troops by volunteering from those liable to military service. From that time down to February, 1865, 82,000 conscripts were enrolled and sent to the Army from instruction camps. To this number must be added more than 76,000 men subject to conscription who anticipated it by joining the Army without compulsion. (See report of Brig. Gen. John S. Preston, C. S. A., Official Records of War of the Rebellion, serial No. 129, p. 1099.)

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Alabama concluded?

Mr. DENT. Yes, Mr. Chairman. Unless some gentleman has a specific question to ask, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman closes will he yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama yields to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. The Chairman stated that the machinery of a board was to be appointed to pass upon the exemption of anyone if the conscription feature of this bill becomes operative, which it will. Does the bill allow an appeal to the courts from the decisions of that board?

Mr. DENT. Yes; by means of a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. CRISP. From the hearings I understood that the bill made the findings of this board conclusive as to questions of fact, and that the court could not go beyond the findings of the board as to questions of fact. Does this bill do that, or leave the matter open to the courts?

Mr. DENT. It leaves the matter open to the courts. It repudiates that other proposition.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. Under the provisions of the bill as reported by the committee could the volunteer system act necessarily as a bar to hastily mobilizing the Army under personal conscription?

Mr. DENT. Not at all. On the contrary, it permits the President to proceed immediately with the registration, so that he can get his conscript army, if that is required.

Mr. BARNHART. Under the provisions of the bill, is there any means whereby it might happen that one State furnishes its full allotment, and the conscription might fall in a State where the volunteer quota had not been made up, whereas in a State that had furnished its full quota of volunteers it would not be subject to conscription?

Mr. DENT. The only feature along that line in the bill is this: The bill provides that in drafting this army of half a million men in the first instance, and an additional half million afterwards, if necessary, each State shall be given credit for the number of men that have enlisted therein since the 1st day of April in either the Regular Army or the National Guard.

Mr. BARNHART. Now, will the gentleman state to the committee in what respect the bill proposed by the majority of the committee would hasten the mobilization of a large army over and above the conscription plan?

Mr. DENT. Would hasten it?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I think I answered that a little while ago by stating that if you adopted the volunteer plan and the President called for volunteers, you could get them more quickly than you could take a census of 15,000,000 people, from which you have to get your 500,000 men.

Mr. RAGSDALE rose.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. DENT. I yield first to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

Mr. RAGSDALE. As I understand the situation now, the Secretary of War and his military advisers and his experts and the President have worked out a plan and submitted it to Congress, in which they desire to secure as soon as possible a large and efficient army. Now, does the gentleman believe that those who are advising the President and cooperating with him, and the President himself, have reached a conclusion that will bring about a greater delay in securing that army?

Mr. DENT. In securing the additional army?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DENT. I really think you can get a volunteer army quicker than a conscript army. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Of course, the gentleman has discussed that with the Secretary of War. May I ask the gentleman what was the answer of the Secretary of War to that proposition?

Mr. DENT. Well, I would not like to state what the Secretary of War's reasons for his position are, because he has printed them in the hearings. He has been before the committee, and the hearings are printed. But I may say in brief that the final argument that they make to me is this: "Remember the experience of England, that England started out with a volunteer system and soon had to adopt the conscripting system." My answer is this: "If you are asking for an army of five or seven millions, that England needed because she was close to the firing line, instead of an army of only a half million, I might agree that your system is the better one." [Applause.]

Mr. RAGSDALE. Now, does the gentleman think that with the facts that are now known to the State Department and the President of the United States they would at this time embark on a system that they feel would in any way impair the service and the quickness in raising the men that they believe we are going to need in addition to those under the first call?

Mr. DENT. Of course, I do not think any such thing. The gentleman knew that before he asked the question.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I am quite sure of that. The point that I wished to make, Mr. Chairman, is this: Does not the gentleman think that the conditions that now confront this country with regard to securing men to go abroad are so different from the conditions that we faced in other wars that we are going to find a very material difference in the voluntary service of the people who will come forward?

Mr. DENT. No; I do not think so.

Mr. RAGSDALE. You think the men will come forward as rapidly for this war abroad?

Mr. DENT. I do not think there is any question in the world but that you can get 500,000 men to volunteer in this country in 48 hours. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGSDALE. How about the balance of the Army?

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLE. I want to ask the question suggested by the gentleman's question who inquired whether it will be more difficult to get troops to send abroad than at home. Was not that demonstrated in the Philippine War, where they all wanted to go to the Philippines instead of to Cuba? They raised thousands of volunteers to go to the Philippines, which is farther away than Cuba.

I am informed that the bill to be presented by the minority of the committee is supported by some military experts. Does the chairman feel at liberty to inform the committee just who those military experts were, and just how expert they were, and as to what their experience had been in battle? For instance, if the gentleman would bring us the facts and tell us the names of the experts, and what battles they fought in, and what troops they commanded in action, it would assist me greatly in coming to a conclusion as to their expertness. Can the gentleman give us that? I ask this question in good faith, because I would like to have those facts. I do not expect the gentleman to answer them immediately, but later on he can disclose those facts.

Mr. DENT. I can answer that question now. That question was asked the Secretary of War when he was before the committee, and he said he had consulted with the members of the General Staff and the Army War College, and they worked it out by joint consultation with those people. I do not recall the military history of anybody in there right now except Gen. Scott, Chief of Staff, and the gentleman is familiar with his military history.

Mr. LITTLE. I anticipated the gentleman's answer, but if I am to be confronted with an array of experts, I want to know just how expert they are and whether they got their expertness by precedence or by practice. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. That is the only answer I can give the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. I think it is only fair that the gentleman from Alabama should state that the Chief of Staff, Gen. Scott, has fought many battles.

Mr. LITTLE. Give me their names.

Mr. KAHN. I can give the gentleman their names.

Mr. LITTLE. Name one.

Mr. KAHN. We can insert the names of the battles in the RECORD.

Mr. LITTLE. I want them now.

Mr. KAHN. And Gen. Bliss has been a warrior who has fought many battles.

Mr. LITTLE. Name one.

Mr. KAHN. And there are others who have fought for the Republic.

Mr. LITTLE. Name them. [Laughter.]

Mr. DENT. I want to say in my own time that there was nothing that I said here that was intended as any reflection on anybody in the General Staff. I admire Gen Scott. I simply stated that his war record was known to everybody.

Mr. LITTLE. I meant no reflection on anybody. His war record is not known to me. If it had been I would not have asked the question. You are here presenting a bill which you say he indorses. I do not know of any battles he ever fought. If you know, name them. I do not intend any reflection on anyone, but when you make that assertion and do not name any battle that he was in, you make the reflection. Now, produce your battle list. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PLATT. I want to say, for the information of the gentleman behind me [Mr. LITTLE], that Gen. Kuhn has been in Europe during a good part of this war. He is the president of the War College. I also want to ask the gentleman from Alabama whether there is anything in the volunteer section of the bill that prevents the payment of bounties to obtain volunteers?

Mr. DENT. There is nothing on that subject at all.

Mr. PLATT. Has not that been a tremendous abuse of the volunteer system which ought to be stopped?

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman think the Government could pay bounties unless they were especially authorized in the act of April 25, 1914? You see this call is made under the volunteer act that we passed here in April, 1914, and there is nothing in that which authorizes bounties. So how can they get any?

Mr. PLATT. There is nothing that prevents any city, town, or neighborhood that is richer than others offering bounties.

Mr. DENT. No; there is nothing to prevent any individual from supplying his means if he sees fit.

Mr. PLATT. And that is the trouble with the whole system. One neighborhood richer than another will offer bounties, and so will draw volunteers to itself.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. At the present time we have a large number of members of the National Guard who have families dependent upon them. I would like to know whether there is any provision by which those having families dependent upon them can be excused from service.

Mr. DENT. There is an express provision in section 3 of the act authorizing the discharge from the service of any person whose status is such that he has a dependent family to support, whether we adopt the volunteer or the draft system.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. AYRES. I understood the gentleman to say a few minutes ago that there was an English officer who appeared before the committee who said there had been about 5,000,000 men who volunteered in the English Army. Is it not a fact that thousands and thousands of those men had to be taken out of the British Army and returned to civil life in order to help restore the paralyzed industries of Great Britain?

Mr. DENT. That is very true, and that is taken care of in this bill, whether under the volunteer or the draft system.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Saltzgaber, the Commissioner of Pensions, gives the number of 2,213,365 different individuals in the Union Army and 2,898,304 as the total Union enlistments, of whom 1,722,690 got United States bounties. That does not reckon the bounties paid by States and towns prior to 1863. Now, as to the number who were the result of the Union draft, there were 46,347 held for service and 73,607 drafted men sent substitutes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I accept the correction, as far as the Federal enlistments were concerned. Now, I will ask the gentleman if he has the enlistments in the Confederate States from first to last?

Mr. GARDNER. That has always been a subject of dispute, but according to Livermore's "Number and Losses in the Civil War," the lowest Confederate estimate was about 600,000, and the highest estimate runs up to somewhat over 1,000,000.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What is the gentleman's authority for that?

Mr. GARDNER. I was quoting Livermore from my own memoranda. The Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Saltzgaber, furnished his figures to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. They appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 21, 1916.

Mr. DENT. I must decline to yield except for questions.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a statement in one sentence?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. More than a dozen men in my district have indicated their desire to get up military units, and men have been promised, and, as indicating their desire to fight, the most of them say they want to volunteer under Col. Roosevelt.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman inform the House the total amount of bounties paid during the Civil War?

Mr. DENT. I can not.

Mr. ROGERS. Can the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GARDNER. The United States Government paid $300,223,500 in national bounties. That does not include the State and local bounties—see page 4698, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 23, 1916.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Conscription seems to have been sugar-coated to a great many people by calling it selective, and therefore we are all interested to know what selective conscription is going to be like. I understood the chairman to say that the War Department and some officials had suggested that there might be a selection by drawing, and that the bill would allow that kind of a selection; is it not possible that this so-called selective conscription might be and would be likely to become a mere roulette wheel or lottery selection?

Mr. DENT. Out of the number of those between the military ages that is unquestionably true. There may be one boy in a family in one house and across the street three boys in another house, and the one boy may be drawn and the three other boys absolutely eliminated.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. GOOD. The President's message stated that in case of war at least 500,000 men should be chosen on the principle of universal liability to service. What I want to direct the gentleman's attention to is this: Is there any real and substantial agreement in the Committee on Military Affairs as to what persons are liable for military service on the principle of universal liability to service, and also what ages?

Mr. DENT. The bill fixes the age limit from 21 to 40, and I understand that the committee is practically unanimous on that.

Mr. GOOD. How about the War Department? Does the War Department concede that only those persons who are between 21 and 40 are liable for military service under this principle of universal liability to service?

Mr. DENT. The War Department bill selects male citizens between the ages of 19 and 25.

Mr. GOOD. Under the War Department bill a man 26 years old, a citizen of the United States, is not liable for universal military service in the United States?

Mr. DENT. That is absolutely true.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the present volunteer system has failed to give the required number, will the gentleman explain what there is in this bill that will facilitate enlistment and bring in the required number?

Mr. DENT. I did not quite catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The volunteer system has failed to recruit sufficient men up to date. Is that correct?

Mr. DENT. No; that is not correct.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman explain what there is in this bill which differs from the present system and which the gentleman thinks will bring a greater number of men to the colors?

Mr. DENT. I have endeavored to state that, and if I have failed to make it clear, I am sure it is my fault. I have stated that the raising of the Regular Army and the National Guard by volunteers up to the maximum war strength will give us 912,000 men, and if necessary then resort to the draft.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But having passed that stage, the War Department must resort to the selective system to get the required men.

Mr. DENT. I do not think we have passed that stage.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.
Mr. HILL. The chairman says we propose to raise the Regular Army and the Volunteer Militia to its maximum strength by volunteers. I have been studying the bill to find out whether the provisions of the bill for the additional force are operative from the passage of the bill, so that the formation of that army goes on concurrently with the increase of the Regular Army and the National Guard.
Mr. DENT. Perhaps my statement was to some extent misleading. The law will go into operation immediately on its passage, but the idea is that we have a system for raising the Regular Army and the National Guard to the war strength, but we can not get the 500,000 additional force by draft until a census of the people is taken in accordance with the provisions of the bill. The census will go on before we have any chance to get the men.
Mr. HILL. There is nothing in the bill to prevent the immediate organization of the additional army?
Mr. DENT. No; but you have to await the taking of the census.
Mr. HILL. But there is nothing in the bill itself that would prevent it?
Mr. DENT. Nothing in the bill but that.
Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. Yes.
Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of War said to the committee that even if he got 500,000 men overnight, it would take four or five months to equip them, and that he could not use them?
Mr. DENT. That is true.
Mr. MASON. Then what is the hurry?
Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.
Mr. WISE. With reference to the ages fixed upon—21 to 40—that all between those ages would be liable to draft, did not the Secretary of War expressly state, in answer to a question that he would object to raising the ages from 25 to 40 unless he had authority to make regulations to group them and have authority to call the first group first, and did he not say we never would get out of the first group?
Mr. DENT. That is what he stated, as I recall.
Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. Yes.
Mr. RUSSELL. Under the present plan there are two chances to volunteer, one in the Regular Army and one in the National Guard. Can they at this time volunteer for service during the war?
Mr. DENT. That is what the bill provides.
Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; but can they do it before the bill passes?
Mr. DENT. No; they can not. If this bill is passed it operates on all the enlistments in the Army and the National Guard since the 1st day of April.
Mr. RUSSELL. Until the bill is passed they can not volunteer for service during the war?
Mr. DENT. No; under neither organization.
Mr. RUSSELL. Some statement has been made that they are not volunteering fast enough. When this bill is passed limiting men to the war, will not that facilitate enlistments of volunteers?
Mr. DENT. I think so, very decidedly.
Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. Yes.
Mr. KING. I would like to ask the gentleman three questions. In the first place, why were the particular ages fixed in the conscription bill between 19 and 25; why not 22 and 27?
Mr. DENT. The reason given to the committee was that it would take out of the industrial life of the country a less number of people than any other age limits.
Mr. KING. Are there any being conscripted in Canada or Australia?
Mr. DENT. No; no conscription in Canada or Australia.
Mr. MASON. Or in New Zealand?
Mr. DENT. No; none in New Zealand.
Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman know of a single instance in history where a nation was going out to conquer the earth and set up democracies throughout the world where they did not exist where the leader went forth trailed by a conscript army?
Mr. DENT. I do not recall any.
Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. Yes.
Mr. REAVIS. As I understand this bill, there are certain absolute exemptions?
Mr. DENT. Yes.
Mr. REAVIS. Then there is a large element of discretion permitted the authorities with reference to other discharges or refusals to conscript.
Mr. DENT. That is true.
Mr. REAVIS. Has there been anything before the committee as to how that discretion is likely to be exercised? I mean by that this: I have seen in the newspapers and elsewhere articles to the effect that men working in steel mills or in shipyards, in munition works, who are so skilled as to take them out might stop the work, would be exempt, while they could take the boy on the farm and easily supply his place with those under or over military age, or those having minor defects which would make them ineligible to service. Have there been expressions of that kind?
Mr. DENT. That question was put to the Secretary of War when he was before the committee, and he stated that he would not, in advance of the enactment of the act, announce any positive program or plan by which it will be administered.
Mr. REAVIS. Has there been anything in the hearings before the committee to justify the statement recently in the press that the Department of Agriculture was contemplating taking a census of boys between the ages of 16 and 18 for the purpose of putting them on the farm to take the place of farm boys who were conscripted?
Mr. DENT. Nothing of that kind has been presented to the Military Committee.
Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. Yes.
Mr. MADDEN. Has the committee any information as to what the regulations would be with respect to the exempt classes? I understand that the regulations are being drawn or are drawn, and that they cover all of the elements of exception.
Mr. DENT. I have no information as to what regulations would be adopted.
Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think that such information as that ought to be in the possession of the Military Committee, so that it might be able to present the full details of the information to the House?
Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Will the gentleman permit me to answer that?
Mr. DENT. Yes.
Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. We asked for that information.
Mr. DENT. Yes.
Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. And they told us it had not been prepared.
Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that every Member of the House ought to have that information.
Mr. DENT. The committee asked that question. I stated a little while ago, in answer to a question by the gentleman from Nebraska, that we asked the Secretary of War about that and he said that he had not promulgated regulations and would not do it in advance of the passage of the act; that that would be an administrative matter to be decided upon later.
Mr. MASON. In other words, Mr. Chairman, the selective part of the draft is to be purely executive, and not a legislative function. In other words, the President has the power to formulate any rules to make the selective draft; that is, the President and his representatives decide who shall be exempt?
Mr. DENT. Subject, of course, to the express provisions of this act upon that subject.
Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] has stated repeatedly that he will also have the right to make the same regulations for the volunteers.
Mr. DENT. That is true.
Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. Yes.
Mr. SIMS. I wish to state to the gentleman from Alabama that I was 9 years old when the Civil War began, and lived in both Hardin and Wayne Counties, Tenn., during the war. Conscription or the draft came first from the Confederate Government. A majority of the men within military age in my neighborhood were what were called Union men, opposed to the war, but on account of not wanting to go out and fight their neighbors they remained at home. When the Confederate conscription act was passed, almost in a body they went over to and volunteered into the Federal Army. That was the first fruits of the Confederate conscription in my section. It was a material increase of the Federal Army from that section. A few Southern sympathizers were conscripted, and nearly every one of them deserted the first opportunity he had. I saw that, and I know what I am talking about.
Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee this question. The general exemption outside of those stated in the bill is to those persons engaged in industries found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces during the emergency. In the opinion of the gentleman and the committee, would that include the boys under any circumstances who are working on the farm?

Mr. DENT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TOWNER. It is the opinion that it would do so?

Mr. DENT. Yes; undoubtedly; and I think I can state that that is the opinion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. As I understand, under the committee bill absolutely no provision is made for compelling the men to serve who ought to serve, but who is unwilling to serve, and when I say ought to serve I mean the man who has no valid objection to raise why he should not serve provided there are enough volunteers to fill up the units. Now, I would be very glad to have a statement of any of the reasons which the chairman entertains, or which were advanced by the committee, why the men who ought to serve and are unwilling to serve should not be compelled to serve?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I have already stated the position and reasons on which the committee acted, without going into an elaborate discussion on that question again.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. ESCH. The cost of carrying out this bill has not been considered to any extent since the debate opened, and yet this bill appropriates $3,000,000,000 to carry it out for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and I want to ask whether there were any estimates furnished the Committee on Military Affairs constituting a basis for the amount?

Mr. DENT. Yes; it is shown in the hearings and the report that I filed along with this bill calls attention to the pages of the hearing where these estimates are given.

Mr. ESCH. And the various arms of the service were estimated for in considerable detail?

Mr. DENT. No; I can not say that; that is impossible.

Mr. ESCH. It was left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of War?

Mr. DENT. It is left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of War. The committee reached the conclusion that we had to rely on somebody to carry out this act, whichever form was adopted, and as long as we were making a new law we could not go into minute details as to each feature of this new legislation which was proposed. We had to trust somebody, so we provided a lump sum and trust its administration to the Secretary of War.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. I understood the chairman to make a statement that the majority of his committee would oppose conscription under any circumstances?

Mr. DENT. Oh, no; I did not; the bill itself authorizes conscription if the President, after taking a census, reaches the conclusion himself that he can get a better Army by conscription than by the use of the volunteers.

Mr. EMERSON. Suppose the House passes this bill and suppose that the Senate passes the conscription bill and it goes to conference, what will be the result then?

Mr. DENT. Well, I can not tell the gentleman what will be the result of the conference; I do not know.

Mr. EMERSON. The gentleman will be on the conference committee. What will the gentleman do?

Mr. DENT. I can not say in advance what I will do. In other words, the gentleman wants me to state right now that I am going to get what I am asking for and not yield anything that other people may want. That is not my attitude.

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee, referring to the age limit fixed in the bill, whether it is not a fact that the record of The Adjutant General's Office of the United States Army shows that of the 2,800,000 enlisted in the Civil War there were 1,151,438 of 18 years of age and under?

Mr. DENT. I do not know as to that record.

Mr. OSBORNE. Do not the records of The Adjutant General's Office show that there were 2,159,798 men enlisted of 21 years of age and under?

Mr. DENT. I am not familiar with that record.

Mr. OSBORNE. That is the fact.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MASON. What provision in the minority bill or the majority bill is there, if any, in regard to substitutes?

Mr. DENT. None at all in either one.

Mr. MASON. Then, as a matter of fact, is it, in the opinion of the Secretary of War and the committee, a matter which can be controlled by regulation by the War Department?

Mr. DENT. I do not know what is the opinion of the Secretary of War about that, but I would imagine not unless authorized by law. It is not authorized.

Mr. MASON. In neither bill?

Mr. DENT. In neither bill.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I do.

Mr. MEEKER. What does the gentleman think of the policy of permitting voluntary subscriptions to the $3,000,000,000 instead of forcing the people to pay it?

Mr. DENT. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. MEEKER. What about the policy of adopting this same haphazard scheme of letting people subscribe to this $3,000,000,000 instead of forcing them to pay it, or the penitentiary if they do not?

Mr. DENT. The gentleman knows those two questions are not at all similar in any manner, shape, or form.

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman know of anyone who wants to give a million or two?

Mr. DENT. I do not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Undoubtedly the chairman has answered the question which I would like to ask for information: Is there anything to prevent anyone enlisting, who is within the required age limit, providing the conscription bill is passed?

Mr. DENT. Anyone offering to enlist between 18 and 40?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Anything to prevent those who desired to enlist as volunteers even after the conscription bill is passed?

Mr. DENT. Oh, there is nothing to prevent anyone enlisting in the Regular Army and National Guard now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That would be true even though the other bill was passed?

Mr. DENT. Yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to close the debate for the minority. I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE].

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, inasmuch as my time is limited I ask the Members to not interrupt me until I have at least made a short statement.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I believe that we all approach the consideration of this measure with a full knowledge of the solemn responsibility resting upon us. There never has been a time in the history of our country, at least in the lifetime of the Members of this House, when we were called upon to take action on a bill of such far-reaching importance as the one before us to-day. It deals with the life and death of our fellow citizens. Yes; and it may be the very life of our country. More than that, it changes the policy that has been in vogue in our country from the days that our Revolutionary fathers gave us our liberty until the present time. It is a short bill, and I regret that the members of the committee could not all agree upon it.

The chairman of the committee has given you an idea of what it contains. It provides for raising the Regular Army to war strength, for the raising of the National Guard to war strength, by voluntary enlistment of American citizens between the ages of 18 and 40 years. And in the event that they do not come voluntarily, then they may be drafted to fill up these organizations. The bill reported by the committee proposes that then the President of the United States shall call for 500,000 volunteers, and on that proposition the committee divided. There were some of us in the committee who were firm in our belief and have an abiding conviction that in this country we have come to the place where all men should recognize their liability to serve their country not only in time of peace but in time of war. [Applause.] On that one great proposition we divide here to-day. The men of this House will find themselves influenced by their emotions, their consciences, and their judgment, but I hope before this bill is finally passed the better judgment of the men of this body will prevail.

There are beautiful sentiments connected with the volunteer system. It is wreathed about with sentiments that we all love. Is there a man in this House that would break down the spirit that has animated the volunteers from the days of the Revolution to the present time? Surely not. I have the good fortune to come from that section of our country known as the great Middle West. We have sometimes been charged with dereliction so far as the preparedness of our Nation is concerned. It may be true that living out there on the almost boundless prairies of our section, breathing the fresh air that is wafted over those great plains, and viewing our fertile soil and the great potential power of our country we may feel more secure than the men who live along the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts of our country. But, my fellow colleagues from the East and from the West, we are not provincial. Oh, no. Bunker Hill and Yorktown, Fort Moultrie and New Orleans, San Jacinto and the Alamo, are as dear to us as they are to men who live in other sections. Moreover, at no time in our Nation's history when the Nation was in danger have the sons of the great Middle West failed to respond to the call. But in talking about volunteers, and we will hear much of it here in this House, when in 1861 the civil strife broke, did the boys come when Lincoln called? Surely, from Illinois, my dear old State, from all over the great West, they came singing, as one has said, "We are coming, Father Abraham, 300,000 strong." [Applause.] Yes, they came, led by such immortal volunteers as "Black Jack" Logan, gallant "Dick" Oglesby, and Isaac R. Sherwood [applause], going forth to meet in mortal combat the volunteers of Mississippi and Alabama and Virginia, and to die together on the slopes of Donelson, in the woods of Shiloh, around the precipitous bluffs of Vicksburg, and before Atlanta. Yes; it is a glorious heritage, and we are proud of it.

Is that spirit dead to-day in our country? Ah, methinks not, when the greatest living American citizen, ex-President Roosevelt, stands ready to lead his band of volunteers even to distant France. And that is not all. I picked up the paper from my little home village yesterday, and I read a story there that thrilled my heart. A young boy, whose mother died when he was an infant, and whom I have seen grow up to young manhood, and being educated in the high school, where he would soon have graduated, got on the train the other day and rode 140 miles to the city of Chicago and enlisted in the Navy. Do I love that boy? Why, we all love him. We love that spirit of the American youth. And in order that it may be an inspiration to other young men I want his name to go into the RECORD of this House. He is Frank Moist, a plain American boy, who never knew the love of a mother, but he had learned to love our flag.

Ah, friends, in the days of the Civil War they came by thousands and hundreds of thousands, but finally the patriotic orators grew weary. And so eventually in that great war we had to resort to conscription, and the men who were taken and put into the ranks were looked upon as poltroons and cowards, and from that day to this the word "draft" has borne a wrong meaning. Those on the other side of this proposition say, "Can not we get the volunteers?" Perhaps we can. Perhaps there are enough men in this country that would volunteer to make up an army of 500,000 men. But are you willing to let them do it? Are you here to-day standing for a proposition that means that only the heroes of your community shall fight the battles of your country? [Applause.] Is it fair, is it just, is it right to ask only the brave to go forward and engage in the conflict? Ah, there is not a "slacker," there is not a coward in the whole length and breadth of this land that does not fear conscription. I know that you men are standing for the volunteer system because of the sentiment that appeals to us and because of the fear that there may be wrath in your community if conscription is put into effect. But what is conscription? Let us see. In this bill as it is written, striking out some of the things that the Secretary of War wanted, we say that all men between the ages of 21 and 40 shall be subject to this draft who are physically fit for soldiers in the Army of the United States and that their names shall be put into a box and the wheel turned and the names of those coming out shall be selected as the men to go forward to fight our battles. Is it fair, is it just, is it right when in this same proposition we provide that the boy who has an unfortunate mother that needs his help may be exempt, when the man who has a family dependent upon him may be exempt, when the man who has religious scruples and can not fight is exempt to put these men's names into the box and let them stand up as Americans and take their chances in this great conflict that is now upon us?

Another thing. If we had the system of volunteering abolished, if we were on the basis of conscription absolutely, let us see how it would work. Suppose our Government to-day wanted a million men and the names were put in, all of them, for selection and it was to be determined by fate and chance which of our citizens would wear the laurels on their brows as soldiers, do not you think that a man who was so chosen to carry the colors of his country would be looked upon as a hero? In every age of the world, in every country, the soldier has been the man who has been looked upon with reverence and respect, and that is as it should be, because it is through the sword of the soldier that we enjoy every blessing that we now possess. Every privilege that we have, every liberty that we boast of, was secured by the men who drew the sword and died for the same. Then let us enact a policy in this country, not because the Secretary of War advocates it, not because the President of the United States stands for it, but because it is right and fair and just to every American citizen. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, that is what I stand for here to-day. Surely you would not say that I am controlled by the views of the President of the United States. Far from it; but I stand for this proposition because I feel in my very soul that it is the only fair, just, and equitable thing for our people.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman care to yield there?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will yield to the gentleman for just one question.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to ask the gentleman whether if conscription is put in force at first there would be any distinction as to who would be volunteers and who would be drafted?

Mr. McKENZIE. No. That is it. It would take away that distinction.

Mr. BORLAND. If volunteers are first called for and then conscription is enacted into law later, it puts a brand on the man who did not volunteer?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes. It brands every man who did not volunteer as a poltroon.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. The same thing exists anyway. Men are volunteering in the Regular Army now. They may be fighting side by side before the war is over. Yet, if conscription is exercised, here is one who is conscripted and another man who has volunteered under the plan of the War Department.

Mr. McKENZIE. That is true; but look at this bill as it stands. What does it provide? It provides that if these men do not volunteer, then the President of the United States shall assume the responsibility of putting conscription in force. My colleagues, I ask you to have the courage to vote conscription into this bill from the beginning or else make it a volunteer proposition. If you believe you can get the necessary men by the volunteer system, have the courage to stand upon it, but do not put a lever in here that will pry every man loose between the time this bill goes into effect and the conscription is put into force, compelling every such man to think that he must enlist. In such a case, what will be the feeling in this country? Every man who is physically fit to be a soldier will think there is an obligation upon him to enlist, otherwise he will be conscripted. But if you say that everybody must be conscripted in the first instance, things will move on in this country evenly and regularly. The impassioned speeches that are made to arouse our people against Germany by a recital of wrongs committed by her, the pleas of ambitious politicians trying to get up regiments will all be done away with, and the business of the country will move along quietly, serenely, and undisturbed. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If this bill for a conscription becomes the order of the day it will require every State in the Union to furnish its quota of men in proportion to its population?

Mr. McKENZIE. Absolutely.

Mr. MADDEN. Will there be any power vested in the President to exempt any State from doing that?

Mr. McKENZIE. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the President have the power to make a regulation that will enable him to do it?

Mr. McKENZIE. He will not. The law will specifically provide that each State shall furnish its quota. That is the only fair way. That is the reason why I am pleading for fairness and justice.

Mr. MADDEN. If I thought that would be carried out to the letter, nobody would be more enthusiastically in favor of it than I.

Mr. McKENZIE. Let me say to the gentleman that the power of impeachment has not been done away with in this country, and a President who would undertake to play favoritism between the States in that respect certainly would be made amenable to the law.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.
Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman point to that part of the bill which covers exemptions and explain how it is duly provided that even if the exemptions within a given State be numerous, nevertheless a quota from that State shall still be proportionate to the quotas from the other States?
Mr. McKENZIE. I can only explain that by saying this to my colleague from Illinois, that in my judgment the President of the United States would not have the power to exempt down to a point beyond the limit provided which the State should furnish.

Now, in closing, gentlemen, I do not want to take up the time in this general debate, but I do just want to say a few words in conclusion. To-day we have started in to summon 2,000,000 American citizens to arms, many of them to die of sickness in hospitals here, at home, and abroad, and perchance some of them to die on the battle fields of Europe. I know not. But it does not take much imagination to look back into the homes all over this country and see these 2,000,000 American boys coming forth to put on the uniform of the United States, either voluntarily or by conscription, to uphold the flag of our country. We passed the resolution declaring war with sad hearts on the 5th of April. Why did we declare war? Why do we now call for 2,000,000 American citizens to uphold that declaration? Was it because our President said it was desirable? No. While elevated to the highest position in the gift of our people, he is but a citizen. Thank God for that.

Was it for the purpose of driving from power one monarch across the sea in order that the throne of another monarch might be made more secure? God forbid! Was it for the purpose of overturning one branch of a royal family in order that those who represent another branch of royalty might be supreme in the countries of Europe? No; that was not the reason. Was it for conquest? I think not. If it were conquest and if we coveted the lands of other nations, the great wheat fields to the north of us, and the iron mines and the oil wells of Mexico to the south of us are much more inviting than any spot in Europe. Was it for that? It was not. Was it because we had a grievance or a hatred toward the common people of Germany? Oh, no. For I take it there is not a man here who has a particle of malice in his heart toward the great toiling masses of the German Empire.

When I voted for that war resolution, was it to put the Union Jack and the Tri-color alongside of the American flag? Was it to protect the American Eagle by calling the British Lion and the Russian Bear to its side to reenforce it? Was it in order that we might form an alliance with Russia and Japan and France and England, so that we might be secure in our isolation? Oh, no; I am sure no American was influenced by any such motive, for we know that we stood alone for 140 years; and God being our helper as Americans, let us hope that the day may never come when the representatives of our Government will entangle us in any alliance with the nations of European, Asiatic, or South American countries that will conflict with the true American doctrine.

Then why did we vote for war against the Imperial German Government? I will tell you, my fellow colleagues, why I voted for the proposition. The reason that moved me to cast the vote that I had prayed God I might forever be permitted to escape was this, and this alone, to serve notice once more on the people of the world, aye, to write it across the heavens if necessary with the blood of our patriot sons, so that the people who toil in the vineyards of Italy, the shepherds on the Caledonian hills of Scotland, the poor, unfortunate peasants in the Carpathian Mountains in the Empire of Austria, the great population of Slavs on the broad plains of Russia, and even the industrious peasants of Germany along the banks of the Rhine might read it and remember it for all time, that in this great, free Republic the rights of the citizen, even of a poor sailor, are secure, and that every son of this land will come to the defense of those rights when interfered with, and that he is secure in being a freeman in a country where he can stand up in his manhood and look up to his Creator as his Supreme Ruler and say, "My country," instead of "My lord"! We did it to serve notice that he is just as secure here as in a land that is controlled and dominated by a king, a kaiser, or an emperor, and that the poor and common masses of this world may take courage and feel that the time is coming when the world will be democratized, not by the force of American arms, but by the example of its heroic sons standing for the right, the security, and the protection of even its humblest citizens. [Applause.] Yes, my countrymen, this was the reason that impelled me to vote for a declaration that should turn the energy of this great, mighty, and peaceful people from the pathways of peace to those of war.

Now, my friends, we are in this war. We have antagonized the greatest military power in the world. Shall we ask only the brave? Shall we ask only the few boys who will go forward and volunteer to fight our battles, or shall we lay that burden where it belongs, on the shoulders of every American citizen, and go forth to battle serving notice on that mighty military leader that he has at last aroused the people of this great, free Nation, and that he will not have to combat a small army of volunteers, but the entire military strength of our country? My colleagues, it is for us to say. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN]. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, the question before us seems to me to be the most important that we have had since our declaration of war, and it is, of course, intimately connected with it; and unless I fail, I shall hope to make it clear that either we declared war on a wrong basis, or we are committed to the democratic principle of universal liability to service.

We were impelled to that war decision, so we told ourselves, on the basis of our devotion to the principles of democracy. We agreed with the President that the principles on which a just Government is founded were tragically threatened, and we agreed with the President that the world must be made safe for democracy if this Nation and every other nation believing in those principles were long to endure. Either that position is logical and sound to-day or it was not logical and sound on April 6.

Many of our citizens believed that we ought to have entered the war at the time that Belgium was ruthlessly invaded by a nation that contemptuously disregarded every sacred right of small peoples. There were others who believed that we should have gone to war when the Lusitania was sunk, and a hundred American lives were lost by reason of the barbarism of the Imperial German Government. But the President was patient in spite of these terrible provocations. And I want to say that they were terrible, and I am glad that I had not the responsibility to decide when it was up to him to decide, for I fear I could not have been as patient as he was though I recognize the wisdom of his patience. He delayed that momentous step, and by delaying it proved that the die was finally cast for reasons far more weighty than any one set of facts such as the invasion of Belgium or the sinking of the Lusitania. The Imperial German Government prosecuted a ruthless war, proving by innumerable acts that she utterly and contemptuously disregarded the rights of international law as well as the more fundamental and sacred rights of humanity itself.

The time arrived when this Nation was convinced that Germany's one purpose was to exalt autocracy based on militarism and to destroy, if within her power, the last vestiges of democracy. The world was no longer safe for a free people, so Congress was called upon basely to submit to the tyrannical force of an autocractic monarch, or to take up arms in defense of those principles which we claim are worth living for and worth dying for.

The President's decision, given to Congress in a message that will forever live as one of the greatest state documents, was overwhelmingly sustained by this body. We pledged to the President all the power and resources of this mighty Nation. In that decision I voted affirmatively and was not unmindful of the tremendous consequences of our act. To my mind it involved the complete and unequivocal support of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. [Applause.] In my remarks on the war resolution I reserved the right to oppose, by the strength of one vote, at least, any proposition which did not carry with it my own conviction. No man can compromise on a question involving his deepest conviction. That would be cowardly [applause]; but every man can compromise on a mere question of opinion. That would be courageous. To my mind there is a distinct difference between a man's conviction and a man's opinion. I make this reference for I am sure that we are all prone to confuse a genuine conviction with a mere opinion. We hold opinions when it comes to a matter of method. We are swayed by convictions when we face a matter of principle.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe intensely that the question before us resolves itself to this: Are we to raise an Army based on the democratic principle of universal liability to service on the part of every male citizen, or are we to raise an Army on the undemocratic principle of asking those who will to defend their Nation? I recognize that the majority report of the Committee on Military Affairs provides that in case of failure to secure volunteers we will then resort to the democratic principle of conscription. It seems to me that the majority of the committee are simply contending for what, in their opinion, might prove a wise measure. It is not a conviction with them, else they would commit themselves to the volunteer system without equivocation and without fear. Is the majority of the committee so convinced as to the desirability of the volunteer system that they are willing to stake the fate of this Nation on that system? Their report answers this question. They are absolutely deterred from standing fearlessly for the volunteer system by reason of their fear that it might fail again as it always has failed. Their report, therefore, is not based on the principle of raising an army along democratic lines.

Mr. Chairman, if the volunteer system were what its advocates claim for it, surely history would come to reinforce their arguments. But history in the past, as well as history being made at the present time, reveals the awful blunders that would be committed if we should tolerate, again, a system that we know to be unscientific, inefficient, and most undemocratic. Our committee has carefully studied the facts regarding the volunteer system in those countries now at war. We found that England's surrender to the volunteer principle at the beginning of the war constituted one of the tragedies of English history. After losing the flower of her young manhood she finally had to resort to conscription as a national necessity. Why should America, in the light of her own experience, in the light of the experience of England in the present war—why should America tolerate for a moment a system that is based on the very denial of democracy? The volunteer system is not democratic. Universal liability to service is democratic. The principles of democracy on which this Nation is based should be defended, not simply by those who are willing to defend her, but should be defended by every citizen, whether they are willing to recognize universal liability to service or not. We must not commit this Nation to the policies that all our citizens should be protected in their rights, but only those who are desirous shall perform their duties.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman define what he means by universal military service?

Mr. LUNN. I referred to universal liability to service.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Taking young men between the ages of 19 and 25—is that the gentleman's conception of universal military service?

Mr. LUNN. The gentleman is mistaken if he thinks there is before this House any measure calling for the conscription of young men between the ages of 19 and 25.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The War Department measure takes men between the ages of 19 and 25, and that is the administration measure.

Mr. LUNN. I would answer at once that that is not universal military service, but it provides for universal service. There are more arms in this great struggle that we must use than the military arm, and, while I do not agree, I could agree with them if they would take the boys from 19 to 20 and train them. That was their object. Anyone who asserts that the President or the War Department intended to put boys of 19 on the firing line is interpreting the bill erroneously. They did want this training, and I think it would have been a good thing, but you must understand, and the country must understand, that that is not the question involved, since this bill calls for men between the ages of 21 and 40.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman will yield, John Temple Graves, the Washington correspondent, after sounding out the War Department, wrote his paper that it was the purpose that the first 500,000 men would be men of 19 years of age; that they were the first class to be trained and go to the firing line in Europe. I do not know whether he is right or not, but that is not my notion of universal military service.

Mr. KAHN. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LUNN. I gladly yield to my colleague.

Mr. KAHN. The gentlemen who favor the volunteer system seem to forget that boys of 18 can volunteer and go to the firing line now, and there is nothing in this bill to prevent them from doing it. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. I would like to call the attention of the House to the remarks just made by the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE] as to the ages of those involved in the Civil War. You may not know, but the gentleman volunteered for the Civil War at 16 years of age; but that is aside from the point.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. I will.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I understood the gentleman to state that the majority compromised because they permitted both the volunteer and conscription. How do you avoid the same conclusion when you provide for the national army and the National Guard shall be filled by volunteers?

Mr. LUNN. If the bill passes as the minority hopes that it will pass, on the basis of universal liability to service and not simply on the willingness to serve, immediately the machinery can and will be placed in operation filling the Army up to the full strength. They can enlist under a former law that you made for enlisting in the National Guard and in the Regular Army. But we are dealing here now with a problem of a new army, and we are departing from an old tradition, and I think the sooner we get away from that tradition the better.

May I add a personal word as to the volunteer system? I was a volunteer in the Spanish-American War. I was a personal sufferer and I know of the excessive costs, the unpardonable waste, and the tragic inefficiency of the volunteer system as revealed during that war. We had one of the best of men at the head of our regiment, Col. W. J. Bryan. A more conscientious leader we could not have had, but, with all our love for our colonel, we prayed daily that in case of actual combat we should be led into battle by an experienced soldier. I mention this for I believe I saw the volunteer system under favorable conditions.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman is aware of the fact that if he had gone into action he would have been led by somebody else.

Mr. LUNN. Oh, no; I am not at all convinced of that.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to say that my experience is that those who followed the volunteer captains and commanders in the Confederate War came back swearing by those captains.

Mr. LUNN. Let me say in reference to the Civil War that we are not fighting in a war that can be compared with the Civil War. At that time it was a question of soldiers more than anything else although, of course, foodstuffs entered into it. To-day, gentlemen, we are associated with other nations and we must help them to the limit with foodstuffs and munitions, or they will be defeated and we will be defeated in spite of all our bravado as to what we can do. None of us want to see the allies defeated. None of us want to see a draw. Consequently we must supply our associates with food and with munitions and at the same time raise as strong an army for ourselves as possible; and the only way we can do that is to plan conscientiously and with the best possible expert advice and keep all of these armies of our defense strong and effective, the military Army, the agricultural contingent, the manufacturing establishments, our civic bodies—in fact, mobilize all our forces—and I do not see how that can possibly be done under the majority's bill.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LUNN. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The gentleman raised a question as to his colonel in the Spanish-Amerian War. Does he know that he is one of the few men who have volunteered to serve as a private in this war, and he is not under 25 years of age either. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. I do know that.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Would the gentleman volunteer as a private?

Mr. LUNN. I have already volunteered. I will go anywhere and do anything that the War Department wants me to do—even resign from the House and go out and fight as a private. [Applause.] And I intend to do all in my power to overcome a great deal of the damage that has been done by a misunderstanding of this conscription system.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. Could I ask the gentleman from Nebraska were Col. Bryan volunteered—what place he volunteered except in the newspapers?

Mr. LUNN. Oh, no, no; just a minute. Let me say to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] that I will be one absolutely opposed to putting Col. Bryan in the ranks as a private, because the country can not afford to let a man of his type go there. We admire his splendid spirit, but we must also consider his age and his healthy avoirdupois, which would interfere with his efficiency as a private. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. I will yield just one minute.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Unfortunately I came into the Hall after the gentleman had spoken for some time. In describing the difference in the agricultural and industrial conditions of the country in the Civil War and at the present time the gentleman seems to think that the plan proposed by the majority would strangle our agricultural development and hinder us. Will the gentleman tell me how?

Mr. LUNN. I am not going to take the time to explain it to the gentleman, except to say that the voluntary system by which men can rush out of industry at once, in a day, needs no explanation as to the fact that it would disorganize industry.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I know the gentleman wants to be fair about the bill?

Mr. LUNN. I certainly do.

Mr. FIELDS. Is it not a fact that whether we operate under the draft or the voluntary system in this bill we will have the same safeguards? The department can reject a man under the voluntary system because he is indispensable to industry just the same as if he was selected.

Mr. LUNN. With this difference, that under the voluntary system they call for volunteers and they rush forth to the place of rendezvous, individuals or by the thousands, and under the draft system they are not called away from their industry until the particular ones are wanted, and that is a very much more scientific way of doing it. [Applause.]

Mr. FIELDS. And the question of their usefulness is passed upon by the board before they are taken in either instance.

Mr. LUNN. I can not bring myself to the position to believe that defense of the Nation is a question of will. I say that it is a question of obligation upon the part of every citizen. [Applause.] I do not want to see the flower of our young manhood, as in the case of England—and they did lose tremendously by their blunders—unnecessarily sacrificed. I do not want to raise the slackers of the country up to take the place of the flower that is to be sacrificed, if it is to be sacrificed. [Applause.] I would take every slacker and put him in the ranks, whether he wanted to go or not, exactly as you take every man and make him pay his debts, if he is able, whether he wants to or not. If you believe in the voluntary system and it is a conviction with you that it is based on democracy, then I suggest that there be an amendment in this bill stating that in case we are face to face in battle with the foe, before a regiment goes forward to fight, the officer in command again ask them whether they want to volunteer that day or wait until the next day, and make it thoroughly a volunteer system. [Applause and laughter.]

My friends, in closing, God only knows how long this war may last. No one can tell what new alignments may take place. There is only one road to safety for this great country and that is to use all of our resources, as have already been pledged to the President, in prosecuting this war until democracy is safe and militarism and monarchy are crushed forever under foot. Not only must we prepare the military army, but the industrial army, the agricultural contingent, the educational forces, the civic bodies, yea, every possible force must be mobilized to the end that the rights of humanity shall no longer be threatened by a ruthless militarism that recognizes no power but brute force.

I want to speak as dispassionately as I can of internal conditions, but you know, as we all do, that we have certain threatening internal conditions. If I were a pro-German—and I am not casting any insinuations against any Member of the House—but if I were a pro-German, if I were a hater of America, and I wanted to put America before the world weak, I would stand for the voluntary system without the right of conscription at all. I would absolutely stand on that principle, because I believe that it would weaken our defense and make us the laughing stock not only of our enemy but of every potential enemy.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LUNN. Yes.

Mr. EAGLE. I desire in this presence to bear testimony that during the period of the last two years and a half I have received signatures to the extent of thousands in number written upon post cards and form post cards, on letters and form letters, on petitions, and on resolutions of either real or imaginary mass meetings throughout, first, my own district; and second, throughout the entire country, each and every one of them asking me to do those things here in the Congress of the United States which would embarrass this Government's foreign diplomacy, or which would help Germany or violate neutrality or which would hurt the allies; and that, since we have recognized by formal resolution on the 6th instant that a state of war exists by virtue of the brutality of the Prussian military oligarchy, those same names, traced in my office, are generally attached to the telegrams, post cards, letters, and resolutions I have received in favor of the volunteer system, asking me thereby to cripple the efficiency of the President and the Nation in this war by providing an inefficient volunteer army; and I desire to say to the gentleman that I will not do so. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been very generous in yielding to questions. Permit me now to complete my remarks. I want to paint a picture. One day while I was a volunteer during the Spanish-American War I went to the hospital tent, and there found about 50 young men ill with typhoid fever. There were about 50 of these boys, and 6 or 8 of them were dying. There was one man in attendance, a private. As I went in I saw these poor fellows. and I said to the attendant, "For God's sake, where are the nurses in charge?" He said, "I am the only one this morning." I went over and saw one especially pathetic case. He was a boy belonging to the Second Mississippi Regiment. I asked the attendant, "Is this boy dying?" His answer was, "Yes." I said, "How long will he live?" "Perhaps two hours." "Have they notified his parents?"—for that provision is made to give the name of the nearest of kin, so that notification can be made. He said, "No one knows about him." I went down to the tent of the boy's captain, and found them playing cards. They were light-hearted American boys, like other boys from Nebraska or New York, playing cards and enjoying themselves. I said. "There is a boy over in the hospital tent dying with typhoid who belongs to your company; will not you notify his parents?" They were not at all concerned, remarking, "Well, when we finish the game of cards, if he is still alive we will notify them that he is still alive, and if he is dead they can be notified of his death." I do not think that could ever happen in any organized army equipped efficiently and carried on scientifically.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. No.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. LUNN. No; I will not yield. I have been very generous, and I desire to finish in these few minutes remaining.

Mr. STEVENSON. Just one question. Was it not the inefficiency of the War Department, which has charge of the administration of those affairs, that caused the great suffering in the Army in the Spanish-American War, and is not that the same department that now asks us to take a bill without even looking at it? [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. My friend, I do not know whether the gentleman is aware of the fact that the War Department is not under the same management as it was in 1898.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am glad it is not; but I do not assume that it is perfect yet.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. We hope we will not have any rotten meat or embalmed beef to pass over to our soldiers.

Mr. LOBECK. Dr. McRae, of Council Bluffs, surgeon, Fourth Iowa, told me they did not have enough surgical instruments or medicine when they came to the Texas border last summer.

Mr. LUNN. There was a reason for that.

Mr. LOBECK. And that is the present War Department.

Mr. LUNN. Now, the question raised by my friend from Nebraska is a good one, that there was not a sufficient amount of surgical instruments at the border, but we must remember that those instruments can hardly be bought for love or money, and we want the administration free to organize an Army so that they can plan when there is a firm making necessary surgical instruments which we need to leave that firm unhampered.

Mr. LOBECK. I hope that is true for the good of the boys, whether they enlist or are conscripted.

Mr. LUNN. My friends, I want to say this in the few minutes at my disposal that remain.

For the first time in history a great and mighty Nation has entered a war with no other object than that of upholding the sacred rights of humanity. No secret plan of conquest has engineered this war; no desire for indemnifying ourselves for the cost has entered the thought of this Government. We enter with the distinct understanding that we want no territory; we want no indemnities, but we do want justice; we do want decent consideration for international rights; we do want the acknowledgment that the small nations were never organized to be unwillingly transferred at the will of some powerful potentates.

If we ever had reason to be proud of America that reason exists to-day; if ever there stirred in our hearts a love of country, nothing but the deepening of that love can result from this war. If we ever believed that America was worth living for and worth dying for, then I say that in this day, with the recent history of the world to instruct us, we have reason for being inspired by what our Nation is trying to do and to have our devotion to country multiplied a million fold.

The Stars and Stripes go forth to conquer not for selfish gain but for implanting in the soil of the world the blessed seeds of a democracy that believes that human rights ever tower above material gains. We go forth to join hands with England, with Russia, with Italy, and with dauntless France for the preservation of principles that are dearer to us than life itself.

You and I are responsible for supporting the President as Commander in Chief of the Army. He says to us that he can more adequately and effectively carry on the great responsibilities of this war with selective conscription than by the old and vicious volunteer system of chance, and I trust we will stand by him on that proposition. Members on both sides of the House! I do not know what the result will be, but how strange if the vote, which I am confident is going to go against the volunteer system, should be recorded and show a larger number of Republicans than Democrats supporting; Republicans willing to trust the President on that question and some on our side unwilling. I hope it does not result that way. I plead as one who has had some little experience and as one who knows of the poisonous, treacherous agitation and propaganda that will go on under this particular volunteer measure. It is not countenanced by our friends I know absolutely, but let us stand unequivocally by the President for universal military service under this selective conscription bill, and it will constitute the most effective blow that we can this day give the Imperial German Government. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FOSTER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense and to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes.

INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. NICHOLLS].

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, before going into my argument I wish to make a statement. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] a few moments ago and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] stated that in their opinion the best way to help the German Government was to vote for the volunteer system, and insinuated that those of us who favored the volunteer system might be in sympathy with the German Imperial Government. If you will pardon me for a personal allusion, I wish to say that that can not be charged to me, for the only brother I had, two years before this Government saw that Germany was wrong, lost his life on the battle fields of France fighting with the British Army. [Applause.]

So, Mr. Chairman, I certainly have no love for Germany.

I want to say that I for the first time am in a very strange position. I think my record will bear me out that since I have been in Congress I have stood by the President as long as I could. I am standing by him now as I see it. I want to say for the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I have served on it for some time, that I believe every member of that committee, both for the volunteer idea and for the conscription idea, is absolutely conscientious in his views. If my conscience would let me I would follow the course of least resistance and vote for this conscription act from the beginning. My conscience will not let me, and therefore I propose to vote for the volunteer amendment.

Now, why do I say that we are to stand behind the President? Because, gentlemen of the committee, there is no difference in the bill which the President suggests and the bill which the committee suggests, except that in the one bill—the committee bill—we give men the right to enlist inside of the three months spoken of by the Secretary of War, while the President is perfecting his plans for conscription, and if at the end of that time or the time necessary he has not enough volunteers, he has a perfect right to put conscription into effect and put it in as strongly as he can.

A great mistaken idea has gone out over this country, and it has gone out through the newspapers, through the mails, and through the telegraph companies, that the men who voted against the use of the conscription bill from the start are opposing and hindering the administration. It is no such thing, and the men who wrote those letters and the newspapers who published those articles had never seen the committee bill, as is shown by an article in the Washington Post of Sunday. They had roasted us, called the members of the committee traitors, and said that we were not true to the country, because we were supporting the Dent bill, and then this same paper came out Sunday morning and said that Col. Roosevelt would have a perfect right to raise volunteers while conscription was being put into effect, and take them into France. If Col. Roosevelt has that right, why has not anybody the same right? And that is all we are contending for.

There are a great many reasons why I am opposed to the bill, and there are a great many things in which our bill improves it. In the first place, they say that boys from the age of 19 to 25 shall be called into the service of this country, and they say further that out of the something over 6,000,000 available men possibly 42 per cent of them will be put aside for physical or other reasons, and that out of a balance of approximately 4,000,000 men the first 500,000 troops will be drawn. How do they propose to draw them? They say, "We are going to have the selective draft." What sort of a selective draft are we going to have? The committee has not been able to find out. You do not know what it is. Why did not they cause the exemptions as they are proposed to be put in to be published, as were the British orders when the war started there? We do not know what sort of an exemption they are going to give us, but we do know this: That under the volunteer system we can use the exact exemption that can be used under the conscription system. And I say that we can use it to better advantage, and why? Because, gentlemen of the committee, all that the Government has got to do is to instruct the enlisting officers when men are coming to enlist to question them, to find out what their avocation is, to find out what business they are engaged in, and if they can better be used at home than at the front, refuse to accept them, and give them a button to signify they have offered their services to their country.

Now, why from 19 to 25 years of age? I never heard of as unfair a proposition.

Mr. LUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. No; I can not. When I get through I will let you have all day.

Why, gentlemen of the committee, do they limit it from 19 to 25 years? Who voted for this war? Did the boys who are not even entitled to a vote have anything to do with it? You men voted war, and if you vote to make this 19 to 25 I hope some widowed mother will come to you when you go home and say, "Why do you represent me in Congress? Why do you take my boy and fix a law for him that keeps you at home?" That is what you deserve, and there is no way to get around it. Our bill raises that limit from 21 to 40 years, and all of you who are so bloodthirsty and hate Germany so much can get an opportunity to fight for your country. [Applause.]

I am getting tired of newspaper editors sending out these reports, because can you tell me anything that they are going to do to make the war go on after it has started?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to suggest that it is not civilized to use noxious gases.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Now, to pass on, my friends, there is another opposition to this bill of the department, and that is this: They say to us, "We have a right to run one recruiting station in your town. When a man comes there to enlist he can be either placed by the enlisting officer in the National Guard or in the Regular Army. He has no right to designate which he will take. We will put him in where we see fit to use him. In other words, he belongs to the Government from that time on." Now, let me tell you, we do not know anything about war. I do not think any of us know any too much, including the War College and the General Staff. [Applause.] But we do know this, that when a man goes out to fight for his country he would rather fight side by side with his neighbor than with a foreigner; that there is a great incentive for him to fight for his country when he knows if he is wounded there is somebody there to take care of him and send word home that he is wounded. And for that reason I am in favor of keeping the State units together. You take a boy from Mississippi—I do not think the Government would do this, but under this bill they would have the right to do it—you take a white boy from South Carolina and put him in a negro regiment from Massachusetts or anywhere else, and you would not have to go to Germany to have war, for you would get war right at home. [Laughter.] That is another reason why I am opposed to the proposition from start to finish.

Now, gentlemen, let me tell you something else. The War College is not always right. I can recall some little history for some of you gentlemen. Last year when the Hay bill was introduced it was opposed absolutely by the War College and the General Staff. The original bill had the backing of the President. The President agreed finally, however, to accept the Hay bill instead of the Continental Army. At that time the papers called us all traitors, including my friend from West Virginia and myself. They said we were traitors for not accepting the General Staff proposition.

Now, what would have happened if we had accepted the General Staff bill? The National Guard would have been dismissed, and the Continental Army would not have been constructed; and when the Mexican trouble came up whom in the world would we have had to send to the border to protect the Regular Army and to keep Villa from stealing their horses? [Laughter and applause.] When this trouble came up, where is our national defense? It is the National Guard. The very organization that is kicked around is the Army that they want to defend themselves with.

Now, the only word that I have heard that appeals to me as practical from the standpoint of those gentlemen who favor the conscription bill is this: They say they wish the President had come over and that we could have gotten together. God knows, we all wish that. But they say, "We believe in standing by the President, because if we do not and it goes out to Germany that we have not stood by the President it will have a bad effect." I grant you that, absolutely. But there is another view to take of that. This country heretofore has always fought its wars with volunteers to start with. This country has had as brave and as patriotic men as ever went to the front in an army. Suppose that Germany is informed that after war has been declared the President is forced to compel men to fight. Will they then think that the sentiment of this country is behind the President? [Applause.] Which is the worse of the two evils, my friends?

"Oh," they say, "England has conscription." Of course England has conscription after 5,000,000 volunteers went to the front, just like the Union Army and the armies of the South were conscripted in the War between the States after years of fighting. But it was five years before they had to conscript. Canada, which has had to do most of the fighting, or as much of it as any one branch of the British Army, has never yet resorted to conscription. Australia, than whose troops there are no better in the world, has not yet resorted to conscription, and the Australians are doing their part in this war.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman does not overlook the fact that Canada pays $33 a month to each of its soldiers and $20 for separate allowance?

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Oh, I had not overlooked that fact; but I hope the people of Canada do not fight for money, but for love of country, as our people do. [Great applause and cheers.]

Now, gentlemen of the committee, they can not tell me that the citizens of this country are any more disloyal to their flag than are the citizens of Australia and Canada. They make one other point that, possibly, I think, should be answered: They say, my friends, that we will lose time; that if we do not put the conscription act into effect at once we will not be able to raise this Army. What do they base that on? Is there a man of any practical sense that can convince you that, if we start out to get men under a conscript act and other men come in and voluntarily offer to fight while the others are being prepared to be conscripted, we will not have more men than we started with? It is purely a question of figures.

They say that the boy from 19 to 25 ought to do the fighting for this country, and they say that the reason why we should not have a volunteer system and a conscript system united is because the boys—as one officer gave me as a reason—would be jibing each other and making fun of each other and quarreling in the ranks about it. Now, who ever heard of such an army? [Laughter.] Do you mean to tell me that the officers of the American Army off at the front, on the battle line, are going to allow their men to fight about who was conscripted and who volunteered? They are not going to do it. Our bill is merely giving a chance to men over the age of 25 to have the opportunity to fight for their country. There are hundreds of them who want to do it in my own State. I know they want to do it; and in my State they have the feeling that a conscript is a slave. And I want to ask you this question: Would not this be a great Government to go to Germany to free slaves with an army of slaves to do it with? [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen of the committee, there are other things that I would like to talk about, but my time is about up. In this matter, either way it turns, in my judgment, on both sides of this controversy, we are trying to give the President everything he asked for. We did give him every dollar he asked of us, and we are giving him every man he has asked for, and under our system we will give him a few more if he will just accept them. [Applause.]

I do not love the German people. I hate their methods. I admire the English nation. But, gentlemen of the committee, I do love America and her boys, and I do not propose to see the men of this country who are responsible for declaring war sit back and require those boys to do their fighting for them without raising my voice in protest against it. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, we are now considering the legislation under which we shall form an army to meet the present emergency. In the discussion of this bill I think it not amiss to call attention for a few moments to the conditions existing in this country and to the points of view from which our citizens have heretofore considered our military forces.

The change of sentiment and interest which has taken place among our people within the past two years concerning a proper military policy for the United States is truly typical of a democracy, and is, to my mind, a healthy expression of a deep concern for the safety of our Nation.

In the midst of a commercialized age, with civilization seemingly run mad fighting for nonessentials, when men were confusing the blessings which flow from a strong, stable Government with the source of the Goverment's strength, when we were dreaming that our peculiar advance in civilization had rendered us safe from the dangers which have threatened nations in former centuries, our dreams of universal peace and security were rudely shattered by the call to arms of the nations in Europe.

Prior to this great conflict the right and duty of maintaining our national honor, whatever the cost, was never questioned, but the horrors of the great sacrifice which the unprepared nations drawn into that war were compelled to make, instead of arousing us to a sense of our own unpreparedness, seemed to chloroform our people into a senseless disregard of our national responsibility, and only when the country began to hear from men who are not willing to sell principles for which our fathers died in order that we may enjoy ease and material comfort did our people awaken from this stupor to a realization of the fact of our unpreparedness to maintain our rights and defend our national honor.

During this period many of us have been weighing arguments, studying the military history of our country, comparing it with that of other nations, attempting to lay aside all prejudice, or even our preconceived ideas as to what might be considered as constituting an adequate line of defense, and we can not escape the conclusion that in a democracy such as ours universal military training and service is the only fair, the only democratic, the only efficient means of attaining our purpose to place ourselves as a nation in a position where we can reasonably believe ourselves free from attack either from within or from without.

The first fundamental duty of government is the protection of life and property; if it does not do this it has no right to be called a government. We may also consider as a fact that inefficiency is a part of the price we must pay for a democracy, and we are not willing to admit that individual freedom and personal liberty are not worth the price. It is our plain duty, however, as citizens of a democracy to make the price as small as possible.

Admitting the truth of these propositions, it naturally follows: First, the Government must have some armed force at its disposal, one which is instantly available and capable of enforcing our demands of other nations. Second, this armed force, other than our Regular Army, should be contributed not merely by a part of our citizens whose patriotism prompts service, but every citizen, rich or poor, high or low, who participates in the blessings which come to us by reason of our Government should do his proportionate share of this duty.

When this agitation for a more adequate Army first began to gain force the average business man, when shown our situation, would unhesitatingly say, "Why, yes; let's have a strong Regular Army, fully trained and equipped to meet any emergency." This appealed to him as a business proposition, a businesslike way of paying an insurance against war; but a careful analysis of this plan, and the knowledge gained from the conflict in Europe, where millions of men are necessary, when we had thought in terms of thousands, convinced thinking people of the impracticability of such a solution of our defense problem.

In the first place, you can not get the men; second, such an army would be too expensive; and third, this Nation should never wage war with a purely professional army.

In other words, we should not enter any war unless the heart of the Nation is in it; and it can not be in it unless the best blood of the Nation is fighting the battles.

Admitting, then, that some force other than our Regular Army may be necessary, how can we escape the conclusion that it is only a question as to whether we shall send our young men forth trained, equipped, able to meet at least with equal vantage any foe with which they may contend, or whether we shall send them forth to certain death against a foe better armed, trained, and equipped. Shall this Nation have said of it, as Kipling said of England?—

> You pushed them raw to the battle,
> As you plucked them raw from the street.

How to train our citizens and how to have available for instant use a proper number of those who have received training are, to my mind, important problems which should have been solved by Congress long before this emergency, and we are now paying a part of the penalty for this neglect.

And I want to call the attention of the members of this committee to the fact which has been alluded to here by the gentleman from Texas: When we made our first little step in preparedness a little over a year ago we had these same people from all over this country protesting against even that meager preparedness, and many men answered with demagogic answers, when as a matter of fact we should have taken stronger measures than we did. [Applause.] These same people are to-day protesting against any change from our old, archaic system of former years.

If we had read intelligently the military history of our country, we should be convinced that we should never again enter a war depending on untrained volunteers. When we consider the technical skill, the scientic methods employed in modern warfare, we realize how helpless an army would be composed of men lacking in these essentials. When we realize that any change in our present policy of training and service must come with the approval of the great body of our citizens and that such system as is devised must be one which will appeal to them as in harmony with our institutions, we must recognize the fact that we can not hope for 100 per cent efficiency in an armed force in time of peace; so we must content ourselves with whatever plan will best organize our physical forces so as to reach efficiency most quickly in time of war.

We have now reached the stage when our future military policy is no longer an academic question, and we are face to face not with the proposition of what we might wish to do, but what, in the light of previous experience, will enable us most quickly to mobilize our physical forces into shape for effective use.

We have passed the stage when patriotic oratory, waving of flags, and hearts swelling with emotion when we hear the music of our national airs will suffice.

Here, in the very shadow of war and all its cost, we must agree to give of ourselves that supreme sacrifice which at times becomes necessary for any people to make who proclaim themselves a nation. It is very well to say that all should stand ready to volunteer their service, if necessary, but these words do not and can not make armies. We might as well recognize at once the fact that the duty of defending this Nation rests equally upon all citizens capable of service, and we should establish a democratic system of defense based upon this universal liability to service.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, this is a most interesting exposition that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is making. I hope we can have order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again ask the Members of the committee to preserve order, and the Chair desires to ask the occupants of the galleries kindly to cease conversation. A little noise when multiplied by so many makes a great deal of noise in the House.

Mr. CRAGO. The first duty of a citizen is to the Nation. The duty of the Nation is to protect life and property. When we legislate so as to establish organized relations between the citizen and the Nation, for purposes of defense, you may call it conscription or draft, I call it the command of the highest sovereign to the citizen. No more a draft than the command of a father to a dependent child to perform a duty necessary to protect the family.

It is well for us to realize now that our President, in asking us to declare war on the Imperial German Government, knew he was asking us to take part in an undertaking which involved great sacrifice. He has asked us, as Members of the Congress, to take the first step to place at his disposal an armed force with which to maintain our rights.

The bill which we are now considering provides that our existing military forces, the Regular Army and the National Guard, shall both be increased to war strength, by volunteers if possible; but if not, by invoking the principle of universal liability to service. In my opinion the call for more than a half million men to fill up these existing organizations will absorb practically all the men who at present have any thought of volunteering their services. Especially is this true when you take into consideration the men already in these organizations who will be discharged on account of dependents, and the others who will be available and who will be used to officer the organizations which will be afterwards formed.

These citizens who are asked to volunteer to fill these existing organizations are to volunteer for the emergency only, and at the termination of the emergency they will be automatically released from the service.

Mr. HASTINGS. I wish to ask the gentleman why the word "emergency" was used instead of the words "present war."

Mr. CRAGO. It was thought that "emergency" was the better term and, in the opinion of the Judge Advocate General, might save us the necessity of organizing new forces in case, after a treaty of peace had been signed, there was still use for a large army.

Now, I have called attention to the fact that this plan has the approval of the Commander in Chief. Would any man have thought 60 days ago that it was possible to put on 12 pages of printed matter a declaration of principles which would have met the unanimous approval of William Howard Taft, Theodore Roosevelt, and Woodrow Wilson? But that is what you have in the bill of the administration here to-day, gentlemen. Representing every shade of view on political questions, they are a unit as to the system advocated by the administration by which to form this new army.

Either plan which we are considering is infinitely better than that adopted at the beginning of any of our former wars; we have gotten away from the old vicious system of calling men for any fixed term of service other than during the emergency, and we thus have made it impossible to repeat our sad experience in former wars of having enlistments expiring at a critical time and battles brought on without proper preparation, because delay would mean the loss of men by expiration of enlistments made for so many months or so many years.

Mr. MASON. Could Col. Roosevelt volunteer his services under this bill? As I understand it, Col. Roosevelt would like to raise a division.

Mr. CRAGO. I believe he is too big a man to insist on changing the policy that is laid down here because of any personal desire he might have to serve under the old system.

Mr. MASON. Can he enlist under your system?

Mr. CRAGO. He can.

Mr. MASON. Under this bill?

Mr. CRAGO. He can.

Mr. MASON. And raise an army of his own?

Mr. CRAGO. No. His services can be utilized as the Government wishes, but not as he wishes.

I am convinced that the plan urged by the War Department, and which has the approval of the Commander in Chief, is the better and safer plan for the following reasons:

First. It recognizes the principle of universal liability for service in the beginning and does not delay until the other system has failed to put it into effect.

Second. It will insure the enlistment in the Regular Army and National Guard, the organizations which should be brought to war strength immediately, of the men needed, who would otherwise wait to join some new force if volunteer organizations are to be accepted.

Third. It makes the supply of men certain and allows the Government to judge where and when the service of the citizen is most necessary.

Fourth. The sad experience of England in delaying this system cost them many precious lives and millions of money.

Fifth. If all enter the service under the same law, there will be no distinction as to class of service.

Sixth. This is the only really democratic plan, and will let the man who has not been called attend to his civilian duties without being disturbed by an inner consciousness that his country needs him at the front, and without any undue persuasion which might call him to enlist when he is more valuable in his usual occupation.

Seventh. War is now the most scientific, the most technical clash of machines and trained men which human ingenuity can devise, and in the formation of an army we must follow expert advice rather than trust to spontaneous impulse, if we are to succeed in our purpose.

I shall therefore support an amendment to the present bill which will carry out the idea of the War Department in regard to raising the troops for the new organizations, at the same time favoring the amendments already made to the bill providing for territorial recruitment, and extending the minimum age limit, which amendments, I understand, are acceptable to the Secretary of War.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to have the gentleman explain, if he can, why any one man was lost in the English service who would not have been lost if he had been conscripted instead of having volunteered?

Mr. CRAGO. Because had they gone forth with a system, instead pouring in on the Government and insisting on doing something and being in the army, the Government would have been ready to take care of them. The Government was not prepared to take care of them. It could not count on them when it needed them. There was no constant supply. They went in voluntarily and at haphazard. And men went in who should have been back attending to their duties at home, supplying the army with munitions and food and medicine and surgical instruments, and all the articles necessary to keep the army well equipped and healthy.

Mr. GORDON. Why could they not do that with volunteers as well as with conscription?

Mr. CRAGO. Because under the volunteer system you have no control of the supply. You must take men as they come or you do not get them at all.

Mr. GORDON. You can under the volunteer system proposed in this bill, can you not?

Mr. CRAGO. Not at all. You must take them as they come or not at all. But some one will say there are thousands of men who have already been formed into tentative organizations who want to volunteer their services and be taken into the service of the United States as organizations. I am not unmindful of the patriotism of these men, many of them would undoubtedly serve with great distinction; many of them have seen previous service as officers of such organizations. These organizations are, in many cases, to my own personal knowledge, composed of men of the highest character and ability. But the inauguration of this system opens up the old volunteer plan which has been so costly in former wars, and which has broken down and driven us to extreme measures in order to maintain an army.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman state whether he favors the age limit of 21 to 40 years, and if so why?

Mr. CRAGO. I am coming to that.

Our sad experience in the Civil War of having organizations, after they had been seasoned for service and had lost many men, utterly disbanded because of a lack of recruits for these veteran organizations, while new untrained and undisciplined regiments were accepted by the Government as they were offered, should make us hesitate to repeat this costly error now.

I want to say that if anyone will read the military history of our country it will be found that in the Revolutionary War, in the War of 1812, and in the War of 1861, there never was a time when the number of men who were really needed and asked for by the Government were forthcoming at the time they were needed.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. In all the history of the present war have there been any finer soldiers than the Canadian volunteers?

Mr. CRAGO. I think not, and I want to say that I think the means used in Canada were more drastic, more compelling than any draft that we can adopt. Why, when you give to a little child in the school a badge or button saying, "My father is at the front. Is yours?" and that boy shows it to a neighbor's boy, and that neighbor's boy goes home to his father who is trying to feed a little family and says, "Daddy, why can't I have one of those buttons?" do you think that is not more compelling—more humiliating—than a draft?

Mr. HARDY. Then, why did Canada and Australia popularly vote against conscription?

Mr. CRAGO. Because Australia had given practically 90 per cent of her military strength before she was asked, and the men at the front objected to conscription. And they also had a universal training system in Australia. That is the answer to that question.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Did they have that in Canada also?

Mr. CRAGO. No, sir; they did not; but they used other methods.

Mr. GARDNER. They have compulsory service for home service in Australia.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman speaks about the breaking down of the volunteer service. Were there more than 61,000 conscripts who helped out the volunteers in the Civil War?

Mr. CRAGO. Unfortunately, we did not resort to that until nearly all the able-bodied men were at the front.

Mr. LITTLE. Why unfortunately? Unfortunate for your argument. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAGO. All honor to the brave men who in our former wars voluntarily offered their service. All honor to the splendid men who eventually equipped themselves as officers of volunteers. The pages of our histories are full of the well-deserved praise of these men, who, in spite of the weakness of the system, learned the lessons of war and emerged from these great campaigns capable, courageous officers.

Notwithstanding this fact, however, you will not, I believe, hear anyone who knows, either by experience or study, the military necessities which the last 50 years have demonstrated offer any defense to the old volunteer system of raising armies.

We can not hope to appeal to an intelligence so lacking as not to know that military operations have been completely revolutionized in the past few years, and that war now is as much dependent for success on the proper mobilization of the forces to supply the battle line as it is on the bravery of the men on the line.

The principal opposition to the plan of the President and the Secretary of War is centered on the idea of raising our additional force by means of a selective draft of our citizens of a certain age; in other words, calling to the colors a sufficient number of our young men to form a force which is to be organized, trained, and equipped as an efficient army. In my opinion, the course proposed is the only democratic, the only effective, the only fair plan which can accomplish our purpose. It is proposed to take men at a time in life when few of them have assumed family obligations or are so identified with our industries that their presence is more needed at home.

These young men, rich or poor, high or low, educated or uneducated, are to be organized, and in all human probability will remain in training camps for at least a year, and will at the end of that time be able to meet a foe with equal vantage.

If, on the other hand, we attempt to form this new force by a call for volunteers, we will fail, and at the same time we will have men volunteering, men of patriotic impulses, who should remain at home. You will make the patriotically inclined men bear the burden and let the slackers go free. You will take from our communities the very best patriotic men and leave the slacker and the shirker at home to mold public opinion, and in some cases create a sentiment opposed to the Government, while the real men of these communities will be offering their lives on the altar of their country.

There was a time in warrare when armies practically lived off of the country. This is not true to-day, and this fact only adds to the necessity of having our industrial forces mobilized and kept efficient as well as our armies.

Who would think of going back to the old plan of having voluntary contributions made to feed and supply an army in the field? This could not succeed, yet the volunteeering of men is on exactly the same principle. One month you might get the number necessary, at another time you would not get them, and you could never tell at any given time, no matter how critical it might be, whether your men would be forthcoming or not.

Under the selective system you could know exactly the number of men who would respond. The Government could estimate for the supplies and equipment of an army of whatever size may be needed, knowing that when we were ready for the men they would be forthcoming.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. I have only a few minutes, but I will yield.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I want to know if the majority report fixing the age limit between 21 and 40 has the gentleman's approval.

Mr. CRAGO. It has. There is a sentiment in this country that we are taking them too young. They would only be in training, but if they will put it between 21 and 40 and let the President classify them, I am for it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That obviates a very large part of my objection.

Mr. CRAGO. We have to guide us in adopting our military policy for the present emergency the experience of other countries; and from the testimony we have concerning forces raised in England, in Canada, and in Australia we are convinced that the volunteer system, as it has been used in these countries, has been more cruel, more drastic than any plan which we are now considering.

The testimony is to the effect that by means of social ostracism, pinning of yellow badges and white feathers on all men of military age who were not at the front, was the cause of many of the enlistments which have been made under the volunteer system in these countries. And the people of England now know that they unnecessarily wasted millions of money and thousands of precious human lives because they failed to realize in the beginning what they realize now, that the selective conscription of troops as the Government needs them is the more efficient plan to follow.

I believe it is our duty and I believe our constituents expect us to bring to this question our very best judgment.

Any one of us, no doubt, would gladly give his life rather than make it necessary to expose to the perils of war the young men of our Nation, but this is not the question before us. We are at war, and our people are looking to us to do our duty as we see it without any fear of how the performance of our duty may effect our political future.

What we want and what the country wants is a real effective army. I believe the citizens of this country are demanding this of us; and I believe the great mass of the thinking people have come to see the weakness of our volunteer system, and to recognize the fact that the plan proposed by the administration is the only just one.

Let us forget and lay aside all demagogic appeals, appeals uttered in the hope that we may retain our places in Congress, and let us stand for what we know will give this Nation that which it needs now—a real army.

We have made our choice in this great conflict from the highest motives, let us not now weaken the arm which must fight this the greatest of all conflicts for democracy and for humanity.

The issue in this conflict is so great, so far-reaching, that many little minds fail to see the real contest, but with fear and trembling and with an utter disregard of present facts and of history, they have preferred to play the craven part, under the guise of sympathy for the men who must fight that the Nation may live.

Since in this great drama of war which now occupies the amazed attention of the civilized world we have elected to again answer the call to arms, I have an abiding faith that the descendants of the men who have paid the full price for our liberties will proudly, gladly dedicate themselves to the task of protecting and defending our precious heritage. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I have brought into the House here, for the information of the committee, since the discussion arose a plan for the exercise of the power of selective volunteering. This is a chart prepared by the Canadian Government, and it classifies the volunteers exactly as we propose to classify the conscript and shows you who care to look at it how they worked it out in that country, where they are fighting a war for democracy and humanity under this volunteer selective system.

Stated in a nutshell, the War Department plan for raising an army for this war is to enlist a volunteer army of Regulars, a volunteer army of National Guards, and a conscript army of 500,000 men all at one and the same time, with this proviso: That whenever the President determines men are not enlisting in the two volunteer systems as rapidly as the safety of the Nation requires, then all units shall be filled by selective draft. The Military Committee bill provides that all the units of the National Guard, the Regular Army, and the 500,000 additional troops may be filled by volunteers, and whenever the President determines that the call for volunteers is not filling up the ranks of the 500,000 additional troops as rapidly and effectually as the safety of the country demands, then all shall be filled by selective draft.

The committee plan places all armies upon exactly the same footing and recognizes the right of a free-born American to go as a volunteer, if he desires, into any army that fights for his country. Its plan prevents the United States from being the first great democracy to hoist the flag of conscription before ever a shot is fired in a world-wide war for the principles of democratic freedom and against military autocracy founded upon the power of conscription. [Applause.]

This is the real issue in this contest. The majority of the Military Committee declares its faith in the loyalty, the patriotism, and the courage of the American volunteer. [Applause.] The minority repudiates him and stands for the Prussian plan of the unwilling conscript, who goes to the battle line, since death awaits him with certainty in the rear, and there may be a chance with the enemy at the front. [Applause.]

The minority has conceded the many important amendments which the majority has made to the bill as drawn and presented by the War Department. Nothing further need, therefore, be said in defense of these amendments.

The argument for the War Department plan to raise an army of 500,000 men by immediate conscription, as advanced by the Secretary of War, is based primarily upon the principle of universal liability of the citizen to military service in defense of his country. Conceding this liability, the bill as drawn by the War Department is a direct repudiation of this basic principle of universal liability. The War Department bill would by express statute make every citizen above 25 years of age as safe from liability to service as though he were a citizen of another planet. [Applause.]

The information furnished the committee was that there are about 22,000,000 men of military age in the United States; that is, from the age of 18 to 40, inclusive. The War Department bill proposed to draft only between the ages of 19 and 25. These classes include between six and seven million men. Therefore, under the War Department bill as submitted to the committee more than 15,000,000 men of military age, owing the same military service to their country as do the boys and young men of the ages proposed to be conscripted, were relieved of all danger of ever being compelled to go to the trenches in Europe.

The reason advanced for exempting all men above 25 years of age is that industry must not be disturbed. Men who are making money in vast enterprises because of the profits growing out of this war are loud in their demands and keeping up a constant correspondence with Congressmen asking that this war shall not disturb their business. Well, men are going to have to die in this war that this Nation may live, and it may be necessary that some profits shall be curtailed and even some industries suffer death as well.

I have had 18 letters from manufacturers in one town in New York, all of them engaged in industries not essential to the conduct of the war, and they all urged me to vote for conscription so that their industries will not be disturbed, although the plan they urge me to support sends only boys to death.

Mr. SLOAN. Was one of the persons who wrote those letters between the ages of 19 and 25?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; I think they are all over that.

Two millions of the men subject to conscription under the War Department bill would not be old enough to vote, and the remainder, because of their youth, could have but little voice or influence in the determination of their rights and interests in the matter. The plan made it possible for those who are of age to dominate the affairs and mold the legislation of the Nation, to decree that other men should die on foreign battle fields, while 15,000,000 men, equally obligated to military service by every rule of justice were allowed to go free. We are told that these men are to be used in the industrial army or an agricultural army and serve their country here at home. There will be no conscientious objectors against being conscripted for the industrial and agricultural armies, for they will be the highest-paid armies in the world. The service is sure to be safe and profitable, and therefore very popular. It is time that we quit talking so much about this second line of defense and set out to get some real soldiers to fight this war. [Applause.]

The problem of every war is to secure men for the ranks. Just plain common men. There will be no trouble to get men to serve on horseback with epaulettes on their shoulders, eager for rank and thirsty for glory. The problem is to get men who are ready to march upon the ground in the mud and the mire with guns upon their shoulders and ready to die in the ditch if need be. [Applause.]

I have heard of men who are willing to serve as major generals. I have had numerous requests for commissions as officers and for service in the Hospital, Quartermaster, Medical, and other noncombatant Corps. Everyone who writes to me seems to be willing to serve his country in every way except to fight or pay increased taxes.

The War Department bill was drafted so that every man above the age of 25 could claim that he wanted to be a hero, but the Nation denied him the right to be a hero. There used to be a saying that one would rather be a live coward than a dead hero, but the bill that limited the danger of conscription to those below the age of 25 made by law 15,000,000 living heroes who could stay at home and enjoy all the profits and opportunities that come because of war, with no possibility of encountering any of its dangers. If the majority of the Military Committee are to be drummed out of Congress, as some of the great newspapers would have done, I take some satisfaction that before I have to go I was able to cast my vote so that 15,000,000 of exempted heroes will have the possibility of a chance of demonstrating their valor upon the battle fields of Europe. [Applause.]

The minority bases the weight of its argument upon the proposition that the War Department is not to be questioned in any matter of this kind. Let me read you the argument of the minority.

The minority report, embodying the arguments in favor of the administration's selective-draft measure, puts forward in brief form two major ideas: One is that conscription had to be resorted to in the Civil War, and the other is that England went through a series of terrible blunders in endeavoring to raise a proper army by the volunteer system.

The report contains a copy of the letter from Secretary Baker to Representative KAHN, who will take up the administration's fight on the House floor, and also contains an excerpt from the testimony before the committee of Capt. Benson, of the Somerset Yeomanry, an English regiment. Capt. Benson details some of the mistakes that the United States should avoid, his statement being based on his experiences in English recruiting.

The report contains the following:

The bill as originally forwarded to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs was drafted in the War Department and has the approval of the Commander in Chief of the Army, his civilian representative, the Secretary of War, and the officers of the General Staff and the Staff Corps. The military officers are the experts of the Government in military matters. It is to them the Nation will look for the organization and conduct in the field of our armies in the present war. The study of military plans and problems constitutes their life work. On the other hand, the members of the Committee on Military Affairs are laymen. They are not military men.

They should be silent.

The War Department is omniscient, and right or wrong we must accept its decrees and follow out its mandates as to legislation. We are told the same thing by the metropolitan press. Chambers of commerce, without any knowledge of the subject and having had no opportunity to have read the bills, wire Members of Congress to accept War Department plan, affecting the very life of the Nation. To question these policies or exercise our legislative judgment is akin to treason. I accept as my motto for this war, "My country always and eternally right," but I respectfully submit that the motto, "Government departments never wrong," is not the last nor truest expression of American democracy. [Applause.]

The idea that we must accept all mandates from the military department and abrogate our function as representatives of the people as advanced by the minority as their chief argument for their plan of immediate conscription is the first flower of the principle of Prussianism which is beginning to bud in this country. No one must dare question the wisdom of any plan proposed by a department of Government or a so-called military expert. Well, they seem to have a different view about this matter in the democracies of France and England, where those Governments are fighting a real war. The Republic of France has twice changed its entire cabinet during this war because bureau action was not satisfactory to the representatives of the people. In England at the outset of the war she had for secretary of war the greatest military figure of the Empire, a peer of the realm, a belted earl, victor on many a battle field, the idol of England and her armies. In a little more than a year this military chieftain had to leave that high office and surrender it to Lloyd George, a civilian who had been the butt of ridicule of the military aristocracy of England during the Boer War. To-day the Executive Council of the Empire, the council of five that directs and shapes the destinies of the armies and navies of Great Britain, is composed entirely of civilians, and the master mind of this world war is this same David Lloyd George, who was told by the military experts of Great Britain that it was presumptious for a civilian to dare to express an opinion as to the advisability of any military policies. [Applause.]

The constant cry is why should a lawyer, a business man, or, at the worst, a farmer, presume to express an opinion or raise his voice as a Representative in Congress upon a matter which the military experts, who are of course entirely disinterested, have already determined.

Well, I, for one, confess that I am a farmer, but I also am temporarily a Representative in Congress of a small portion of the American democracy. My father was born a farmer, and for a hundred and fifty years my people were farmers in the mountains of Pennsylvania, and for 2,000 years prior to that they were farmers amid the mountains of Switzerland. Poor? Yes, as poor as the rocks to which they clung. And though I can boast no titled lineage nor heraldic glory, there is one fact that I have always been prouder of than though I could trace my blood to a line of kings, and that is that for more than 2,000 years, so far back as the record of history runs, my people have always been free, free as the wind that blew around their mountain homes, and for more than 10 centuries, while all the rest of Europe knelt down in servitude to feudal monarchs, that peasant people embattled upon the snow-clad summit of the European Alps upheld aloft the banner of civil and religious liberty, the right of a people to rule and govern themselves and worship God as they pleased and yielding no allegiance to any power save that on high, refused to bow the head or crook the knee to any prince or potentate on earth. [Applause.]

I admit that my race heritage makes it difficult for me to accept the argument of the gentleman from California, the leader of the advocates of conscription, that Members of Congress are to accept the mandates of the military department without question.

I do not believe that a Member can excuse himself when he supports conscription upon the plea that we are raising an army of home guards or that the war will soon be over or any other hope that the Army shall not be used for the only purpose that it can possibly serve in this war, and that is to fight where the fighting must be done.

We must face the fact that when we conscript men for this army we are drafting them for no other purpose than to fit them to take part with those nations who are fighting our war on the battle fields of France this day and every day. The President has declared that the object of the war is to defeat our enemy, and to find him we must go to the Hindenberg line, where sons of France and England and Australia and Belgium are dying that democracy may yet be triumphant throughout the world. There are those who think that we can some way escape this responsibility, hoping that this army that we shall raise shall not be sent to Europe. That is the wish of one who does not want to do his part in this war; that is the wish of the conscript; that is not the hope of the volunteer. Can anyone conceive that safe behind the guns of the British fleet, behind the bulwark of the armies of France, England, Italy, and Russia, we are going to draft an army only to drill and march around upon American soil, 3,000 miles from the seat of war, 3,000 miles from the place where our enemy is fighting like a caged tiger to get at us if he can, only defeated by the protecting armies of our friends? I trust that this is not the part that anyone expects us to play in this war.

I was interested in the eloquent speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] when he proclaimed that he opposed any alliance with anyone else in this war. I would like to ask the chairman of the minority, the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], if he, too, agrees that we are to make no alliance in this war with any other nation, and is he willing that we should make a separate peace with Germany whenever the United States can make a peace satisfactory to ourselves. He speaks for the administration, I understand, upon this floor. [After a pause.] He declines to speak.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Nebraska that the gentleman from California will speak in his own time and not in his.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Very well. I thought it was important, right at the very time when these other nations who are fighting our battles over there, who are giving of their best blood and dying upon the battle fields fighting for us, and just as their representatives are here to meet in council with us, that it be known definitely whether we are to proclaim, through the floor leader of the minority and the supporter of the administration, that we are not to support those men, and are to make peace with the enemy whenever we are ready to make it with advantage to ourselves.

I realize that it is a tremendous responsibility to send an army to the trenches of Europe to battle with the greatest military nation in the world. We should, therefore, send the best army that America can raise. No nation in the history of the world, so far as I can discover, has ever sent a conscript army to fight a war upon another continent. It is true the English sent a small force of conscripted Hessians to fight our forefathers when we were battling for the freedom of this Nation, but it is also a matter of history that this army of conscripted Hessians surrendered to Washington one morning before breakfast without the loss of a single American soldier. [Applause.] The soldiers of continental Europe are the product of compulsory service, not drafted by a selective system to be administered we know not how, but every man of military age declared physically fit is required to go to the colors when called. The men of Europe did not have to be conscripted to make them fight in this war. Every one of the warring nations of Europe is fighting with its back to the wall. Every soldier believes he is fighting for the very life and existence of his country. They are fighting at the very doors of their own homes. Compulsory military service to these men was only the means whereby they were fitted and trained to fight. For a generation the nations of continental Europe have been getting ready for this war under systems of compulsory military service. [Applause.]

But there is no element of compulsion entering into their service in this war. The same men would fight with entirely different courage and spirit if they were drafted to fight on another continent. There is no question but that the military nations of Europe brought on this war because of their struggles to dominate and control the trade of the world. The military machines which they built up by compulsory service were designed to back up their claims for commercial supremacy. The Kaiser of Germany himself declared at the commencement of the war that the two principal causes of this conflict that is destroying the civilization of Europe is race hatred and commercial rivalry among nations. Prussianism is the full flower of the baleful power to conscript the manhood of a nation exercised by an autocratic ruler. It is the weapon the German autocracy forged with which to win commercial supremacy throughout the world. It is the club with which that autocracy has sought to beat democracy to death. If Prussianism wins, it means that the greatest power in this world is a 42-centimeter gun. It is against Prussian autocracy that the President tells us we wage this war. That autocracy is based on nothing else but the power of conscription combined with a military caste and dies only when this power is denied to it. Many good men who see the world on fire in this war because of the damning effects of the Prussian system insist that if we would defeat it we must make use of the system upon which it feeds to accomplish its overthrow. If we must fight the devil with his own fire, let us be very careful we do not consume the institutions of free democracy in our own land with that same blasting flame. [Applause.]

Article 2 of the German constitution declares the Emperor has full power to declare war if the nation is attacked or about to be attacked. Article 62 of the same constitution provides that the entire Prussian military system shall be introduced without delay throughout the Empire. Article 63 provides that the Emperor is the sole commander in chief of the armies of the Empire in peace or war.

These three articles contain the essentials of the German autocratic power. But the Kaiser would be as weak as water were it not for the Prussian military system of conscription, which has produced the fiercest and most merciless army known to modern warfare. It is a power that the whole world is in arms against. Every English-speaking people is in arms against that power, and every English-speaking race has refused to resort to the draft, which is the foundation of Prussianism, except as a last resort. In little England herself 5,000,000 of the best soldiers in the world volunteered in this war for democracy. Canada, Australia, and New Zealand have sent almost a million of as brave troops as ever fought upon a battle field, every man a product of the system that is now sought to be discredited in this country. Six million and more of our brothers in language, now comrades in arms, have answered to the call of democracy and put guns upon their shoulders and gone voluntarily to fight her battles. England herself had less than a million men of military age left in the British Isles when they obligated the entire nation that remained at home to military service. We have more than 20,000,000 men of fighting age. If we were to go to the draft after we have sent 15,000,000 willing men to the battle line in Europe, that would be following the example of England in this matter.

Every advocate of conscription shouts "Look at England! Her record proves that the volunteer system is a failure." Yes; look at England. She is winning the war, if the allies win; she is the backbone of the opposition to Prussian militarism throughout the world; she rules the seven seas of earth; and if Germany is brought to her knees it is the navy of England that brings her to them. England rules the seven seas, and every man who treads the decks of her mighty fleet and fights beneath the union jack is a volunteer free-born Englishman. If anyone in America thinks that England has been in any sense a failure in this war, they can apply to Germany, and I think the Kaiser will tell them a different story. "God punish England" is the cry that shows the world that Germany knows whom her most dangerous adversary is. John Bull may have been a little slow at the start of this war in getting into the fight upon the land. Democracy has never deemed it necessary to be ready to strike a death blow at a neighbor nation at an hour's notice. But John Bull has his coat off now, and the Kaiser is learning that he can fight on land as effectively as upon the sea. Does anyone think the little army of a few hundred thousand men England conscripted from the residue remaining from her great mass of fighting volunteers makes the might of England invincible to-day on every battle field of Europe or of Asia where men fight beneath the banner of St. George? On every fighting front in this great war men who speak the English language and believe in the democracy which the English race has given to the world are proving that the volunteer soldier is the best soldier and the soldier that will fight until this war is won. English-speaking nations have never been quick to quarrel, but when once engaged have never yet failed to voluntarily fight the issue through to a successful finish. A great many people, including some of those high in our Military Establishment, are worried as to how we shall start in this war. They criticize and constantly refer to the slowness with which Great Britain and all her democratic daughters started in this race of death with military autocracy, but I have never seen prizes paid nor results decided at the start of any race. If the race is long and hard, as this race was bound to be, since its course ran round the world, the race was sure to go not to the swiftest at the start, but to the racer that could run true in the stretch, that could stand the whip and the spur when the pace was heartbreaking, and the spurs are driven deep into the heaving flanks and the cruel whip beats upon the struggling shoulders of the racers.

In that sort of a race the volunteer soldier has never failed to run true to the finish and be in at the death. When the Prussian autocracy shall finally be no more and democracy and enduring peace shall reign throughout this earth, the verdict of history shall be that the soldier that finally triumphed over military autocracy in this Armageddon of the world was the English-speaking volunteer. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. OLNEY.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, our minority leader has told me that there are practically 50 men who desire to be heard upon the minority report, and I am going to yield back 10 minutes of my time so that anyone who desires to be heard upon the question may have an opportunity.

Mr. Chairman, a state of war exists between Germany and the United States, and it is necessary that in the creation of an army we look to the Commander in Chief of the Army, the Chief Executive of the War Department, and competent and responsible Army officers for advice. Two methods of raising an army are under consideration by the House, one by the volunteer system and the other by selective conscription.

As a conservative business man I am willing to heed the advice of the Commander in Chief, a civilian; the Secretary of War, a civilian, and competent Army officers as to the best and wisest means to pursue in creating a trained force of men. Such witnesses came before the Military Affairs Committee, and in the terms of Cæsar, they came, some of the committee saw and were conquered. To illustrate further, if you are going to build a house you would naturally consult an architect and a carpenter, would you not, the one as the experienced, guiding hand and the other to build a strong foundation, frame the dwelling, drive in the nails, and roof the building. So when the architect of the War Department appeared before our committee with his skilled artisans or carpenters, if you will, and recommended that a certain method be adopted in the raising, equipping, and training of an army I felt that these men knew what they were talking about.

As one of the original proponents of universal military training and service in the House my action is absolutely consistent.

I advocated universal training and service as an arm of the Military Establishment of the United States more than a year ago, and hope and trust after this great war is over the great military heads of the Government will get together and frame and advocate such legislation.

Would that the Government had begun such a system a year ago and we would now have training 1,000,000 men. A member of the English Parliament told me at my home in Washington three months ago that the United States would not adopt universal training and service until a crisis arrived. The crisis has arrived and conscription should be the opening wedge for a permanent policy after the war of universal liability to service where the burden of military responsibility will be equally distributed to all citizens of military age and which is the only democratic and consistent method of raising and training an army.

Capt. Benson, seven years in the English Army and an officer in the Somerset Yeomanry, doing service in and about Jerusalem, on leave of absence from his country on account of disability, was in Washington 10 days ago and I conscripted him to appear before the Military Committee.

A summing up of his testimony strongly indicated a decided preference for the conscription over the volunteer system, and if England was beginning the war she would start with conscription. Among other things, Capt. Benson pointed out that under the volunteer act about twice as many married men volunteered as single men, and, furthermore, that the volunteer system took many of the most useful men out of the country, and frequently coal miners, skilled mechanics, and agriculturalists were compelled to return to England since their services were considered more useful at home in the prosecution of the war. Actually 200,000 under the volunteer act were recalled from the front for duty in England.

Capt. Benson made a strong point on the question of economy in conscription as against extravagance and waste in the volunteer method. I quote from his testimony:

> Very often A and B, who enlisted, were married men with large families, while C and D were single men. While those men were on service the State had to pay separation allowances and dependent allowances for A's and B's wives and children and dependents, and those allowances were a very serious factor. In fact, it was laughingly said that if a man only had enough children his pay would be as much as the pay of a general, and that was a factor that had great weight.

Another point which Capt. Benson drove home with force related to equal distribution of effort and obligation under conscription.

Under the volunteer act where a certain district was bombarded by Zeppelins heavy enlistment would ensue from that section, while there was practically no volunteering from sections untouched by balloon warfare. In other words, the distribution of effort and obligation under the volunteer system was not equitable.

Several weeks ago the emergency peace committee of Massachusetts took a straw vote on war and conscription and about 2,200 responded in the entire Commonwealth. The percentage against war was 62.4 and against conscription 59.9. The peace committee further states that the percentages in the congressional districts vary from high votes, such as in the Hon. RICHARD OLNEY'S—fourteenth—where there was a vote against war of 80.1 per cent and against conscription of 77.7 per cent, to an adverse vote in Hon. W. H. CARTER'S—thirteenth—of 53.5 per cent for war and 53.8 for conscription. In reading this statement to the House I reveal that the almost overwhelming sentiment in my district is against conscription, and yet I fearlessly go on record to-day in favor of such a policy as a Representative of the Nation and not as a Congressman from a particular section of the country. My people are a heterogeneous people, composed of boot and shoe operatives, skilled mechanics, farmers, business men, and granite workers, the finest constituency in the United States, and a strong bond of sympathy and friendship exists between them and their Congressman.

If my constituents could have listened to all the evidence before our committee, I am sure that there would be a reversal in the vote on conscription, for they are reasonable, intelligent, and open to conviction.

In this great war in which we have embarked there is work for all.

Men should be conscripted to stay at home to work in the fields or the shops, and most of the operatives in boot and shoe factories, the granite quarries, the shipbuilding yards will be needed at home to supply the Army and the civilians with necessities of life.

If the plan of conscription is adopted, those men will be taken who can best be spared from society.

At this point I beg to submit to the House the following letter from a constituent:

HYDE PARK, April 16, 1917.

Congressman OLNEY.

DEAR SIR: As one of your constituents I should like to express my views to you on the universal service bill which will come before you shortly. I am an ex-militiaman, having served in Company K, First Heavy Artillery.

After my own experience, and seeing the time they had in getting volunteers in England for this war, I believe the universal training bill is the only just and proper way to raise the forces we need, and I hope you will find yourself able to give it your hearty support.

Some of my reasons for supporting it are: That the volunteer force at present consists principally of the laboring class; and as it has been used mainly for intimidation in strikes it has lost favor with that class of people. Result: For years it has not been able to muster at peace strength.

Again, why should our bright, manly boys, a credit to our towns and villages, go to the front while the poolroom fiends, etc., stay at home. They should be made to go and do their part.

With the rich and poor in the ranks, there will be more respect shown for the uniform than there is at the present time.

Again hoping that you will give this bill your hearty support,

I am, respectfully, yours,

ROLAND S. WARDE.

681 Metropolitan Avenue, Hyde Park, Mass.

Granting that half a million are ready to offer their services to-morrow as volunteers the War Department is not equipped according to the Secretary of War, to properly train and equip such a force at the present time, and he added that it would take at least three months before the machinery could be actually in operation to effectively provide for 500,000, on account of a deficiency in trained officers, tentage, uniforms, and other supplies.

Plenty of opportunity is afforded to those imbued with the volunteer spirit to enlist in the National Guard and Regular Army, since according to a summary furnished by the Secretary of War the number of men that may be provided by voluntary enlistment under the War Department plan amounts to 724,718. In Massachusetts about 60 men a day are enlisting under this plan, and at this rate it would take nearly two years for Massachusetts to furnish its quota; and I understand that enlistment all over the country is proportionately similar.

To a question by one of the committeemen as to what he would do if the volunteer act were adopted, the Secretary, without hesitation, substantially said that he would give his most earnest attention and his very best effort to make the system as successful and effective as possible.

About 50,000 Americans are fighting in France to-day in one capacity or another under the flags of France and Great Britain, but in the interest of one common cause—the subjection of militarism and the substitution of democracy for bureaucracy.

If in the course of events the European war lasts into next year, this Nation may send transports to France laden with soldiers, and it would be feasible and practicable to enlist there under the Stars and Stripes the 50,000 already enlisted in foreign service.

If we desire to pay our debt to France and to help the allied nations in their great struggle, how better can we render assistance than through a system of conscription which will be expeditious, businesslike, efficient, and which has the approval of the President, the War Department, and Army officers of high rank. While I respect the opinions and honest convictions of those members of the Military Committee who have presented the majority report, I am very happy in the stand I have taken and am proud to be enrolled with the minority members, the so-called conscript fathers.

In comparison to the committee as a whole, the minority are few in numbers, but, oh, how strong in faith. Who are the minority men? KAHN of California, representing the far West, heading the committee, MCKENZIE of Illinois, CRAGO of Pennsylvania, TILSON of Connecticut, GREENE of Vermont, HARRISON of Virginia, LUNN of New York, and OLNEY of Massachusetts. Three members hail from the three largest States in the Union in point of population; about half of the thirteen original States are represented on the committee, and Virginia and Massachusetts are again found clasping hands in a common cause. Four members are Spanish-American War veterans and, confessing the weakness of the volunteer system, enthusiastically indorse conscription. The Nation, yea, the world, is watching the United States during this period. Germany would welcome our adoption of a military policy such as the voluntary system, which has broken down in all the great wars of this Nation and which has been a failure in all other countries wherever attempted. The United States is engaged in this war as an ally of the entente, is it not, and we should present a united, a solid, front.

When the House acts, may it speak in no uncertain terms in favor of conscription, carrying a message of hope and gladness to the allies and guaranteeing a speedy termination of the great European conflict. [Applause.]

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3545, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 2762. An act to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes.

INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3545.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3545, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, how much time did the gentleman from Massachusetts consume?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, let no man misunderstand the gravity of the question before the House. The Congress, at the request of the President, several days ago passed the resolution boldly declaring the existence of a state of war between the United States of America and the Imperial Government of Germany. Our country is now at war with that powerful military nation. All discussion has been closed as to the relative merits or demerits of the war. The time for discussion has passed. Every citizen of this great Republic of freemen should now stand firmly and patriotically by the flag and do everything in his power to bring victory to our country.

The Congress has turned over $7,000,000,000 to the President, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, to lend to the allies and expend for the United States in prosecuting the war. Everything requested has been unanimously granted. Your Committee on Military Affairs had the responsibility of reporting a bill to raise, equip, and maintain the Army to begin the prosecution of the war.

The President desires the authorization for 1,000,000 men by selective draft, or conscription, in two increments of 500,000 each. All of your committee agreed to give the million men, but the majority of the committee thought it wise to authorize the President to call for the first half million as volunteers in units of companies and regiments from the several States, and when he desired the next half million the President should call them in the same manner.

The majority of the committee also provided the machinery for the inauguration of the draft system desired by the President and the Secretary of War, with the authority vested in the President to initiate the selective conscription system if the proper number of available men failed to respond under the call for volunteers.

The committee was careful to safeguard the Commander in Chief against any semblance of failure on the part of the citizens to promptly respond to the call to arms.

Mr. Chairman, the objection to the selective conscription plan is fundamental. We owe it to the President and the country to provide an army sufficient to prosecute this war to a successful conclusion.

Your committee has granted every man and every dollar requested. We give in our bill the lump sum of $3,000,000,000, and authorize the President and Secretary of War to spend it as they see proper in preparing and in conducting the war. We could not agree to the selective conscription plan as presented to us.

Mr. Chairman, that plan required us to place the burden on the youth between the ages of 19 and 25 years—to be forced to do all the fighting—the only portion of our citizens, except those in the Regular Army and the National Guard, who would be called on to die for the United States, perhaps in the trenches of Europe. We were called upon to limit the men to that specific class and allow the agencies of the War Department to select which ones they would take.

I could not agree to that plan. We all know, if this war lasts long enough, these soldiers will be marched into the trenches and on the firing lines against the enemy in Europe. It is my conviction, sir, that the burden to do the fighting in this war rests on the shoulders of the men from 21 years up to perhaps 50. The stock argument of the advocates of this selective conscription plan is, that it is universal, democratic, and the only fair way to get the soldiers to do the fighting.

How universal is it, when every man above 25 years of age is excluded from the draft, and can pursue the even tenor of his way during the mighty conflict, when a few of those who are between 19 and 25 years of age will be fighting and dying for the entire Nation?

How democratic is it, when the agencies of the War Department are to select from among the physically and mentally sound ones those names that come out of the box or jury wheel which ones are to go into the Army to do the fighting and which ones are to be left at home? I ask if this is fair; to whom is it fair? Is it fair to the man who is conscripted into the Army, while his neighbor of the same age and same physical and mental ability is left at home to enjoy life or make money? Is it fair to all of that class between 19 and 25 years that a select portion of them be forced to do that Army service and perhaps get slain on the field of battle, while every man who happens to be above 25 years of age is excluded from the service?

Mr. Chairman, I could not vote to conscript the boys who are not old enough to vote and force them to do the fighting for the men of this Nation.

If Congress adopts the plan of the War Department, the first draft will mean about 1,100 young men from each congressional district, and the second draft will be about December for 1,100 more young men from each congressional district.

The Secretary of War stated before our committee that it would take three months from the passage of the bill to organize the machinery and register all of the male citizens between 19 and 25 years of age, and that it would take about six weeks after that to perform the select drafting and have them in camp ready for the Army. Of course, it would take several months of intensive training before they would be prepared to enter the trenches or march on the lines against the enemy on European soil. Every one of them will be in the Army for the period of the war or the existing emergency.

You understand they will be kept in the Army until the President of the United States issues a peace proclamation.

The metropolitan papers and a few leagues have endeavored to mislead the public and make them believe this is a mere proposition for universal compulsory military training. There is no such idea as that in this bill. The measure is for the conscription of 1,000,000 men between 19 and 25 years by selection through the War Department for actual service in the Army against the enemy. They are to be sent to any place or any battle field which the President may deem expedient.

Gentlemen, the President is Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, and after we turn this Army over to him I am in favor of his using his own judgment without consulting Congress as to when and where that Army is to be used.

I know, if the war continues long enough, he will be compelled to send the forces to fight the enemy in Europe. We can not be mealy-mouthed about not wanting our soldiers to be sent to foreign soil to fight. If the President says they should go there, it is up to Congress to say nothing, but aid him in every way possible to bring victory and honor to our country in this awful contest.

Since we know in reason that this Army we propose to raise under this act will be sent to Europe to engage in that mad carnage, do you want to conscript a few of a certain age, or let the call be answered by all of military age to voluntarily offer themselves as a sacrifice to the country? Do you want to follow the system and method of autocracy, or do you desire to follow the plan of democracy?

Gentlemen, the great body of the plain people, the inarticulate mass which constitutes the real sovereignty of our Government, can not be heard in the chamber of diplomats. Shall they cease to be heard in the committee rooms of the American Congress?

Shall their voice be stifled on the floor of this House?

Shall we resort to the same system created and perfected by the Prussian military autocracy, which we are seeking to overthrow?

My fellow Members, do you know that with all of the autocratic power vested in the Kaiser and his military autocracy, that he can not conscript a single soldier to go beyond the borders of the Empire? The German soldier volunteers for the service beyond his own country. The Kaiser with all his power could not conscript or draft his armies to come to America to fight. The soldiers of His Majesty could not be compelled to come until they had volunteered to do so.

If that idea prevails under an autocracy, am I to be criticized for thinking it should continue in a democracy? I love the people and adore all of the tenets of real democracy. If this be a weakness, I trust it is a pardonable one as the real cause why I can not follow our President and accept this doctrine of conscripting the young men of America to fight in Europe until after all men of military age shall have had an opportunity to answer the call of the President through authority of Congress to volunteer for such service. If they were to fail to respond to such a call in the proper number and the proper time, then no one could complain at the conscription of men from 21 to 40 years of age.

The advocates of this autocratically and erroneously denominated democratic and fair plan of selective draft or conscription say it is the ideal system of raising an army. Admitting for the sake of argument that their conclusion is true, does that make it just and right? I admit it is a perfect system by which to gather up the American youths and stand them in front of the asphyxiating gas bombs, the machine guns, the heavy artillery, and infantry rifle bullets of the Germany army, to be swept into eternity without their desire or volition; but does that make it fair, just, and right to those young men of America? Would it harmonize with our ideals, institutions, and traditions?

I could formulate what many people would deem an ideal tax system, but to my mind it would be an outrage.

Suppose a law were suggested by which all of the taxes to support the Government should be paid by men between the ages of 25 and 40 years, and that no other persons were required to pay any taxes; and further that some agency of the Government be vested with full power at will to select a certain number of men between those ages to pay all of the taxes required of all the people of the United States, and not only the great majority of the men between 25 and 40 years would have no tax burden on them, but all other persons of all other ages in the Republic would be free from taxation. No doubt there are many people in the Nation who would call that plan "universal, democratic, and fair."

Does any man on this floor pretend to say that would be a "universal, democratic, and fair plan" to raise revenue to support and maintain the Federal Government?

Would it be a democratic and fair method of raising revenue to support the municipality, the county, or the State?

No Member of this Congress, nay, no intelligent man outside of Congress, could so becloud his powers of ratiocination as to reach a conclusion that such an abortive system of raising revenue could be universal, democratic, fair, just, and right.

Then why will not the same process of reasoning apply to the proposed selective draft, or conscription act, to draft whatever young men of the limited class the War Department's agents select to do the fighting for all the people of the United States?

Still we are told this is universal, democratic, and fair.

Is it really possible that a Member of this House could so prostitute his intellect as to in truth and fact reach such a preposterous conclusion?

Gentlemen, what is the matter with the Dent bill reported to this House by a majority of your committee?

Twelve of us believe that is the proper bill for our great country at the beginning of this impending emergency.

The minority of eight of our committee believe in the selective conscription plan, though agreeing with us on other features of the bill. A careful analysis of our measure will indicate to any mind that our country is safe in every regard in so far as the raising, equipping, concentrating, and maintaining an Army for the war is concerned.

Each member of that committee is actuated by the same high, noble, and patriotic impulses. The majority of us patriotically believe the volunteer system should be given a trial, and we have breathed our earnest and patriotic conceptions into the bill.

Why not give our citizens a chance to volunteer in units of companies and regiments, the officers to be examined and appointed by the President under the new laws?

Does any man believe that patriotism is dead in our country? Do you believe that the American citizenry would fail to respond to the stirring appeal of our great President if our volunteer provision is adopted by Congress?

Mr. Chairman, it is the passion of my soul that every real American should be ready at all times to lay down his life for his country. What nobler impulse can there be in the soul of Americans than to immolate themselves on the altar of their country? America, the proud heritage of Bunker Hill, Brandywine, and Valley Forge!

Our freedom, liberty, institutions, ideals, tradition, and rights of man and property, safeguarded by the Constitution, the sacred palladium of liberty, constitute a noble heritage won by the sacrifice of blood and life of the fathers before us.

Fellow Americans, do you mean to tell me there is no patriotism in the United States, the giant of the west?

Gentlemen on this floor argue that citizens would not volunteer, because they do not rush by the tens of thousands to fill up the Regular Army and the National Guard. Do not you know that is not a fair nor legitimate comparison?

More than a regiment a day since the declaration of war is being accepted into the Regular Army, which fills the hope of even the most optimistic observer.

Do not you know our citizens have never responded to any extent to the Regular Army? They did not do it in the War with Mexico in 1845 and 1848. They did not volunteer into the Regular Army in the Civil War from 1861 to 1865. During the whole time of the Civil War not more than 1 per cent of the volunteers enlisted in the Regular Army. Why should it be different to-day?

The first call of 400,000 by President Lincoln was responded to promptly, and they even came too fast. The Secretary of War, Mr. Cameron, made this pertinent observation:

I can not forbear to speak favorably of the volunteer system * * *. A Government whose every citizen stands ready to march to its defense can never be overthrown, for none is so strong as that whose foundations rest immovably in the hearts of the people.

You hear men say conscription was resorted to by President Lincoln in the last years of the war. Do you know that the records show that 1,356,000 volunteers were enrolled and only about 60,000 were conscripted soldiers?

You say the Confederate Government had to resort to conscription. Do you know that the records show that the Confederate Government was formed in 1861, in February, and that on the 6th of March President Davis issued a call for 100,000 volunteers, and by the middle of April he had 35,000 already equipped and ready for the field. He only had a small population to draw from, and yet he got every man called for in a very short time.

Of course, he had to conscript soldiers when their wives and children were at home suffering for something to eat and wear.

What is the truth about our present condition? We have about 150,000 trained men in the National Guard who have been in training since the summer of 1916, and we have about 150,000 in the Regular Army. We have a goodly number trained in the Officers' Reserve Corps.

A call for 500,000 volunteers by company and regimental units from the States and Territories would mean what? It would mean a great upheaval of patriotism all over this mighty Republic, and before 30 days the half million men would be in training, ready and anxious for the day to come when they could go to alien soil, bear the flag of the United States, and demonstrate American valor and prowess in driving the Kaiser's warriors back toward Berlin.

All of the enterprise of this great Nation is in process of mobilization to equip the Army. The rifles are already in store for the first 500,000.

Our marvelous resources guarantee the statement they would be speedily uniformed.

Gentlemen argue that it might cripple industry. That is impossible, because the volunteer provision gives the President the same right to select them as he would have under his conscript provision. Anyway, what is a little unit of one-half a million men out of our hundred millions of people? We have 35,000,000 men of military age in this country. No one could seriously contend that 1,000,000 being taken according to the legal quotas from all the States and Territories, could cut any material figure in any business or industry, even if the President or Secretary of War did not exercise the power to say which should be refused by the Government.

Why, in the beginning of the war, depart from the traditional method of this Nation and all other democracies? It was the Volunteer Army that placed the flag of the United States on the ramparts of Monterey.

It was the volunteer regiments which brought honor and victory to our flag at Buena Vista.

It was the American Volunteers who carried the Stars and Stripes into Mexico City.

It was the Union's Volunteers who overcame the Stars and Bars and overthrew the Government of the Confederate States of America.

It was the American Volunteers who drove the flag of Spain from the Pearl of the Antilles.

It was the American Volunteers who drove the Spanish oppressor from the green isles inhabited by the swarthy Filipino in the far distant Pacific.

Is it possible that at this glorious period of our national history, when we surpass the world in wealth, resources, and inventive genius, we can not at the beginning of a war, trust the American men of military age to respond to the Nation's call to fight her battles any time and everywhere?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. QUIN. It was American genius that gave the world the fatal submarine. It was American genius which gave the world the flying machine, now the eyes of the modern armies engaged in the greatest war in the world's history.

Must we now, under the shadow of all past achievements, bow our heads in ignominy and exclaim, "Americans no longer breathe the patriotic spirit of 'Old Glory'"?

Shall we at the very outset of this conflict brand the American soldier with the word conscript, so that in future years his posterity can, in accord with the citizen of old Rome, exclaim, "Conscript Fathers"?

Many newspapers of the country say the volunteer system is a failure.

Gentlemen, England, with a population of only 40,000,000 people, raised a volunteer army of 5,000,000 soldiers before resorting to the draft plan, and since adopting this plan she allows 30 days for the men to enlist in the army, and under that system she has added only 1,350,000 soldiers to her army.

Just think of it, with the war going on in her back yard, the Kingdom of England has not yet adopted any such strenuous law as is proposed here.

The Dominion of Canada and Australia, colonial dependencies or possessions of Great Britain, still have the volunteer system, and the war has been in progress nearly three years.

Each one of these countries supplies its quota of soldiers through the volunteer plan and gets them across the ocean for the mother country to put on the firing line against the enemy. No one will contend that any of the industries of Canada or Australia have been injured or hampered by this system of volunteers.

Gentlemen, who is to be selected?

The last evening the Secretary of War appeared before the committee I submitted this question to him: "Mr. Secretary, the population of my district is about 75 per cent agricultural and 25 per cent urban or town. What ratio will be selected under your draft system?" The Secretary said he could not, of course, be accurate; he would estimate about 3 to 1. That is, every time one was selected from the towns three would be selected from the country.

He said the transportation operatives of trains would not be drafted. It is plain that when they take 1,200 men out of my district 900 of them will be farmers and 300 of them town men.

Under the draft system the agencies of the War Department would, of course, determine which farmers should be put into the Army.

Gentlemen, do not pay attention to all this rot in the newspapers in reference to saying farmers will not be drafted into the Army. Every one of these men in the New England factories, these men who are making nine, twelve, and fifteen dollars a day on the coast here in the munitions factories, will stay there and say, "Yes; conscript these fellows between 19 and 25 all over the country and send them over yonder to bare their breasts to the German bullets." That is what is going to happen.

I am standing by the President in all of his war measures, but I can not support this selective conscription. It is a matter too vital and fundamental for any of us to treat lightly. I can not surrender my convictions when I am convinced that the plan is not for the best interest of our Nation. It is likely to breed internal troubles and ill feeling against the Government.

Now is the time when every citizen should love the Government. I can not conscript the boys into the Army. If they should go to the trenches and many be killed and others maimed and wounded, I could not face them, one-armed, one-legged, and with disfigured faces, and see some with sightless eyeballs rolling at me. If they go voluntarily, no reproach could come against anyone. To conscript the boys and ill fortune overtake them, pangs of conscience would disturb me as long as I live.

In the name of humanity, I ask you if you vote for the conscript bill please give us our amendment to exempt the boys.

This is a man's war, and if it is to be fought by conscript soldiers these soldiers should be above 21 years of age.

I am doing what my heart and mind lead me to think is right and for the best interest of our country now and for the future.

I ask you further to accept our amendment exempting ministers of the Gospel. Surely it would be humiliating to have the agents of the War Department drag the minister of God away from his congregation and conscript him into the Army.

May the God of hosts guard and protect America. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman know any reason why a minister of the Gospel should be excepted any more than a lawyer or a banker or a farmer?

Mr. QUIN. Oh, yes; a minister of the Gospel ministers to the people. We need somebody, while we are following this war-mad cry, while we are resorting to every endeavor to break down Prussianism, we need somebody inspired by God on high to preach to our women and children and those men above 25 years of age who are left at home to enjoy their usual pursuits. [Laughter]. Do not take the ministers of the Gospel from them. Leave a semblance of the followers of the lowly Nazarene back at home to preach to the people, to bury the dead, and marry the youth of the land. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, in order that I may not abuse the confidence of my distinguished friend from California and may yield back such time as possible for the use of others, I ask the Chair to notify me at the end of 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, it is with great reluctance and regret that I find myself reduced to the painful necessity of parting company on a great question from my friend from Alabama [Mr. DENT], the great chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I have admired him; we have all admired him. He is able; he is true; he is one of the best men we ever had; he is one of the best chairmen that great committee ever had, and if anybody would say they are going into mourning because he has made this mistake I wish to console them by reminding them that as one swallow does not make a summer so one error can not damn a great man. [Applause.] There is yet time for him to retrieve his reputation and do right on this question.

I should have no objection, Mr. Chairman, to humoring the pride and preserving the face of every man who wants to volunteer if they would only offer to volunteer, but they do not all offer. If they did, the administration would be flooded with hundreds of thousands of telegrams saying they wanted to volunteer as quickly as possible, instead of hundreds of thousands of applications for clerkships and commissions. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is all right to talk about punctilio and pride and humiliating our young men by drafting them. This is no time for theorizing nor for sentimentality. The stern fact faces us that we have a job on our hands probably not realized by the great mass of our people nor even by all the Congressmen themselves. War has been forced upon us by the most reckless, unscrupulous, and warlike Government the world has seen for generations. The gentleman from Pennsylvania just now in describing the situation was in error when he said the President urged us to declare war against Germany. We have been for two years led by the wisest man who ever sat in the White House or presided over any other country trying to avoid having to recognize that Germany was making war on us. Finally, when patience ceased to be a virtue, when forbearance could no longer forbear, when our lives and our property and our rights, individual and national, were disregarded ruthlessly and recklessly, then, as watchmen on watchtowers, true to our trust, true to our people, we proclaimed and recognized that ruthless war was being waged upon us and recognized the necessity of preparing for it.

Now, shall we stand here and spin theories and talk about pride and punctilio and ask Germany to wait two years until we can make experiments to see whether we can organize a volunteer army, when Hohenzollern militarism may have broken down the eastern line and made it necessary—a necessity which might not arise if we took prompt action—for us to send a million men to Europe, in order that the descendants of Sheridan and Sherman and of Lee and Jackson shall cut through those phalanxes, pierce those lines, and secure liberty and freedom for us and for civilization from further ruthless aggression? [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, a thousand recruits a day would give us 750,000 men in two years. Our prompt recognition of the situation, unanimously extending credit, unanimously declaring we would resist the war, have been marvelous in their moral effects upon the war, and if we promptly follow that by recognizing the necessity to do all things necessary to raise an army as quickly as possible we would increase the moral effect, and we may by prompt action succeed in helping to end the war before the worst comes upon us. If we dally along and let our good men volunteer and let the "slackers" stay at home to disgrace themselves and probably rob their neighbors, we may be reduced to the extremity of not only sending an army abroad, but also leaving one equally as large at home to protect ourselves against other things that might happen just as bad, if we left our shores unprotected.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am unwilling that the flower, the youth, the chivalry, the bravery, the honesty of the country shall volunteer and go ahead and risk their lives in fighting for the balance of them, while their neighbors, less patriotic, are allowed to slack and shirk and stay at home. It is not discrimination. It is democracy, it is equity, both of which are equality before the law. All of our people are subject to military duty unless specifically excepted for good reason. Then, it is simply obedience to law for everybody to recognize that, and no brave man can claim advantage over another and say, "I rushed in and volunteered ahead of you." And no "slacker" can be shamed by saying, "I was drafted when you were not." The thing to do when we have a man's job on our hands and where there may be a real war is to prepare for it and quit talking about these trifling sentimentalities that men talk about.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not trespass longer upon the time of the House, but I will ask that the Clerk read a letter, which is one of many thousands received from the district which I have the honor to represent, and which I am proud to say realizes the gravity of the situation. While many of their men stand ready to volunteer, they all recognize the liability of all to serve their country, and they are all standing by the administration in demanding the exertion of every means and the use of every resource and every recourse equally and justly to raise an army as quickly as possible and end this war as soon as possible.

I will ask the Clerk to read the letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LAGRANGE, GA., April 19, 1917.

Hon. W. C. ADAMSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ADAMSON: To begin with, I do not think it is right to save all the flowers for the casket, so I am going to tell you how glad I am to see you standing for selective conscription. You are proving again your "level head," and in this instance your sense of justice as well. When I read what Representatives had to say—that "conscription would mean their political death"; "that they had promised the mothers of their States to keep their sons out of war"—I wondered whose sons would do their fighting for them. God grant it may never come to fighting; but just now, if all mothers' sons are to be spared all risks and possibilities, who will answer our country's call? No mother ever had two finer, dearer boys than mine. For years we have been trying to prepare them for lives of usefulness and praying each day that they might grow up to be a comfort to their parents and an honor to their country. We have worked and sacrificed that they might have every advantage from the public schools on through the State university and then their degrees at the Johns Hopkins and Harvard, and studying in Germany and France. Harry has spent four years of hard work on the house staff at the Hopkins, and last October he leased and equipped his own office in the city and has been doing so well this winter, and it seems the time isn't so far off now when he can begin to think of having a home of his own and some one to keep it. Searcy has been building up the "good roads and bridges" for his State, working unceasingly, going into every county in Georgia, from Rabun Gap to the sea, and, as you may know, the University of Michigan had him come up and spend one summer showing them what Georgia was doing. These are the boys who have been taught never to shirk a duty; and are such boys as these to be thrown into the breach and save Representatives from political death and their mothers' sons from every personal sacrifice and danger?

These boys of mine volunteered last year when the trouble came with Mexico, and when the war cloud appeared above the horizon again in February I went flying to Baltimore to have a little love feast with Harry before he was sent—I knew not where. While in Baltimore I was talking to some doctors about what a pity it was for Harry to have to stop his work just as he had started off. They said they had absolutely no patience with Harry: that "a fellow who had things right in his hands was a fool to risk the loss of such a grand work." These very doctors were spending the greater part of their days waiting for work to come their way, and going into the Army would be their salvation, and a burden off their parents.

We are sadly in need of conscription—boys and men, great, strong, sturdy men all over the country, some of them having been captains in athletics at college—they never have done any work worth while, and they surely need Uncle Sam to get behind them and make them work for once in their lives. I can't understand why people can't see that it would be the best thing the country ever did to take up all loafers and put them to work. Think of what it would mean to have several hundred thousand of them farming this summer.

You know how bravely and cheerfully Dr. Slack has worked all these years, despite his increasing deafness; he has looked to the future when these boys would be the stay and comfort of his later years, and now when it seems that his country needs them, he does not think of himself at all. I am not so brave and unselfish. When I was with Harry he tried to brace me up by telling me that "now was the time to put into practice my good old Presbyterian doctrines."

I am writing all this in a spirit of indignation over the effort of Congressmen to use our noble volunteers to save their shirkers, and to show that my boys are just as much to this mother—and Heaven knows no mother could ever recoil from the horror and dangers of this barbarous war more than I—yet I know that my fathers never shirked in the days of the persecution of the Covenanters; they fought for liberty in the days of the Revolution; they were loyal to the flag that "went down in defeat but in glory" in the sixties, and now I am thankful these boys are the "brave sons of noble sires." They will not have to be conscripted. It is a shame that conscription has to come, yet it is the only just course. The only safe one.

Yours, very sincerely, RUTH B. SLACK.

During the reading of the letter the following occurred:

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will ask the Clerk to finish the letter.

Mr. DECKER. How old are these boys?

Mr. ADAMSON. They have already volunteered, both of them. The mother thinks the sons of other mothers ought to be taken, too.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman spoke feelingly and eloquently, as he always does, on the subject of universal responsibility, of universal liability to service. Does the gentleman think that those splendid principles which we all approve are exemplified by the administration, the War Department's proposition, to lay the entire burden of this great war on boys from 19 to 25, and draft them, and them alone?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall not undertake to discuss the details of this bill. [Laughter.] I do not hesitate to say that the young men are best suited, and first to be called on for service—"old men for counsel, young men for war." I trust the military experts who have studied the military history of this and other ages to advise us as to the details, and the Military Committee has studied that out. I am simply discussing the difference between the administration proposition and the proposition to insist on the volunteer experiment to delay the organization of an army needed as soon as possible. And I want to say further, Mr. Chairman, that if gentlemen will analyze the pressure upon them closely they will find that the pressure for the volunteer system comes more largely from those who do not want to go to the war than from those who would volunteer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia to print the balance of the letter in the RECORD? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMSON. I thank the gentleman from California for his courtesy and the committee for its consideration and attention.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, as I am one of the eight men, members of the Committee on Military Affairs, who joined in the minority report, I feel that, whatever may have been the traditions of ancient days that qualified men for such an honor in old Rome, I, too, in this twentieth century have become one of the "Conscript Fathers." I suggest that, not for the apparent flippancy of the remark, but for the opportunity it gives me to remind our friends who are laying so much stress upon the opprobrium that is supposed to be attached to the old word "conscript," that that word in its ancient, pure estate was a title of respect and dignity.

Every man in old Rome qualified to bear arms was under the universal obligation to military service, and every man qualified to serve the State in any other capacity of great usefulness was under equal obligation to perform that service when the State demanded it. And it was deemed among the Romans in those days to be a distinction beyond price to have the State reach down upon any man, deeming him to be qualified for exceeding great usefulness, and conscript him to his post of duty.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. What happened to Rome? [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will remind the gentleman that several centuries of freedom and greatness happened to Rome between that day and the day when she fell from her high estate. The gentleman also will remember that in part of that lesson we learned of those centuries that, instead of great devotion to military standards, corruption, vice, elegance, ease, frivolity, loose pastimes, luxury, and sluggishness swept over Rome, and——

Mr. GORDON. Rome lost her conscripted army in the German forests. That is what happened to her. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then we had better go against them there and find them and see what we can get. [Applause.]

I realize that approaching the subject at this time, after having given it much detailed attention, as men on the committee in charge of this work must do, it is useless to come here on the floor in general debate and in a few minutes attempt to do justice to the opinions and convictions by which one may have endeavored to fortify his position. We all know how much we would like to prepare something like a lawyer's brief, anticipating every move that the opposition might make, and trying to close up the door against it; but we all know, at least those of us who have had much experience on this floor, that it would not be long before the patience of the Members would cease to be a virtue. And I may add, by way of parenthesis, that few men who have been on this floor many years ever expect to convince many of their colleagues or to win many votes in general debate. So I am only going to try, as briefly as I may, to sketch, as I may say in the passing phrase of the day, some of the "high places" that have induced me to come to the position where I now expect to stand to the end.

I am opposed to the proposition of the majority of the committee to substitute for the general plan of selective conscription for the main body of what we may well call the citizen's war army one more resort to the old time-worn trial of the volunteer plan, and I call your attention to the fact that this really is the crux of our debate to-day and this week on this bill. There are details that must be established in the administration of any law whether we decide now to adopt the conscriptive system from the start or whether we intend to use the substitution that has been proposed as the first makeshift by our friends on the majority side. But whichever way we decide, whatever principle we adopt, those details will have to be shaped afterwards in the bill in order that the law may be safely and satisfactorily administered. So I will not, I hope, offend your own sense of what are your own duties, and I will not seem to underrate your own experience in these matters, if I suggest that throughout this debate this afternoon many of our friends have been dwelling with particular emphasis, sometimes with extravagant emphasis, upon details, and details only, very carefully avoiding that main principle which is at issue before the Committee of the Whole. And inasmuch as this is a military bill I may suggest to you in military phrase that perhaps those friends of ours, beneath this scrupulous attention, this religious devotion to detail, are only masking the artillery that they hope to bring to bear against the main principle which is at stake. [Applause.]

You know it is an old, old proposition in our experience, and it has been introduced into something like a colloquial axiom that many men—perhaps we ourselves on occasion—are so troubled with what might be called an astigmatism of the imagination that they are able to discern with almost microscopic clearness the fly on a barn door, but they never see the door that the poor old fly rests on, never. So that perhaps some of the emphasis that has been laid upon some of these details as to who shall be exempted and how old these soldier boys may be, and all that sort of thing, are things that are perhaps not at all in dispute between this minority report and the majority report and do not affect the principle which has been raised here.

You will notice that our friends on the majority, in bringing out this bill, propose this substitution of the volunteering principle as far as it will work, and are very careful to guard their bill so that if it fails to work, or in the judgment of the President shows signs of failing to work, then shall there be brought into effect the last power of this conscriptive authority of the Government. I want to say—and I appeal to your own sense of logic as to whether I may be justified in saying it or not—that I am opposed to going into a war in this great emergency on the proposition of raising half of our Army conditioned on the failure to raise the other half. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. Then is the gentleman opposed to that feature of the bill which authorizes the volunteer system in the Regular Army and the National Guard in order to build them up to war strength?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Absolutely not; and for reasons which I think are equally logical. The Regular Army and the National Guard are existing institutions. They have been with us for over a hundred years, and the law and the policy of the country have always been that with regard to those institutions men are at liberty to choose whether they will go into them or not, and this bill does not grant any extra authority in regard to that. On the contrary, this bill simply recognizes existing law. In the case of the Regular Army, the service in its ranks is looked upon as a life work, an occupation, a profession, and the law allows a man in civil life to elect whether he will adopt the Regular Army for his profession or occupation; and he does that voluntarily, as he goes into any other occupation or profession. In the National Guard, which, through the process of years and by the operation of statutes, has come to have something like a quasi professional status in the military world, we still employ exactly that same policy. If in the days of peace a young man wants to devote a part of his lifetime to special military studies and experience, then he may do so voluntarily in established units which this Government provides for that purpose.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Is not the volunteer system just as old as the National Guard?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Exactly. It is probably a great deal older, but I do not see what that proves.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman wants the National Guard to retain its volunteer feature because it is an old organization.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; I said the National Guard was recognized by our Government, and has been in existence ever since its inception as a part of what we may call the established military force of the Government, in peace as well as war.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. So has the volunteer system.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no; the volunteer system only springs into existence in war emergency.

I realize, as you all do, that I must dwell briefly on what I hope to suggest to you, even if I do not persuade you by the suggestion of it. I think the fundamental proposition involved here is the very same fundamental upon which depends the continuity of our Government. Its philosophy, its form of operation, and the theory under which it is administered are so simple that all of us must get in agreement upon it. It is that the relation of the citizen to the State is that of a party to a bilateral contract. If he enjoys from his Government protection and security in his life, limb, and property, and his liberty, as he goes about every day in his ordinary peaceful employments, he is under the reciprocal obligation of maintaining the power that so protects him. We all agree to that. We agree that that is the larger part perhaps of our theory of a republican democracy. Therefore if we all start out, as we do by common consent, on the theory that every man owes to his Government the sacrifice of his life if need be to preserve and maintain in peace or in war the very power that preserves and maintains him, why should not every man in time of national stress and emergency be liable to come into the Army and defend his country? And if he is unwilling to perform his part of that obligation, why should he not be compelled by that Government to come in? [Applause.] Where does the logic lie that a man who rests upon the Government's obligation in this bilateral contract may have his option to volunteer whether he will perform his part of the contract when his Government is assailed in war? What is the logic of such a situation? How can it be defended? It seems to me—and it is for this reason that I am willing to support the idea of what in the terms of this bill is called selective conscription—it seems to me that the only truly democratic way to raise an army for the defense of the country in time of war is by such form of law and its administration as most nearly distributes equally the burden of military duty and of sacrifice upon the greatest number of people who are to benefit by the victory.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will if the gentleman will have regard for my time.

Mr. MONDELL. I very greatly approve the patriotic sentiment the gentleman has just expressed, but I would suggest that that patriotic sentiment is not carried out in the plan which I understand the gentleman supports, the plan of the War Department to lay the burden of this entire war on boys from 19 to 25 years old.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit me to make one statement?

Mr. MONDELL. Is not that the War Department's plan?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Let me make just one answer——

Mr. MONDELL. Is not that the plan approved by the President?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Let me make one suggestion, and let me also keep my part of the floor. I realize what it means to get into a colloquy with the gentleman from Wyoming, and I do want to save the last 15 minutes of my time if I can. I say that in no disrespectful way; but when one engages in colloquy with the nimble-minded gentleman from Wyoming one must be ever on the alert to maintain both the floor and his head at the same time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Vermont is very nimble minded——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I would rather have the time than the bouquets. [Laughter.] Now, let me suggest to the gentleman that the principle of universal obligation to military duty is not prejudiced because only a part of the men so liable are taken for some occasions. They may be taken in any number of groups, in any number of ways. It is obvious to any practical man that if there are, for instance, in this country, say, 10,000,000 upon whom rests this obligation to military duty, we would not take all of the 10,000,000 at once, and each one of the different groups of men who were excluded might equally say, as the gentleman from Wyoming does, by inference at least, "This is not universal military service."

Mr. MONDELL. But the gentleman predicates his argument on the proposition of general obligation to service and spreading the obligation among the people, but what he proposes——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not appear to be having the opportunity to make any argument at all just at present.

Mr. MONDELL. What the gentleman proposes to do is to put the obligation and the burden entirely upon boys and very young men. The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman were as well informed on this bill as he is on Scripture, he would find that the ages of 19 to 25 are not in this bill. The ages in this bill are from 21 to 40.

Mr. MONDELL. Are not the ages from 19 to 25 in the administration bill?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is not before us for consideration, and the gentleman is out of order. The gentleman's amendment is not germane. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I can not yield further. I hope the gentleman will realize how fast the sands of my time are running out.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if the obligation does not rest upon boys between 19 and 25, what are the limitations his colleagues have in mind?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I know of no limit except that all men that receive the benefit of Government shall maintain and defend their country in time of war.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am in favor of that.

Now, it seems to me that if we are to stand by what we call democratic principles in time of peace, the general philosophy of distributing all the obligations that the Government imposes upon its citizens shall also prevail in time of war when the very structure of our Government may be ruined and may perish. Why is not the obligation to serve the country then as it is now? If we are to go into a world war on the idea that may be in the minds of some of us, that we are thereby to make it safe for democracy to exist, why ought not we to go in with our full strength of a truly democratic army? Why do we only ask those who are willing to sacrifice for democracy to go in and win for the slacker and the shirker the fruits and benefits of democracy? Is that distributing the burden equally and fairly among all men?

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman recognize that all of our citizens can not be put in the Army; that it is different from taxes? We can all pay taxes, but we can not all be in the Army, so the argument of everybody serving falls to the ground.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; it does not fall to the ground. The power and forces of maintaining an army are not all in the field. There are others quite as important to the success of the Army as the men in the trenches with rifles.

I want to suggest one thing more about the volunteer system. There has been so much said on this subject that I realize I am touching no new chord and can not bring any new suggestions to your minds. But the volunteer system, as has been said over and again, makes its first appeal to and only brings out those men—to use an elegant term about it—of the finer spirit, these men with the chivalrous temperament, these men inspired by a little bit more of the devotion of self-sacrifice, men who are willing to acknowledge their duty and go to war without compulsion.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I would like to get in one or two of my thoughts on the floor. [Laughter.] I regret that I can not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. I wanted to bring out one of the gentleman's thoughts.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not wish to be discourteous, but I have already yielded too much.

It is argued that the volunteer system calls out the finer and braver spirits and has a moral effect. If we start out with the volunteer system, it may bring out the moral effect, but when we start conscription the very fact that the volunteer system had the moral effect stamps the conscripts by way of contrast as an army of skulkers and cowards. The very act that separates these men by giving the volunteers the first chance means that the men who do not take the first chance will therefore be grouped as "conscripts."

Now, there are some other thoughts that I had sketched out as some points to dwell upon, but those have been touched upon or dwelt upon by those who preceded me, and it is equally apparent to my hearers that I have been somewhat sidetracked from an attempt to cover them all.

There is one phase of the so-called conscript army that has a tremendous moral effect, apart from the suggestion that has been made, and that is that, while the volunteer system brings out the finer spirit, men who make some sacrifice, it brings out the venturesome spirit. It is not fair to say that every man who volunteers goes from a disinterested motive. It is true also that the venturesome and reckless, daring soldier comes in. But it is not fair to say that every man who does not volunteer in the first instance is a slacker or a shirker. There are men who are deliberate, who are not without courage, splendid men with good intentions, and they may only be waiting for a second call; they may think that the country does not need them so soon; they may have duties at home that are more compelling. But when these men are swept into a conscript army they have no chance to stand in any such attitude before the country.

Whereas, if all men are brought together in this democratic equality of a selective conscription, a citizen war army, then the man who is chivalrous enough to volunteer for any motive, then the man who may have hesitated somewhat from good conscientious motives before he volunteers, will be in there side by side upon equal terms.

And then there is another man. There is the man to be found in every army in this country through every generation of our history who, before he went in, may not have been quite as high spirited, quite as fine tempered, keen, up to what you and I think the higher standards of life and living and its outlook, but a man who, after a career in the ranks, the Army has absolutely made over. Many a man would be drawn into the conscript army, reluctantly, going with some timidity, perhaps with a little resentment, who would find himself shoulder to shoulder and side by side in the service with some of the bravest and best in the land, and who would find that he, too, had begun perhaps for the first time to recognize and realize his own self-respect. That is an accomplishment in the democratic army which you can not hope to get in any other way in the service.

It is said the patriot who is willing to volunteer is the man who will be humiliated by being put into a conscript army. My answer to that is that such a proposition does not do justice to his patriotic good intentions. If a man is such a patriot, if he is willing to risk his life for his country, if he is willing to sacrifice his life for his country, then he is a good enough patriot to serve in any army that his country raises for him to serve in and do his best for his country in any army where his country thinks he can do his best. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I had hoped, if I had not been interrupted, to dwell with some particularity upon one phase of this question, which now I can only barely suggest to you. If we start upon the plan of general volunteering we are going to be met face to face at the very outset, as we are now, by insidious and sometimes open and avowed influences that are determined to hinder, embarrass, and perhaps stop that enlistment or volunteering on every possible occasion, and you and I know it. I have roughly grouped them for the purposes of this suggestion into these five classes: People who are opposed to all wars; people who are opposed to this war; people who prefer to finance our allies rather than send men to fight—and those are the people whose souls are bound between the calfskin ledgers of the counting house; those are the people who think that if we can delay and fritter with this thing long enough to send a few dollars over across the water the war will be over before we get into it, and they are willing to risk the money rather than men in expectation of securing greater gains at home. Then there are the timid folks, who hope the war will be over before we have a chance to send their boys across the water—honestly timid, honestly conservative, struggling a little with conscience, perhaps, but meaning well; and they hope Providence will intervene with some miracle that will bring the war to a close before their boys will have to go, and they will help Providence all they can, even with their prayers. Then there is the fifth group, who are the out-and-out alien enemies.

I know it is urged that people of German birth or descent may be under some suspicion of disloyalty in this great crisis. I do not believe it. I know that they have a right to cherish affectionate sentiments for the fatherland, but I prefer to believe that every one of them, of the old settled stock, the men and women whom you and I know, are devoted to the flag of the new country where they have made their home, and that they will not be with the elements of disloyalty. But it is also urged right in this connection that we ought not to compel the man of German blood to fight against his fatherland, we ought to respect his tender sentiment and affectionate remembrance of the land across the Rhine.

I will remind such people when they say those things that hardly had this little British colony of ours, more than a hundred years ago, got out of its swaddling clothes before men and women of British blood, in order to make this the land of the free and the home of the brave, looked their own fathers and brothers in the eye as they came over in red coats from the old homeland of England and pulled the triggers of their old flintlocks in their faces. And this in two wars—that of 1776 and 1812. All of the affectionate remembrances of the old land were with them, to be sure; but they were first, last, and all the time Americans. What men in America have done in the days past to make this a land of the free and a home of the brave I believe the men of America are willing to do to-day.

I had hoped to spend some time——

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I hould prefer not to yield to my comrade unless the gentleman from California can give me about three minutes more.

Mr. KAHN. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DYER. I heartily agree with the gentleman's address, but I wanted to ask the gentleman if he was going to argue the question whether or not he would differentiate between German blood going to Europe and fighting and the colonists fighting the British when they invaded this country?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no; I do not think the principle of national loyalty is circumscribed by any compass on the map. I do not determine men's loyalty by the place they occupy on the map, and I do not in this instance.

I think there are philosophic propositions—to use a much abused word—involved in this war which enter more into the spirit of reasoning than that of technical details, because, while we men here must contrive these practical things without which war can not be waged to any conclusion at all except one of disaster, still underneath this duty which falls to us we must consider the spirit in which the people behind us are apt to look at this thing.

If they do not see it in all its fullness now, they certainly will as the years gather and history is written, and men know what that history means. I think we have arrived at a crisis in this country, a very serious one, besides that of bloodshed and battle fields. Our participation in this world war is not to be so much a test of our American institutions as it will be a test of the character of American citizenship and democratic fellowship that has been developed under them. And that is a serious proposition. We want to remember that the habits of a lifetime of American ease of living, the ambitions and spirit of a liberty-loving people who like to debate just exactly what liberty means and how they were going to stand for it and how they were going to accomplish it and what they were going to do with it; people who for generations have passed their time in most elegant, fine, high inspiring, uplifting, academic discussions of what those principles were—are now thrust for the first time in half a century to a test of all the ideals, of all the theories, of all the academic opinions that this half a century has brought out. We find that, notwithstanding that for the last many years a propaganda has been afloat in this country of ours that war was a thing that was done and passed, nations would beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks—we find that all at once we are face to face with the most terrible war in history. Now is the time when we again must stand sponsors for the civilization that we have been boasting about so much, and must prepare in a most practical, thorough, and realistic way for the preservation of that civilization. The first thing for us to do, we who have been so accustomed to the use of words and fine uplifting phrases and hairsplitting debate, is to see that the day has gone by for discussion and argument and that the time has come for action. Civilization has come to a place where, as it does in these dreadful epochs every now and then in the history of the world, it seems that no further progress can be made. It is time for us to find out who among us are Americans, and when we have done that we have settled one great problem. If we have any easy dreams about the objective of this world war, if we have any idealistic principles, if we have been swept off our feet by any conjectures or what-not, there is at least one practical thing we can agree upon and it is this: That, if by bringing the men and women of America together in this crisis in support of one great democratic army to fight for our principles and our dignity we do actually nationalize all us Americans, this war will be worth all it costs. [Applause.]

The Civil War, terrible struggle that it was, settled for all time the principle of the indissolubility of this Union of the States. But it did not make a Nation of us in the last sense, in the sense that we were thenceforth to be a homogeneous people with one altogether distinctive national idealism and one in our manner of making that idealism reflected as much as might be in practical everyday life and living.

Now, for the first time in about 20 years men will be assembled in a great war army of the United States, men of all kinds of nursery and cradle inheritances, because, as you know, my friends, there has been a wonderful inpouring of all the races and tribes of men to this land since the Civil War. For the first time in such a democratic army as we should raise from selective conscription these men will be assembled in the ranks together. They will learn that mystic fellowship that is embraced in the word "comrade," and when they are mustered out those men will go down through all the walks of peace to the end of the days of their generation as American citizens beyond a doubt. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I would like to borrow just one doctrine from the Turk. Wherever the man of Moslem faith may go, once in every 24 hours he spreads his prayer rug and turns his face toward Mecca and breathes a prayer for the faith that is in him. I would like to see every boy in America brought up to emulate that Moslem doctrine in this one particular—that every day, once in every 24 hours, every boy in America in fancy, in his mind's chapel, would spread his prayer rug, turn his eyes toward Old Glory, and rededicate himself to the principles for which it stands. [Applause.]

In conclusion, let me suggest that now to us here to-day down through more than a century come the words of Nelson, which during that century have been readapted to suit American ears, words that have wonderful significance at this time, and words that are directly applicable to the issue before this House to-day: "America expects not merely volunteers but every man to do his duty." [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I come from a State where the people love France with a passionate love. One-half our male population would gladly help France in her struggle. War to me is abhorrent. The thought of war is repulsive. I have deep and earnest convictions against war. So earnestly do I hold these convictions that for nearly three years I have done everything in my power to keep our country at peace. I have delivered public addresses from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific in the interest of peace and in opposition to war. I have believed that the battles of the Christian civilizations of this century would be fought not with shot and shell but by higher and more Christ-like forces—by living rightly and dealing justly but courageously with our fellow man. I have believed sincerely that no country in the world was our enemy or wanted war with us. I craved the opportunity for my country to rise above other peoples of earth and become the mightiest factor in all the world in bringing into realization the peace on earth and good will toward men that would endure forever. I believed this opportunity was real and promised to be realized.

There came a day, however, when war was inevitable. There was no honorable escape; and I now believe that even if it were possible for Americans to consider the idea, that dishonorable escape was impossible. I for one have been forced to believe that the German Kaiser—thank God, not the German people—has his avaricious eye upon the vast stores of wealth in the United States and that he has expected to make this country pay the cost of his barbarous war—a war of monarchical greed, waged senselessly and relentlessly upon the democracies of the world. [Applause.]

The entrance of the United States into this world war was a momentous hour. It has had a powerful moral effect upon the side of democracy, but that effect is lost if there be wavering, doubt, or delay on the part of this Congress. The United States must now strike the blow to end the war. We must act with a man's courage in doing a man's part. We must convince Germany and her associates that the United States Government will brook no delay in preparing this Government for defense against aggression and to hurl her powerful forces against tyranny and barbarism.

In times of peace I am opposed to centralized governments; but two generals can not direct a war. There must be one head, and under our form of government that head is the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, the President of the United States. I have loyally supported him in peace, and regardless of my personal fortunes I shall support him now. The hour has come when petty matters must be forgotten, when personal and political fortunes must be put aside, when men of world-sized caliber are needed to handle this world war—men who pray, think, and act only for America. [Applause.]

I have always been and am now opposed to militarism, but country's honor and the future liberty of our people that delay is too dangerous to be considered. The time is at hand for America to stand erect and strike down her foe. Sentimentality, personal politics, and individual quibbling must be subordinated to the larger duty we owe our country. [Applause.]

Under existing law the President is authorized to raise, under the volunteer system, the Regular Army to the maximum war strength of 293,000 men. He is also authorized to raise, under the volunteer system, the National Guard to its full strength of 329,954 men, making a total of 622,954 men raised under the volunteer system, the largest Volunteer Army ever before raised by this Nation.

Both the Regular Army and the National Guard are at present far below their war strength. The National Guard at present offers opportunity for 206,349 men to volunteer. The Regular Army gives additional opportunity for 161,519 men to volunteer. Under existing law the way is open for 367,868 men to volunteer in the Regular Army and the National Guard. When the President's plan is enacted into law the opportunity will be offered for 724,718 men to volunteer. The above does not include the demand for additional volunteers in the Navy and Marine Corps.

To supplement the organizations of the Regular Army and the National Guard, the President proposes, through the Senate bill, to raise by selective draft an additional force of 500,000 men. The House bill proposes to extend the volunteer system for a limited time, for experiment, to this additional force of 500,000 men. It is estimated by Army experts that to raise 500,000 men by the volunteer system would require that at least 2,000,000 men must volunteer. It must be obvious that the emergency is too great and imperative to permit of such delay, in view of the fact that large opportunities are already offered for volunteers in the National Guard and the Regular Army.

The idea of the House bill was born in politics, that of the Senate bill was conceived in statesmanship. The one stands for petty politics, the other for national service. In the one armies are officered for personal and political ends, in the other for efficiency. [Great applause.]

The House bill proposes to give a short time for men to volunteer. When the time passes, as it undoubtedly would, without the required additional 500,000 men, then for a man to have had the opportunity to volunteer and later to be drafted will be considered a dishonorable conscription, whereas, if the President's recommendations are immediately enacted into law, this army of 500,000 men will be scientifically organized from the beginning, and there is no dishonor or humiliation attached to enlistment. [Applause.]

The House bill is a mere pretense. It is not sincere. It undertakes to shift the responsibility from the Congress to the President. To vote for this preliminary sham, knowing at the time that it is not possible to be effective, and knowing, too, that this is exactly what the German Kaiser would have us do, and then say we did the best we could for a volunteer army will not fool the American people. Let us not go before the world with a divided front. Let us act, without quibble or delay, in support of our Commander in Chief, not only because he is our leader but because he is right. Let the world now know that the Congress and the American people are standing solidly behind the President with a courage that makes failure impossible.

The House bill offers a system unscientific and undemocratic, tried and found ineffective in our Civil War, tested and found useless by the warring nations of Europe, a system that in all great emergencies has led the soldiers, though brave and patriotic but untrained, only to certain slaughter and disaster. [Applause.]

No one honors the brave and heroic volunteer soldier more than I. The most glorious achievements in all the world have been accomplished by the volunteer soldier. He is and always will be the best and bravest soldier. No one on this side would take one wreath from his noble brow. It requires dauntless courage and heroism for the volunteer soldier to meet the usual hunger, hardships, danger, disease, and death in camp life, march, and battle, made necessary by the unscientific and conglomerate organization of his army. To relieve the soldier from these hardships and sufferings, by organizing his army scientifically and by maintaining our productive industries at home, is the purpose of the selective draft system. War a half century ago was vastly different from the scientific organizations, use of modern machinery, and operations of battle lines to-day. To meet the new conditions is the object of the President's plan. It is not to discredit the volunteer soldier, but to save him from needless sacrifice.

The Senate bill will make for the right kind of democracy. It will apply to all races, to all nationalities, to all sections, and equally to rich and poor. No longer can the rich bring on war, then have others do the fighting. Equal service will be demanded.

No boy should be sent to the Army until he passes the age of 21 years. It is morally and economically wrong to send our boys to war before they are permitted to receive proper educational advantages.

Under the House bill, if the war continues several years, whole communities would be depopulated of men, while other communities less responsive would be undisturbed. Under the selective-draft method no community and no industry will be prostrated by taking all the men away. The President is authorized to preserve our industries, to exempt those who have dependent families and the men who are really doing the needed work of the country. The farmers who are actively engaged in producing the necessary food products and other raw materials to sustain our people, under the provisions of the selective-draft bill, may be exempt; while the loafers, the hangers-on, around the street corners in our towns and cities will either be sent to wholesome productive labor or will be sent to the front. No longer will the flower of our young manhood who are inspired by noble and patriotic motives and who have consciences that move them to respond to their country's call be forced to bear alone the brunt of battle, while many of the irresponsible, unreliable, and less useful, though physically able, remain at home. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is not a local skirmish. It is a world war on a world scale. In this perilous hour and in defense of this Nation's honor, in the cause of real democracy and in behalf of common justice, I shall support the President's plan and I am ready to give my life, my all, to my country, God, and humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow and that general debate on the bill pending before the House to-day be continued under the same agreement, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to control one half of the time and I to control the other half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow and that general debate continue under the same conditions as to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it the intention of the gentleman from Alabama as far as possible to aid us in having separate yea-and-nay votes on these two propositions?

Mr. DENT. On the two propositions?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes; that is, on the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. DENT. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts I do not see how that can be prevented.

Mr. GARDNER. It can be very well prevented, if defeated in the Committee of the Whole, by a motion to recommit being made by somebody hostile to the whole bill.

Mr. DENT. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to a separate yea-and-nay vote on those propositions.

Mr. GARDNER. I felt sure the gentleman would support the idea; but I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to the fact, that if, for instance, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] or some other gentleman should claim the right to make the motion to recommit and on that move the previous question, the test vote would come on the previous question, which is not so strong as on the main question itself. I know the gentleman's motives are the fairest in the world, but I do not think everybody in the House had thought of that fact, and I thought it would be well to bear it in mind.

Mr. DENT. I am glad the gentleman has called my attention to that. I had not thought of it at all. So far as I am concerned, I have no disposition in the world to do anything of the kind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that under the circumstances of the case it might be proper to ask for a general leave to print. A number of gentlemen have spoken of that.

Mr. DENT. Then I ask for that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to its going over until to-morrow. Several gentlemen who have spoken to-day desire leave to extend their remarks. That is the reason why I mentioned it.

Mr. DENT. I ask unanimous consent, then, Mr. Speaker, that each Member who has addressed himself to this subject——

Mr. MANN. Make it all Members.

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; make it universal for 10 days.

Mr. DENT. That every Member may have the right to extend his remarks within 10 legislative days after the conclusion of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all Members shall have leave to print remarks on this bill within 10 legislative days after the conclusion of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. EMERSON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. EMERSON. I rise to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article concerning an ex-Member of the House, Mr. Ricketts, of Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the conference report on the emergency bond issue.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the conference report on the bond-issue bill. Is there objection?

Mr. DENT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I did not understand that request.

Mr. MANN. It is on the conference report on the emergency-bond bill.

Mr. DENT. Very well.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the location of the Government armor-plate plant.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. LANGLEY. Reserving the right to object, the site has already been selected, has it not? The gentleman does not want to change the location, does he? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a patriotic resolution passed by citizens at a mass meeting at Kalamazoo, Mich.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 1771. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to the Fleet Naval Reserve;

H. R. 2008. An act to provide for the extension of minority enlistments in the naval service;

H. R. 2338. An act to authorize the detail of additional officers to the Hydrographic Office;

H. R. 2339. An act to increase the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy until September 1, 1918;

H. R. 2340. An act to increase the age limit for persons appointed as officers in the Naval Reserve; and

H. R. 2762. An act to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order previously made, until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 24, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting communication of the chief of the Division of Public Moneys, Office of Secretary of the Treasury, submitting proposed clause of legislation for incorporation in a deficiency bill (H. Doc. No. 48); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of the Interior submitting estimates of appropriations for salaries, mechanical labor, char and watch forces, for the new Interior Department Building from April 15 to June 30, 1917, inclusive (H. Doc. No. 49); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for repairs to buildings, etc. (H. Doc. No. 50); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Public Printer submitting additional estimates of appropriations for salaries and general expenses, office of the superintendent of documents, for the fiscal year 1918, and deficiencies for the fiscal year 1917 (H. Doc. No. 51); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation under "Ordnance and ordnance stores," special naval appropriation bill (H. Doc. No. 52); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Indian River Inlet, Del. (H. Doc. No. 53); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and plan and estimate of cost of improvement of Seattle Harbor, Wash., with a view to the maintenance of the east and west waterways and deepening and straightening the lower Duwanish River (H. Doc. No. 54); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

8. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, resubmitting certain estimates of appropriation for the service of the Department of Commerce for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 55); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

9. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting draft of proposed joint resolution relative to suspension of provision of section 355 of the Revised Statutes requiring cession of jurisdiction by a State over lands acquired therein by the United States (H. Doc. No. 56); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 17), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ESCH, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 328) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, in respect of car service, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 18), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LONERGAN: A bill (H. R. 3634) appropriating money for the improvement of the Connecticut River between Long Island Sound and Hartford, Conn.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. VAN DYKE: A bill (H. R. 3635) fixing the rate of pay of compositors and bookbinders in the Government Printing Office; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. EMERSON: A bill (H. R. 3636) to authorize the President of the United States to draft into the agricultural service of the Nation persons not liable to military service; to the Committee on Agriculaure.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 24, 1917.

(Legislative day of Monday, April 23, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the following communication:

The Secretary read as follows:

AUSTIN, TEX., April 23, 1917.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Vice President United States, Washington, D. C.:

The Texas Senate has to-day adopted simple resolution No. 12, introduced by Senators Robbins and Lattimore, the text of which follows:

"Whereas the National Congress is to-day considering the best plan of meeting the needs of this world crisis as it calls upon America: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the Texas Senate, heartily indorse the President's plan of selective universal military service and urge our Representatives to vote for the same and that a copy of this resolution be wired by the secretary of the Texas Senate to the President of the National Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives at Washington."

It is the request of the Texas Senate that this resolution be presented to the United States Senate.

Very truly, yours, JOHN D. MCCALL,
Secretary of Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	McLean	Simmons
Beckham	Hollis	Martin	Smith, Ariz.
Brady	Husting	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Calder	James	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smoot
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Sutherland
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Swanson
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Page	Thomas
Curtis	Kellogg	Penrose	Trammell

France	Knox	Pomerene	Warren
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Ransdell	Watson
Gallinger	Lodge	Saulsbury	Williams
Hale	McCumber	Sheppard	Wolcott
Hardwick	McKellar	Sherman

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LANE] is detained from the Senate by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to state that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] are detained on official business in connection with the work of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

I wish also to state that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] is detained by illness in his family.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], who is detained on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. JAMES. I wish to state that the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] is detained from the Senate on account of serious illness.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask leave to offer an amendment to the pending bill that it may be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator from Colorado has kindly yielded to me for a moment. I send to the desk a paper signed by the president and faculty of the University of Virginia. It consists of only about a dozen lines, and I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA,
Jefferson's Birthday, 1917.

To the honorable Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: We, the undersigned administrative officers, professors, instructors, and assistants of the University of Virginia, being firmly of the opinion that the American soldiers to be enlisted for the war against Prussianism should be chosen, as President Wilson advises, "upon the principle of universal liability to service," and being convinced that the vast majority of the young men enrolled as students at this institution believe in this principle, do hereby respectfully but strongly urge the Congress of the United States to vote promptly for the same as embodied in the Army bill indorsed by the administration. We emphatically believe that the choice of soldiers by selective draft is not only the most practicable method but also the most democratic and the most just.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to have inserted in the RECORD without reading a memorial which comes from citizens of Holmes County, Miss., indorsing the administration program of preparation for war.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOLMES COUNTY'S MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS.

The people of Holmes County, Miss., assembled in mass convention, fully realizing the gravity of our situation and the magnitude of the war into which we have been forced by the acts of war committed against our people and Nation, and being earnestly desirous of having our country do what is necessary to obtain a just and lasting peace at the earliest practicable time, and with the least sacrifice of blood—a peace that can only be obtained by a victory in war—we respectfully and earnestly make the following expression of our views and wishes to the United States Congress, and more especially to our two Senators and our Representative:

Undivided military leadership and responsibility is essential to military success. Under our Constitution and the voice of our people President Woodrow Wilson is our Chief Executive and the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy. With his expert military advisers and the present war experience of the world he is better qualified to determine what men, organizations, equipment, and measures are required for our Army than any other man, in or out of Congress. The administration Army bill, now before the House and Senate, prepared by military experts, and having the hearty approval of the President and the unanimous indorsement of our military and naval officers, should be promptly passed as submitted. Divided leadership means deplorable weakness. The chief element of strength of the Teutonic allies, making them a menace to the liberty and peace of the world, is the absolute control of everything touching the military vested in the Kaiser. Our only hope of success and that of the liberty loving part of the world is complete mobilization of the military resources of our own country and of each of its associates, and thus defeat German efficiency by greater opposing efficiency, suspending for the time such of our rights as may conflict with military efficiency in order that liberty may hereafter prevail throughout the world, and forever.

Unreservedly do we commend President Wilson's definition of a country's call for its soldiery, embodied in the bill mentioned, "the principle of the selective draft, in short, has at its heart this idea: That there is a universal obligation to serve and that public authority should choose those upon whom the obligation of military service shall rest, and also in a sense choose who shall do the rest of the nation's work."

The call to colors, term it what you will, should be clear, direct, and imperative, and, upon all, within our national limits, coming within its requirements without reference to wealth, class, or color. By this means, and through military selection of each man intrusted with a responsible position in connection with the national army, politics, patronage, and pelf could be eliminated and military efficiency assured. Our Teutonic enemies are watching our every move and governing themselves accordingly. The moral effect of enlisting, training, organizing, and equipping an army of 2,000,000 men in accordance with expert military judgment would be immeasurable and might force peace before our Army fired a gun. A national volunteer army might involve, as did that of the Spanish-American War, much inefficiency and the filling of some military commands and of nearly all the positions intrusted with the distribution of food and medicine for man and horse with incompetent men, with the result, as it was then, that men and horses suffered for food and medicine, which the Government had amply provided, but its distribution was blocked by incompetency. Negroes constitute about 60 per cent of our population. To call upon the 40 per cent of white people to provide our State's quota based on its whole population is absolutely unjust and wholly unreasonable. The negroes should be compelled, if necessary, to contribute their own quota. Under proper military training they would make as good soldiers. Certainly no such hardships and sacrifices as would be involved in exempting them should be thrown upon the white people of our State, nor of any other State, and would be indefensible. Let every race and class supply its own soldiery, and we shall gladly supply ours.

E. F. VOEL, Chairman.

Speech of Mr. Thomas, begun Monday, April 23.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in a flood of letters and telegrams with which I have been deluged from advocates of this bill I have found one dominant note. It is "Support the President," a sentiment which I most cordially indorse, and one which I have endeavored since March, 1913, steadfastly to observe. In an humble way I am partly responsible for his election and his reelection. It has been both a duty and a labor of love to support him, but I have not always been able to reconcile my own views of public duty with those of the administration. When that has been so, I have reluctantly but generally followed the dictates of my own judgment. That is the only way I can be of service to any administration. Therefore, until I am more enlightened that path I must continue to pursue.

I have never been a pacifist, although I have that horror of war which is inspired by humane sentiment and by actual contact and experience with its miseries and its brutalities. I have felt, ever since the President's ultimatum to Germany about a year ago, that war with that great military people was unavoidable. I thought at the time of its announcement that unless the war ended and ended soon with the defeat of the central empires, noncompliance with that ultimatum would sooner or later manifest itself. So when the breach came I was in a manner prepared for it. I supported the President then, as I shall support now every measure which, in my opinion, is essential to a vigorous and a successful prosecution of the war.

But, Mr. President, men past the meridian of life find it extremely difficult to change the convictions of many years; convictions based not upon impulse but upon careful study, coupled with an earnest desire to ascertain facts and determine essentials. Not even in a great crisis can such convictions be easily shattered or abandoned. Nay, I believe that then, of all times, one should stand by the institutions and the traditions of his country, yielding them only under the spur and stress of undoubted necessity, and keeping in mind at all times that the plea of necessity has been the basis and justification of every intrusion upon the rights and fundamental laws of the Nation.

Of course, I do not wish to be understood as assuming that the principle of compulsory military service, which is embodied in this measure, is beyond our constitutional power to provide. The safety of the public is the supreme law, and whatever is absolutely essential to the preservation of the Government in times of war is within our power and the power of the administration acting by our authority. When the time comes, Mr. President, as it has come to other democracies, and to ours in the past, for the adoption of conscription as the basis of our military system, I shall be as ready to acknowledge the necessity of adopting it, I trust, as any other Member of this body. I am not able to perceive that such a crisis has arrived. I may be mistaken in my conclusion; I may be entirely wrong; the conclusion may be obviously unsound; but it is "mine own," and as such I must be guided by it.

I have supported the President since his inauguration as governor of New Jersey. I supported him when men now calling upon me to do so by voting for conscription were denouncing him as they are now denouncing me. I supported him in his every effort to avoid this war, when obloquy and reproach were his portion, when defense associations and security societies and navy leagues and ex-Presidents were reviling him, and, Mr. President, I shall probably be supporting him when his new friends and champions shall have abandoned their zeal and resumed their weapons of opposition. And I am supporting him in my advocacy of the volunteer system, so closely and honorably associated with the history of the great race to which he and I belong.

Mr. President, opposition to compulsory military service is characteristic of every government fit to be called a democracy. In the long contest between the people and absolutism it was mutually recognized that military power was the basis of despotism, and that until it was curbed and minimized and controlled by the people free government was impossible. You may take the history of the English people, beginning with the day when the first glimmerings of popular liberty were observable in their deliberations, follow its development down through the centuries, and you will find their antagonism to a standing army whose basic foundation is compulsory service. I have not the time to enumerate instances. Suffice it to say that the proposition must be conceded by everyone familiar with the history of the Anglo-Saxon race. It is observable in the struggles of peoples in other countries toward popular government, where their efforts were prevented by the strong arm of military power based upon and supported by compulsory service. Our ancestors finally established popular government by establishing the supremacy of the civil law over military authority. What wonder, then, Mr. President, that democracies abhor that principle of compulsory service the exercise of which menaces and may destroy their liberties? Their apprehensions may be unfounded, but they are inherent in lovers of liberty and therefore ineradicable.

It may be that such old-fashioned notions at this time, when a crisis is said to be at hand and the Constitution itself is said to be suspended, are out of place; that to invoke them will be nothing less than an effort to defeat or at least postpone the enactment of a measure of prime consequence, but I do not believe it. I observed when last week we were defending the liberty of the press we received commendation and applause from its exponents who now assure men like myself that the expression of an honest opinion in even seeming opposition to a measure like this has as its basis either folly or cowardice; but I am getting used to that. During the past two weeks these have been among the mildest epithets, punctuating some of the correspondence voluntarily thrust upon me for consideration. So, I am neither appalled nor deterred by the situation. I merely remind the press that the pending bill, to my mind, is of more importance to the people of the United States than is the press section of the espionage bill considered last week to the journalism of the country, and therefore entitled to the same deliberate and full consideration of the Senate.

In giving my reasons for opposing this bill I shall detain the Senate, Mr. President, no longer than I consider absolutely necessary; but inasmuch as I see, as I think the fathers of this country saw, in its enactment the ultimate supremacy of the military over the civil authorities we had best weigh both sides of the subject very carefully before reaching a final conclusion which may shape the future policy of this country permanently, and it may be disastrously.

I have said, Mr. President, that anticonscription is a democratic principle emphasized by its absence from democratic communities. There are exceptions to all rules. France has the system, as has Switzerland, but the reasons for it are obvious, since they both join the territory of the mightiest military power in the world, a power entirely devoted to militarism, whose boast is that it is a nation that is an army and an army that is a nation. Its known general policy, if not its actual designs, with regard to France and its immense superiority over the little Helvetian Republic have dictated a departure from the democratic principle and the adoption of compulsory military service for self-protection, but the exceptions prove the rule. England abandoned the principle centuries ago. Her people forced the Government to do so. It was finally relinquished, the throne trembling in the balance, with the specter of another Cromwell upon the horizon; and we, the children of the British Isles, bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh, inheriting from our ancestors their antipathy to compulsory service, rejected it utterly, save as an alternative in times of national extremity. Even then its experimental value has proven negligible.

But we are now told that compulsory military service is democratic. Mr. President, that is a libel and a reproach upon the name of democracy. It is as repugnant to democracy as any despotic principle which can be conceived. Call it anything else but that and I may make no protest. You say it is based upon equality. But democracy does not mean equality and that alone. The terms are not interchangeable. If that were so, then I grant you, Mr. President, that a system which imposes the same burden upon the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the black and the white, the Jew and the Gentile, possesses one element of democracy. But the feudal system is democratic upon that reasoning, and slavery as well. Prior to the Civil War every black man was a slave, with here and there an exception, and that exception was subject to the bonds of servitude at any time. In bringing the African here no favorites were played; every black man caught and captured was exported and sold as a slave. Was that democracy?

We might establish, Mr. President, a state system of religion did not the Constitution forbid, and compel every man, woman, and child to observe its tenets under such penalties as disfranchisement, deprivation of goods or personal liberty. Would it be democratic because applying with equal force to all everywhere? To ask that question, Mr. President, is to answer it. Even the submarine war is democratic when measured by that test because its bloody program knows no exceptions. Whether engaged in commerce or to relieve the sick and wounded, whether belligerent or neutral, all vessels are alike prey to the submarine monster, bent upon a sole purpose and achieving it in democratic fashion.

I might mention other illustrations, Mr. President, to convey the thought which I have when I protest against calling a system democratic, however necessary, because it claims to operate impartially. Democracy means liberty, and liberty is wholly at war with the autocratic weapon of compulsory service.

What peopled this country during the first century of the Nation's life with immigrants from the old country if their coming to our shores had not behind it the desire to escape from monarchies under whose laws they were compelled to live? It used to be said that every European peasant carried a soldier upon his back. It might be said that every European peasant was subjected to a system which compelled him to be a soldier. He came here to avoid that system. He came to a country where the traditions of the Anglo-Saxon race prevailed and were universally observed; where free institutions underlaid the system of government; where military service was the voluntary sacrifice of the citizen; where their children have been taught that compulsory military service is a weed of pestilent growth wholly abhorrent to the genius of our institutions, to be utilized only when the Nation's life is imperiled, and that the Republic has waxed in strength and power by the steadfast devotion of its people to republican principles.

I have noticed recently, Mr. President, that in every modern propaganda of the peoples of the Old World, whether in Russia or Germany or elsewhere, one of the demands is the abolition of compulsory military service, a fruitful source, Mr. President—a very fruitful source—of what is popularly called international socialism. It must disappear if popular government once established is to endure.

It is equally true, Mr. President, that as the absence of this system is a characteristic of democracy, its presence is inseparable from despotism, and particularly from the modern despotisms of Europe, some of which are responsible for this awful war, the end of which I trust will sweep them forever from existence. With these we are now at war.

If the reasoning in favor of this bill be sound, Germany is the most democratic of nations. And Austria also. Between them is the home of the system. The mailed hand of these Empires closes upon all their subjects and forces them into the lines of their armies. They make no exemptions. Equality is not only the watchword but the unvarying practice. Then, too, the officers are competent and they are all powerful. The conscript is turned over to their rigid requirements of discipline and of training. He begins his service as a man; he finishes it as a machine, with neither mind nor purpose of his own. From such democratic systems may this country be delivered forever and ever.

It may be that we must fight the devil with fire. If so, I shall cheerfully acquiesce; but until it becomes necessary, and the system which I deny to have been a failure—the American system, the Anglo-Saxon system—is given its opportunity, I can not consent that we should adopt the compulsory service of Germany, of Austria, and of Russia, and make it the basis of a new military policy for the raising of an army. My refusal to do so is emphasized by the evident intention of the Secretary of War to make it a permanent feature of our Military Establishment.

Mr. President, what I have heretofore said assumes equality in the system; but I deny that it is there. There is nothing that may be called equality between men in America, except equality of right and equality of opportunity. Some Senators in this Chamber are dependent upon their public compensation for a livelihood; others so much more fortunate in their possession of the good things of life that their compensation is of little consequence. And so throughout the country there are men earning their livelihoods and learning their trades, men dependent upon their daily wage for existence and sometimes for the existence of their families, while there are others entirely at ease, either through the possession of inherited wealth, because they are the children of well-to-do parents, or because they have been more fortunate in their own struggles for existence.

Under this system you may take one man from an apprenticeship the completion of which is necessary to enable him to become an independent citizen, and you may take also the son of a millionaire and put them side by side in the Army. Is there any equality in this situation? The one must give the very prime of his youthful years to his country and lose the opportunity of acquiring a trade or pursuit which would make him not only a useful but an independent citizen. The other is neither better nor worse off for being subjected to the operation of the system.

I might make many other illustrations. It is not necessary. There can be no such thing as equality of operation of such a system among men whose stations and conditions and resources are not comparatively uniform. So that the proposed change has not so much as equality to recommend it, and I am amazed that sincere and intelligent men do not perceive this self-evident truth.

As illustrating the so-called democratic character of this system I saw the other day a statement which applauded the occupancy at Plattsburg of the same dog tent by Mr. Vincent Astor and his valet, and the country's attention was directed to the fact that under such a system the millionaire at one end of the line and the domestic at the other were brought into democratic, and therefore into equal, contact with each other. Now, apart from the awkwardness of the situation perhaps to both, is not that merely an incident which may result from any service which, instead of spelling equality, only serves to accentuate the contrast in this world between men? And is not such a contact equally consistent with service by volunteers? Such evidences of democracy, Mr. President, mean nothing in a country like this. The contact in the training camp between the aristocrat and the plebian may be extremely interesting for both for the time being, but it is only transient; it disappears with the occasion. I have not heard that the incident was followed by an invitation from Mr. Astor to his valet to dine with him at any time or enjoy those other hospitalities which equality in life is supposed to inspire, nor do I expect to hear anything of the sort.

There are inequalities in race and there are race prejudices which might for the moment be obliterated by a necessary contact in the camps, whether filled with conscripts or volunteers; but who will pretend that those fundamental conditions can be at all affected by occasional contact in camp life or under the folds of the same tent?

I deny, Mr. President, that there is anything democratic about this system. So let us accept it at its face value, using it when necessary, not until necessary, and no longer than necessary. We must then ascertain whether that necessity confronts us. I deny that it does, albeit many persons have tumultuously wired me to the contrary. And, Mr. President, because of this experience I am tempted to say that if I had any loose money for investment I would buy shares in one or the other of the telegraph companies now doing such a prosperous and formidable business in transmitting voluntary advice to men in my position from all over the country. It is a good thing for them, independently of any other consideration. They require large sums of money, coming, I doubt not, from the pockets of patriots prompted by no motive but to serve their country. Those who have been good enough to communicate with me are divided into men who oppose and men who support this measure, and I venture to say that not one-half of 1 per cent on either side of the controversy have ever read this bill or know anything about it except as they condemn or commend its general principle, and acting upon that they cheerfully demand that Senators representing them shall vote according to their respective views. Needless to say, one can not do both.

It is rather embarrassing to a man who has no convictions of his own upon the subject to be confronted with such a situation. Such a man might avoid the dilemma by following the example of old Wouter Van Twiller—weigh telegrams and letters for against telegrams and letters against the bill. He might let avoirdupois determine the problem. Perhaps his conclusion would be quite as correct as if he attempted to adjudicate otherwise. Both sets of communications, Mr. President, contain evidences of propaganda, especially when, as in the instance this morning brought to our attention by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], these telegrams and letters bear such a strong family resemblance, doubtless emanating from some central authority, either in idea or in expression, or in both. Those which I have received are subject to the same suspicion.

As illustrative of these propaganda I call attention to a full-page advertisement from the New York Times of Sunday, April 16, of the National Security League. I shall not read it, nor inflict it on the public through the columns of the RECORD. It tells us that "President Wilson's war message would be hollow words unless America acts." That is probably true. Then follows a reference to the Declaration of Independence, Patrick Henry's address, Lincoln's Gettysburg speech, and a few extracts from the President's message, ending by a call upon the people to urge their Senators and Representatives to vote for the administration Army bill. These things cost money. They must be paid for, as well as those on the other side, typified by a more modest advertisement I now exhibit, clipped from the same paper, and equally earnest in its insistence that the policy outlined in this bill is all wrong. This comes from the American Union Against Militarism, 641 Munsey Building, and contains a coupon to be cut out and sent to headquarters, and I suppose there to be sent to the respective Members of this body and the body at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. President, the safe and only course for a man to pursue when beset by such earnest protagonists and antagonists is to follow his own counsel, do what he thinks is right under the circumstances as best he can, and take the consequences. It is easy to follow the drift for the moment of public sentiment—the easiest thing in the world. That is following the lines of least resistance. If one can ascertain the drift of public sentiment and catch it and conform to it, he may escape much sorrow and tribulation in this world, albeit he may achieve the reputation of being as unstable as water. And he may prosper.

Mr. President, I am satisfied, not from communications and telegrams, but from an acquaintance with my people extending over almost half a century, that I know something about the way they feel upon this subject. I affirm that they are opposed to conscription except as a last resort, notwithstanding the fact that in our large centers, as in others, there is at present a sentiment, prompted partly by patriotism, partly by apprehension, partly by propaganda, which finds more active and violent expression than that deeper current of sentiment, running silently and quietly, but constantly, from the hearts and the minds of the plain people of the country who maintain its integrity and wage its battles.

Mr. President, we are about to violate a fundamental tradition of our democracy. We are about to do so in what many earnestly and honestly believe to be a very serious crisis, and because they also believe that without it the safety and possibly the existence of their country will be imperiled. I am not finding fault with these opinions. I have not, and trust I never will, say upon this floor anything that can be construed into a reflection upon the motives of my associates, except in so far as honest criticism may carry such an implication. I have never consciously inserted in the RECORD anything that even seemed to cast a reproach upon the good faith, the standing, or the convictions of my associates. Something was inserted this morning, a letter from a gentleman whose convictions are too strong and all pervading to permit the existence of charity for those of others. It has no right to a place in the RECORD; but it is there, and I do not complain. I shall not dignify this man by mentioning his name. His dogmatism is as narrow as it is offensive. He reminds me of that character in Lowell's Bigelow Papers," described as one who—

> Couldn't see but dest one side;
> If his, 'twas God's, and that was plenty.

We have many such people in the world, Mr. President, and many of them favor this bill.

Some one has said that "vituperation is not argument, but a form of self-indulgence"; and a truer statement never fell from human lips. We can not reach the reason of others either by belittling their opinions or reproaching them for their expression. We make intellectual progress in this world only through impersonal argument and discussion, granting to every man the same sincerity and earnestness of conviction which we demand for ourselves.

In that spirit, Mr. President, I shall discuss what seem to me to be underlying and conclusive objections to the immediate adoption of the principle involved in this very important bill. The people of the United States may be entirely mistaken in their antipathy to compulsory service. In times past, when judgments were calm and deliberate, when excitement had not usurped the province of reason, those who advocated or believed in the system were few and far between. It was in distinct conflict with personal liberty. Opposition to it rose to the dignity of a race conviction. It may have been a prejudice, but it is too deeply ingrained in every Anglo-Saxon community in this world, wherever found, to be violated, except in the presence of a great extremity, which does not now confront us.

Of course, our military officers are for the most part the advocates of enforced service. But there are exceptions here and there even among these. I shall refer to two or three of the most eminent ones before I am through. But men of the military profession, thorough believers in that efficiency which comes from long service and thorough training, are restive under a system which leaves to the citizen the choice between the camp and the farm.

With the War Department, Mr. President, this proposed departure is no new thing. Those having our military affairs in charge are naturally, inherently, and constitutionally in favor of compulsory service. It permeates the atmosphere in which they live. It is gathered and garnered from the line of their daily duties and experiences. They are not to be censured for it. They constitute a hierarchy, which very naturally regards the military as essentially superior to the civil branch of the Government. The existence of this sentiment is inseparable from the military life. Therefore we have always been on guard against it, as we should be now.

The same spirit exists in the Navy, and for the same reasons, therefore, you can not find a naval officer who believes that the submarine is displacing the battleship. Why? Because in the Navy, as in the Army, there is a hierarchy. There could be no hierarchy with the submarine. It has no quarter-deck. Within its small confines man and officer are brought into close and constant contact. Consequently the consensus of naval opinion among this hierarchy is that because the battleship has not yet been actually superseded we should continue to construct them more numerously than ever. So in our haste to get ready for the enemy we are feverishly building battleships and paying premiums for their speedy construction over the contract cost when not one of them can be finished before 1921. The space occupied by them in the navy yards of the country, and the men engaged in their construction, should both be utilized, now of all times, in the speedy construction of smaller craft—submarines, mosquito fleets, and so forth—vessels which can be completed in a short time and made immediately useful in this great struggle. For the present we have battleships enough, when we stop to reflect that our allies, long before our entrance into the war, commanded—subject to the submarine—absolute control of the seas.

Mr. President, this system in its last analysis—and we always come to that—means the seizure of the youth of the country and their subjection for the time being to a despotic system. The mind of the youth and of his parents instinctively recoils from such a situation. And this bill wholly fails to distribute the burden. It does not pretend to be universal. It takes one and passes five. It proceeds upon the old scriptural assurance that many are called but few are chosen.

Something has been said here about the conscript system in the South during the Civil War, to which resort was had in 1862. It may be, Mr. President, that my contact with the attempted enforcement of that system during my boyhood has something to do with my repugnance to it. Yet I say that down there—and I challenge successful contradiction—in my part of the country it was a failure.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It was everywhere.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. FALL. Does the Senator recall how the draft was enforced in the State of New York?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. FALL. Volunteer regiments enforced the draft in New York, who were called upon, and had to be called upon, to put down the riots.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I do recall it. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to-day, when that matter was called to his attention, said that those riots were the result of copperhead intrigues and conspiracies. That may be; but in my section of the South, after the year 1862, this system, though not resisted openly at all times, could be evaded; and I want to assure the Senators who do me the honor of their presence that the swamps of my section of the country were the sanctuaries of able-bodied men, living without habitations and as they could, to escape an enforced military service. It was not very patriotic, but it was the result of a system which all men abhorred.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the population of our neighbor on the north was very largely increased at the same time.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and for the same reasons. Desertions increased more than a hundred per cent. I have seen instances of self-mutilation of the hands and the limbs to avoid response to this system, so loathsome and repugnant was it to many of our citizens. I have known instances where provost guards entered houses with fixed bayonets and dragged their inmates away; and when they resisted they were shot. I have seen the effect of this system upon parents more than once. I have never forgotten those experiences. I never can, and I earnestly hope that they may never be repeated. I trust that this system, when adopted, will meet with a different response, as I am sure it would if it were postponed to a time when an imperiled Republic may make it absolutely necessary.

Mr. President, we very naturally look to the majority report filed by the chairman with the bill on the 19th day of April for the reasons underlying it. That report declares that this measure is necessary because it establishes "a system which our own experience, as well as the experience of the world now in arms, has proved to be the only adequate and effectual one"; and we are also informed that "at the same time it accommodates itself to such volunteer spirit as exists and is available in the early days of the war."

Mr. President, if it be true that the experience of the world in arms has proved this to be the only adequate and effectual system for a nation's safety, let us have it by all means. I want it. But I deny that such conclusion can be truthfully drawn from the experiences of this war or any preceding one. On the contrary, I assert that it has been demonstrated beyond the power of successful contradiction that the volunteer system has not broken down in this war, but has been vindicated by it.

Much has been said in this discussion about Canada; and everything asserted regarding the success of her system of voluntary enlistments is true. She has equipped one of the greatest armies ever raised upon the Western Hemisphere by the old-fashioned Anglo-Saxon volunteer system. She has disciplined it and organized it with an efficiency, a completeness, and a dispatch so great that it has, in every encounter in which it has engaged, withstood the onslaughts of the veteran legions of the greatest military power on earth. A failure? Tell that to the people north of our boundary line! It has not, Mr. President, a solitary element of failure; for if it had, the people of the Dominion—as earnest in this war as the mother country, and as anxious to see it terminated, whose sacrifice of blood and treasure measures up to that of the mother country—would have abandoned it long ago.

In the last issue of the Survey I find an article entitled "A Canadian City in War Time." I shall not read it all; but it gives an account of the volunteer system, and ends with an interview between the writer and one of the principal officials of the Canadian Government intrusted with this work. They have there a national service board. He says:

> Nothing is more ruinous than the cry for wholesale indiscriminate volunteering.

That is the argument which was so powerfully made this afternoon by the brilliant young Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

> Do you favor compulsion, then?
> Indiscriminate compulsory service is only less bad than indiscriminate voluntary service, and compulsion is not needed if you apply modern census and efficiency methods to the process of selection. With a thousand first-class prospects in a district to work with, the process of recruiting can proceed on an entirely different plane from the old-style fife-and-drum method. The atmosphere is entirely changed. The recruiting officer goes to the young man without dependents, without any special equipment to serve his country at home, with strength and youth in his favor. He asks, "Why are you not in khaki?"

I shall ask leave, Mr. President, to insert the remainder of this article as a part of my remarks, and I particularly call attention to its last paragraph, which is devoted to what is called the scientific, selective volunteer system of Canada, a system which is there worked out, and, of course, can be worked out for volunteers just as rapidly and just as effectively as can a conscript system.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> As these Canadian service board men saw it, the old-fashioned way of opening a recruiting office was about as antiquated as a town crier. The modern way is more in common with the system by which a high-class insurance agency develops its prospects in any locality and an efficiency engineer deploys his human equipment once he has studied its make-up and individual prowess.
>
> To illustrate along military lines: Recently the British Government wanted 3,000 men for the royal flying corps—acetylene welders, blacksmiths, carpenters, coppersmiths, motorcyclists, motor drivers, electricians, engine fitters, motorcycle fitters, engineers' storemen, motor fitters, millwrights, sailmakers (tailors), milling machinists, metal turners, painters, tinsmiths, cabinetmakers, vulcanizers, cooks—at pay ranging from $1.10 to $2.80 per day. It was an easy matter for the national service board to run through its cards and turn over to the military department 12,000 excellent prospects of men with the right training.
> Similarly, in the industrial field, there was a slowing up of traffic due to lack of men to clean up locomotives in the roundhouses. It was a simple matter to put more than ample prospects in the hands of the employment agents of the Canadian railways.
>
> In the field of agriculture the man-power inventory made it abundantly clear that there was a shortage of labor with exception of Prince Edward Island. Manitoba needed 5,000 men, Saskatchewan 5,000 and Alberta 2,500. The thing to do, as the Canadian board saw it (Washington papers please copy!), was to induce 12,500 agricultural laborers to come from the United States to help in the spring work on the farms. An arrangement was completed with the provincial governments of the prairie sections by which over $150,000 would jointly be appropriated by the Dominion and the Provinces to send 44 special agents south in cooperation with the immigration branch of the department of the interior. The plan called for the absorption of a portion of the railway fare of experienced farm hands from certain common points in the United States to the Canadian line where the cent-a-mile rate applies.
> In March the second or occupational survey was initiated, schedules sent out to employers, and the cooperation of all boards of trade and industrial bodies solicited. The immediate purpose was to learn the labor needs of the essential industries, so as to make the labor resources disclosed by the man-power inventory practically available. The survey reaches deeper, however, so as to disclose opportunities for substitution in the general industries, where women or partially crippled soldiers might release present employees for the essential industries or for military service.

The survey reaches further, also, and calls for estimates of employment needs following the war, so that the Government will have a clear picture of the stupendous problem of displacement which will confront the Dominion, and may develop an intelligent and nation-wide program to ease the stress when the expeditionary force and the shutting down of munitions work will put the whole social and economic structure of Canada to extraordinary test.

SCIENTIFIC SELECTIVE VOLUNTEERING.

This, then, is the system which the Dominion is developing under its national service board to approach the problem of demobilization, and which, in the view of the officials of the board, would have conserved time, resources, and efficiency in the earlier period of recruiting, such as the United States is now entering. From a social standpoint, this Canadian demonstration can scarcely be ignored by the American public. It is the answer of the great English-speaking New World democracy to the north of us to the challenge of war. Its elements are the voluntary principle as against Old World conscription; pay standards related to the current economic life of the people, far in excess of the European armies, double that of our own, supplemented by subsistence allowances which release great numbers of young married men for military service, and, with the institution of the national service board, census and efficiency methods in developing and placing recruits for the army and the essential industries. It is scientific, selective volunteering. It has conserved the liberty of conscience to the individual, and in spite of the provocation of underenlistment among the French Canadians, it has stubbornly refused to yield ground to any system of conscription which would place in the hands of the Government the power of casting armies of citizens into war without their volition. And it has mustered 400,000 volunteers—the equivalent, roughly, of a free-will army of 4,000,000 from the population of the United States.

Mr. President, a great many men have given up their lives in the Canadian Volunteer service who might have been more useful as officers, but, Mr. President, it is the flower of every country which fights the battles of democracy. In this is one of its fundamental differences from autocracy. It is the glory of free peoples everywhere that the men who come to the front industrially, socially, politically, and martially in times of war are the flower of the country, and if it were not so republics would perish from the face of the earth. The sentiment which creates and perpetuates them is the spirit which impels its sons to die for them.

That fact was noted by De Toqueville, the great French commentator upon American institutions, years ago. With the selective conscript system it is this class of men which will go to the front, do the fighting, bear the burden and the heat of the day, and their bones will strew and their blood stain the battle fields of Europe. The selective process will winnow the chaff from the wheat as unerring as the volunteering system. What has been said of Canada can be said of every other British Colony although one of them did resort to conscription and afterwards repealed the act providing for it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have heard that statement, but I do not understand that it was done in Australia.

Mr. THOMAS. I am referring to Australia.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understand that compulsory military training has been adopted there subsequent to the repeal or modification of the act.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator may be right. I am simply giving the facts, as I read them, that the conscription act has been repealed by a popular vote. It may not be so, but with that exception if it still exists——

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I think he is accurate. They had a referendum and it was rejected, as we have been told.

Mr. THOMAS. I stated it as it has reached me; but the chairman of the committee is generally very accurate in his recollection of these matters.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have not the exact information, but I understood that the referendum to which the Senator refers related entirely to military service.

Mr. THOMAS. I repeat, Mr. President, that this volunteer system has been tested in all the dependencies of the British Empire, in all parts of the world with the possible exception of Australia, and has been effective and successful. Under that system the South African confederation wrested from it, every acre of soil belonging to the German Empire upon the African Continent. Her soldiers have accomplished the feat in this war of practically annihilating that part of the enemy with which they came in contact, and it was done under the volunteer system.

It may be said, and it is true, that the British-Boer war conferred an experience and a discipline upon those men which made them such effective soldiers, but there also we are confronted with the fact that this training was acquired and enjoyed by volunteers who vindicated their right to be called soldiers from the commencement to the end of the war with Great Britain, and what is true of her dependencies is true of England also.

The report of the committee upon that subject says, on page 4:

No effectual army was raised in Great Britain until the volunteer system was abandoned and compulsory service established in its stead. Such a service was first but less effectually established by the force of enlightened and apprehensive public opinion operating in the form of social compulsion evidenced by derision, ostracism, and abuse heaped upon those who were reluctant to respond.

Again:

The British people are to-day, three years after the outbreak of the war, where they would have been at its outbreak had they been so well advised then as they are now. It would be folly for us at this late day, in the light of their experience, to begin where they began.

Mr. President, I read that twice before I could satisfy myself that it was a part of the committee report upon this all-important bill.

Mr. President, the inhabitants of Great Britain are a peace-loving nation. They are a great democracy. They are opposed to militarism in all its forms except upon the seas, where their very existence would be at all times imperiled in the absence of complete protection. They have not had a compulsory system of service until very recently. England entered into this war with a comparatively small volunteer army of veterans, who saved Paris at the Battle of the Marne. But her system, whether part compulsory or not, as here asserted and which I dispute, has been the most stupendous success, if we are to measure it by its results, in her military history.

Under that system, Mr. President, England has mobilized 5,000,000 men, drilled them, and equipped them, a force five times as large as the force whose magnitude seems to appall the Senator from New York, and did it within the short space of two years.

The majority of the committee are entirely mistaken when they assert that no effective army was raised in Great Britain until the voluntary service was abandoned and compulsory service established in its stead. In France you find the volunteer army of England. The conscripts, if I am correctly informed, are not yet ready to take the field. That magnificent body of soldiers which for the last two or three weeks have been battling by day and by night and making constant encroachments upon the enemy is England's army of volunteers. I challenge any man to contradict this statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. If I understood the Senator from Colorado correctly a moment ago, he said the volunteer system had been a success in the colonies with the possible exception of Australia. Will the Senator permit me to read exactly what Capt. Benson, of the British Army, said about Australia before the House committee?

Mr. THOMAS. I will be glad to have the Senator read it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The question was asked Capt. Benson:

Did you get 5,000,000 men under the volunteer system from Great Britain, not including Canada, Australia, and the other colonies?

Capt. BENSON. Yes, sir; not including any of the colonies. We got roughly, about 11 per cent of the population.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Do you know how many were received under the volunteer system from New Zealand, India, Australia, Canada, and the other colonies?

Capt. BENSON. I think Canada raised under the volunteer system about 400,000 men, and I think Australia and New Zealand raised, roughly, about the same number.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator just a moment there?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. While this discussion was going on a gentleman in the gallery sent down a card to me in which he stated he was informed "that good prospects for soldiers in Canada were given notice that they should enlist, and if this notice was not acted upon a discharge from employment was hinted at as likely to result." Is not this voluntary system equivalent to selective draft?

Mr. FALL. If they did enlist, they lost their job, did they not?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; but in enlisting they served their country.

Mr. THOMAS. They could not very well fill two jobs so widely apart as local employment and service in the Army.

Reference has been made during this discussion to the effect that the volunteer system has been partially compulsory because men have been denounced as slackers; that the women have derided and reproached them and have refused to associate with them when they would not join the Army. It is contended that this constitutes a method of compulsion and transforms in some degree the volunteer system into a compulsory system.

Mr. President, no crusade for volunteers was ever carried on when such inducements were not a part of the propaganda.

I remember in the South, after Sumter was fired on, young men of the proper age for military service were forced by the girls of the community to enlist whenever they exhibited any reluctance to do so. They would have nothing to do with him except to reproach him, sometimes to insult him; and that pressure is something a red-blooded man can not long resist.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I may interrupt the Senator, it is sometimes said that such a soldier is "nothing better than a conscript."

Mr. THOMAS. "Nothing better than a conscript." I was told that the Speaker the other day said that the people of this country regarded the conscript and convict as somewhat analogous. I do not know whether he said it or not, but I never knew a conscript to boast of it. I never knew one who voluntarily confessed it. I never knew one to acquire credit or standing because he was a conscript.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I have before me a document on the question of conscription in Australia. That question was submitted to a referendum and it was overwhelmingly defeated, and the writer says in speaking of the vote of the army on the question:

The result of the poll was a triumph for democracy, leading one to believe that no free people in the world would knowingly put themselves under the power of a military autocracy.

Sir William Irvine, a nephew of John Mitchell, the famous Irish politician, and one of the ablest men on the conscription side, had hopes to the last that the soldiers' vote would carry the day. It had been rightly decided that the Australian soldiers at the front should have their say in the matter, though a distinguished Melbourne lawyer thought it a simpler plan to add 200,000 votes to the "Yes" side, because he knew what the opinion of the soldiers would be. But to the surprise of many, who take their opinions ready-made, the soldiers voted against conscription by a huge majority. This fact was at first suppressed, but soon became an open secret.

That is, the men who were at the front bearing the brunt of the battle were unwilling that that method should be employed to force patriotic citizens to ...ve the country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, let me refer now to another statement in this majority report:

The influence of this British tradition—

That is, regarding conscription—

in this regard has brought her to the verge of national disaster in this pending gigantic struggle, which involves her life, as, indeed, it may involve ours.

Did the presence of this tradition in active form keep France from "the verge of a national disaster in this pending gigantic struggle"? Mr. President, we all know that the German Army was within 12 miles of the city of Paris when the flanking movement occurred which saved that city largely through the activities of the British Army of volunteers; and that was not only the first but the greatest disaster which has yet come to the German arms. Yet France was as near to the verge of disaster with conscription as Great Britain was near to the verge of disaster without it.

So, Mr. President, the occurrences of the war that are urged here as reasons for the attitude taken by the committee and probably by the country do not seem to be conclusive upon this question, nor as regards Great Britain do they seem to be based upon facts.

Now, there is another reason why I assert that the British volunteer system has been an immense success. Great Britain wisely postponed conscription until public opinion was ready for it. If Great Britain at the outbreak of the war had tried conscription, it would have created civil war from one end of the island to the other. Those of us who recollect the comments at that time, the apprehensions indulged in by the governing powers, the deep-seated rumblings of dissent among the great mass of the people bear out the fact that, politically independent of any other consideration, Great Britain was wise with a wisdom that almost passes understanding in postponing the day of conscription until the time when she needed all of her men and when she had secured all that were possible through the volunteer system.

I referred to the fact last Saturday that Lord Kitchener was a military commander of some experience and of great eminence, and to certain comments of his on this subject in a book recently published called "The Lord Kitchener Memorial Book." Here is a soldier to whose attention the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] is directed, who seemed to have some ideas on the volunteer system not entirely in harmony with the views of those vocal militarists who are patronizing so constantly and so frequently the telegraph companies of the country. The book to which I refer is published by George H. Doran Co., and consists of contributions from men who were close partners with Lord Kitchener in his work. Among them are Lord Derby, Sir Hedley Le Bas, who conducted the extraordinary advertising campaign for recruits, that doubtless contributed largely to the success of the volunteer system. Among them is Marquis de Chasseloup Laubat—who after November, 1914, represented the French Government at London as technical expert in the broad field of military coordination between the two Governments. In the course of many intimate conversations with Kitchener the question of recruiting naturally came up. From this point we may quote—

I am quoting from an editorial recently appearing in the New York Evening Post:

Like all men who have carefully studied the history of the French Army, he [Kitchener] knew that my father was the statesman who in 1871 and 1872 drew up the first French universal conscription law; he therefore often spoke to me of that subject, and was especially anxious to know whether I had confidential information as to the length of time the French considered necessary in 1871 for a general conscription law to produce serious results; and he was most interested when I explained to him the reasons why the answer was about 17 years.

I certainly hope if this bill is to pass that the efficiency we are looking for will materialize long before the lapse of 17 years. I would like to live to see it, and 17 years from now conscription will have very little interest for me.

From what he told me he seems to have come to the conclusion that in England conscription must necessarily come sooner or later—but the later the better.

On the whole, it seems that Kitchener and the British Government acted wisely—

He is still giving his conversations with Kitchener—in not hurriedly taking a step of which the premature adoption might have brought many more and far greater evil results than good.

Let me reread into the RECORD what this great military genius said on the floor of the House of Lords on January 5, 1916, upon this subject:

So far we have been able to provide for the largest increase of the army and its maintenance on a purely voluntary system, and I, personally, had always hoped that we should be able to finish the war successfully without changing that system, which has done so well and which has given us such splendid material in the field. I do not consider that the change proposed should be regarded in the light of any derogation of the principle of voluntary service in this country. It only affects, during the period of the war, one class of men, among whom there are undoubtedly a certain number who have but a poor idea of their duties as citizens.

On May 23 Kitchener said in the House of Lords:

The conviction is deeply and universally felt that we have engaged in a just war, and the patriotism of our people gave us, under the voluntary system, a far larger army than we could ever have contemplated. This bill will enable us to maintain its numbers in a manner and degree not hitherto possible.

Mr. President, I can reach no other than the conclusion that Lord Kitchener was satisfied with the volunteer system up to the time when it became necessary to supplement it with the draft. You can not condemn a system so long as it is good, nor can you resort to something else on the plea of necessity until that element appears. Then the new departure should be used to supplement existing conditions.

Before the Senate adjourns let me quote another character of some military prominence in his day and generation. I now refer to Gen. William Tecumseh Sherman, who wrote and published his Memoirs. On page 386 of the second volume, beginning at the bottom of the page, he says:

But the real difficulty was, and will be again, to obtain an adequate number of good soldiers. We tried almost every system known to modern nations, all with more or less success—voluntary enlistments, the draft, and bought substitutes—and I think that all officers of experience will confirm my assertion that the men who voluntarily enlisted at the outbreak of the war were the best—better than the conscript and far better than the bought substitute. When a regiment is once organized in a State and mustered into the service of the United States the officers and men become subject to the same laws of discipline and government as the Regular troops. They are in no sense "militia," but compose a part of the Army of the United States, only retain their State titles for convenience, and yet may be principally recruited from the neighborhood of their original organization. Once organized, the regiment should be kept full by recruits, and when it becomes difficult to obtain more recruits the pay should be raised by Congress instead of tempting new men by exaggerated bounties. I believe it would have been more economical to have raised the pay of the soldier to thirty or even fifty dollars a month than to have held out the promise of three hundred and even six hundred dollars in the form of bounty.

Here comes the slacker—

Toward the close of the war I have often heard the soldiers complain that the "stay-at-home" men got better pay, bounties, and food than they, who were exposed to all the dangers and vicissitudes of the battles and marches at the front. The feeling of the soldier should be that in every event the sympathy and preference of his Government is for him who fights rather than for him who is on provost or guard duty to the rear; and, like most men, he measures this by the amount of pay. Of course, the soldier must be trained to obedience and should be "content with his wages"; but whoever has commanded an army in the field knows the difference between a willing, contented mass of men and one that feels a cause of grievance.

Now, listen to this conclusion:

There is a soul to an army as well as to the individual man, and no general can accomplish the full work of his army unless he commands the soul of his men as well as their bodies and legs.

That is true, Mr. President. It explains the superiority of the volunteer to the conscript. You can not transmute reluctant and unwilling service into that spiritual enthusiasm which glows with fervor and sacrifice in the camp as on the battle field. Germany can, under her despotic and inflexible methods, grind the man to powder, break his will, reduce him to the level of the slave, and turn out a dull automaton, obeying orders and yielding the obedience of a dog to a brutal master, but that can not be done here yet. No such soldiers can defend a Republic. But, if the conscript system comes, such methods must come with it sooner or later, and the volunteer soldier will have disappeared forever.

Just one more reference this afternoon, Mr. President. I want to quote Gen. Miles in this connection, one of the greatest soldiers of his time, and to read an extract which I find on page 52 of the hearings before the House Committee on Military Affairs on the volunteer and conscription systems:

Mr. GORDON. You are opposed to compulsory service?
Gen. MILES. Absolutely.
Mr. GORDON. Do you believe that we can raise 133,000 men each year for three years for the continental Army without compulsion?
Gen. MILES. With compulsion, I hope not. I think it would be a very dangerous step toward centralization. As far as conscription was concerned, that was tried out during the Civil War, with unsatisfactory results. I think there were 54,000 men added to the Army—54,000 additional to the 2,000,000 men—by conscription, but I know that, just at the time of the crisis of the Gettysburg campaign, thousands of the best troops, drilled and disciplined men in the Army, had to be taken out of the field and sent back to suppress the riots occasioned by that unpopular measure. Approximately 10,000 or 12,000 were ordered to New York, and I know that there was a brigade in Pennsylvania, which was organized at Huntingdon, and, instead of being sent to the field where they were needed, they were sent to Philadelphia to maintain order. It was a very unpopular measure at that time in that great crisis of the Nation.

Tuesday, April 24, 1917.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, just before the recess of yesterday I read quotations from the memoirs of Gen. Sherman and the testimony of Gen. Miles regarding the subject now under consideration. I shall supplement them with one from Maj. Gen. Sir Sam Hughes, with whose career we are all familiar. He was intrusted with the duty of securing, training, and equipping volunteers for active service upon the Continent.

On the 16th of April of last year, in a statement published in the New York Times Current History upon this subject, Gen. Hughes said:

What Canada is doing is raising a trained democratic army. Both of the adjectives I have just used—"trained" and "democratic"—are of the utmost importance in understanding this situation. Our strength up to a million and three-quarters of men, if necessary, will be in a volunteer army of citizens, every man trained in modern methods of warfare. And the lesson of all history is that the democratic army, after it gets its bearings, always defeats the standing army of professionals. One-third of the army that won the battle of Waterloo was made up of farmers. We have farmers, fishermen, lumbermen, hunters, Indians, thousands of keen athletic young fellows from the cities, and big student delegations from the universities—all the elements needed for the army that wins.

Mr. President, that confirms De Toqueville's comment upon democratic armies, that the longer they exist the more efficient they become, and unless conquered early in the conflict they become invincible.

Gen. Hughes continues:

RICH AND POOR BOTH COME FORWARD.

There is nothing to complain about, and we can not say that this or that element in the population is hanging back. The rich and the poor, the French and the English Canadian, and even the Indian, are all coming out to help Canada and the rest of civilization.

The response is so loyal and spontaneous that, as I have already told you, the new men are enlisting at the rate of a thousand a day for the entire Dominion.

Mr. President, the views of Mr. Roosevelt upon this subject, whether convincing or not, are of some interest. In a letter published on the 16th of April, giving his indorsement to the program of conscription, he said:

Many months, probably at least a year or more, must elapse before the army thus raised would be available for use in Europe in the hard, aggressive fighting campaigns which it is honorably incumbent on us to undertake, now that we have entered into the war.

He is entirely within bounds in assuming that an army raised by the selective draft, and equally true of an army raised in any other way, will require a year if not more to train and equip it for active service in the field.

Meanwhile—

Says Mr. Roosevelt—

let us use volunteer forces in connection with a portion of the Regular Army, in order at the earliest possible moment, within a few months, to put our flag on the firing line.

Now, that suggestion is precisely what the opponents of this bill are endeavoring to effect. Our motives are challenged, our sincerity is questioned, our patriotism is denied, because of our insistence upon a recognition of American methods in the raising of this great number of troops. Yet this gentleman, who apparently agrees with us very cordially, has encountered no criticism from our noisy civil experts on military policies.

Now, why does Mr. Roosevelt think that while waiting for a conscript army to be whipped into condition we should invoke the volunteer system for the purpose of raising an army to be immediately utilized.

We owe this to humanity—

I read again from Roosevelt's statement—

We owe it to the small nations who have suffered such dreadful wrong from Germany. Most of all, we owe it to ourselves, to our national honor and self-respect.

We do not go so far as this. We advocate the old system because it is American, because it is the system of free men and not of slaves, because it has never failed us during the earlier stages of warfare, and because it is democratic.

But Mr. Roosevelt wants to put the flag on the firing line immediately and perceives the necessity of doing it with volunteer forces if it is to be done at once.

"For the sake of our own souls and the memories of the great Americans of the past we must show that we do not intend to make this merely a dollar war. Let us pay with our bodies for our souls' desire. Let us without one hour's unnecessary delay put the American flag on the battle front in this great world war for democracy and civilization and for the reign of justice and fair dealing among the nations of mankind."

The colonel said he did not seek to have the volunteer system interfere in any way with or substitute for the obligatory plan, but that, except in certain cases, the volunteers should be composed of men who would not be taken under obligatory service.

He proposes an amendment to the act of March 7, 1899, providing for the raising of 35,000 volunteers. He is evidently unfamiliar with or has forgotten the act of 1914. He proposes an amendment—

So as to authorize the President to raise a force of not more than 100,000 (or 200,000 to 500,000 later) for three years or the duration of the war.

"Under this act," the letter continued, "I should ask leave to raise for immediate service overseas with the first expeditionary force an infantry division of three-regiment brigades and one divisional brigade of Cavalry, together with an Artillery brigade, a regiment of engineers, a motorcycle machine-gun regiment, an aero squadron, a signal corps, the supply service, etc.

"I should request the War Department for the detail of, say, two officers for every 1,000 men."

Of course the colonel would do the commanding himself.

"I believe that, acting under the direction and with the aid of the department, I could raise the division and have it ready to begin shipment to France in two or three months. My idea would be to have the intensive training in gas work, bomb throwing, bayonet fighting, and trench work given in France; they would then be sent into the trenches when they were thoroughly prepared."

Mr. President, if that is a praiseworthy, patriotic suggestion, I wish some one would explain to me the difference between it and the thing for which we are contending, which is that for present exigencies a test should be had of our old acceptable American volunteer system, resort being had to the other system when this shall prove a failure either in whole or in part.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very much interested in what the Senator from Colorado has read as an utterance of Col. Roosevelt. Can the Senator inform me what has become of that proposition of Col. Roosevelt?

Mr. THOMAS. I know nothing about it. I have seen little comment upon it. I do not think that any offers—and a number of them have come through me—of men under the volunteer system have been entertained or considered.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I have understood—I may be incorrectly informed—that proposition of Col. Roosevelt has been practically refused.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, the Senator is probably right; but, Mr. President, behind and beneath it is the fact, which Col. Roosevelt instinctively recognizes, that, after all, the soldier who does the fighting is the man, to use Gen. Sherman's expression, whose soul is in the business; and I venture the prediction that when this bill becomes a law its practical operation will, if successful, be the equivalent of the volunteer system. The man who wants to fight, the man who proposes to fight, the man who believes it to be his duty to fight, will be the man to whom this selective system, so called, will ultimately apply, and especially in view of the conceded fact that we actually need but a very small percentage of the men who will be subject to the operation of this draft within the limit of age for which it provides.

Mr. President, I might say much more against the proposition that the volunteer system has not proven the failure in this war that is contended by the advocates of this bill. Let me now turn, however, to what is said in the majority report of the committee regarding the draft which was resorted to by both sides during the Civil War:

It was half a century—

This is a quotation from Gen. Upton—

It was half a century later that we reaped the bitter fruits of this system at the Battle of Bull Run.

What system? The volunteer system. Who reaped "the bitter fruits" of it? The Northern Army. Did it not bring triumphant success to the volunteer army of the South? In battle the reaping of "bitter fruits" means the garnering of rich and luscious ones by the enemy. To assert that because an army of volunteers representing one section of the country overcame an army of volunteers representing the other section is a condemnation of the volunteer system is to invoke a process of logic which, I confess, I am unable to understand. I deny that the result of the early battles of the Civil War militates either for or against the system, for the very obvious reason that the one thing common to both sections of the country was the volunteer system in full operation.

That battle—

Says the report—

the first of the war, though it should have contributed much, contributed nothing whatever to the decision, and this for the very reason which so unnecessarily prolonged that struggle, namely, the incompetence of those placed in command by the volunteer method.

Mr. President, I concede that the man who is trained to arms is presumptively superior in that profession to the man who is not so trained; and yet it is the history of every volunteer system the world ever knew that military genius has been disclosed and developed to the highest degree among volunteer officers. The long list of distinguished commanders whom I might mention, the fruit of the terrible Civil War in America, demonstrates that through the crucible of conflict, through the active service upon the battle field and in the camp, comes the development of volunteer officers and volunteer soldiers alike. I do not go to extremes when I declare that the volunteer commanders of the Civil War who achieved distinction and honor and glory on both sides are quite as numerous and as conspicuous as those of the Regular Army.

The truth is—

Says this report—

The truth is the volunteer system and the State method of recruiting it, which seems to be a necessary concomitant of it, throughout the war proved such a failure to Union arms that it could but have been disastrous in the face of an enemy better prepared than were the Confederates or with a better system.

That, I think, Mr. President, is obvious; that is to say, a poor system in conflict with a better system has a disadvantage which may result in defeat; but it is no historic argument in favor of or against the system which some of us think should not be discarded by this bill, and which, when discarded, will in all probability be discarded forever. Moreover it should be borne in mind that had the North been represented at Bull Run by an army of conscripts, the result would have been no different. The troops would have been just as raw, just as unfit, and just as unsuccessful.

In the South the volunteer system was continued after 1862 concurrently with the so-called conscriptive system. Men raised companies and regiments and brigades through their personal efforts just as before, inspired, of course, by the ambition to command. It was the concurrent operation of the volunteer system which kept the armies of the Confederacy equipped with man power. And for two years, Mr. President, after every resource of that country was exhausted, shut off from the world by the most complete system of blockade known to the military history of the world, the Confederacy was able to continue the conflict because of the heroism and sacrifice and sense of duty animating the breasts and the consciences of its volunteer armies. If the experiment of the draft in the South proves anything, it is that in a country like ours it is a somewhat hazardous experiment.

Let me read an extract from the report of the Confederate bureau of conscription in 1864:

A rigid and unusual inspection, not only of company rolls but personal and also pay rolls, will prove that more men have been received into the service irregularly—that is, by volunteering—since the 1st of January than have gone through the conscription authorities.

In many localities it has been found expedient, indeed necessary, to suspend wholly or partially the operation of conscriptions. This has been done in localities between the lines of our armies and those of the enemy—so far as the reserve classes are concerned—for obvious reasons of preventing those classes from becoming prisoners of war.

Mr. President, I quoted Gen. Miles yesterday partly for the purpose of showing the small number of troops obtained under the operation of the conscript law of the North. In 1866 Provost Marshal General James B. Fry made a report, which, after referring to the violent disturbances in many portions of the country and the bloodshed accompanying the attempted enforcement of the law, says:

The draft was not completed till late in the year—and produced but few men for the service.

Presumably that year—

And I am informed that Gen. Miles's computation of 53,000 men secured by the draft is entirely too high. The actual number was less than 50,000. So that, Mr. President, we derive but little intelligent information from a study of the conscript experiments of our own Civil War. If it tends to prove anything it is that they were failures.

Reference has been made to the Spanish War. At that time, Mr. President, the conscripting of men was not mentioned, was not considered, was not thought of. Why? Because through the spur and spirit of adventure the young men of the country flocked to the standard of the Nation in overwhelming numbers and to a far greater extent than were needed. What that war did develop was the incompetency of the War Department in meeting a sudden emergency. What it did develop was the folly of attempting to use troops that were not troops at all beyond their oaths of allegiance. These were mobilized for active service without training. They were unfit for service. If these volunteers had been conscripts, under the existing conditions the result would have been precisely the same. You can not make a soldier out of a recruit in a moment, whether he volunteers or is conscripted. The element of training in either event is an absolute essential and the time required for it is not affected.

Some people assume—at least their statements involve the impression—the presence of some chemical or mental or physical element about conscription, which when applied to the average citizen instantly transforms him into a veteran, whereas the volunteer, being innocuous to such influences because he is a volunteer, must undergo a long process of training to become a soldier. If Col. Roosevelt is a military authority—and he claims to be an authority upon everything on earth—then I must conclude that his demand that pending the operation of this conscript law we should use the volunteer system, necessarily implies that the class of men whom he would thus obtain would be more susceptible to discipline and more easily and rapidly trained than would the average American, and that for the accomplishment of one of the main purposes involved in this war we should use the two pari passu, and that is what we are contending for.

I have heard it claimed in the committee room that universal service is an American policy as outlined by the act of 1792. That act, Mr. President, does recognize, and very properly so, the obligation of every citizen to serve his country and, within certain ages, to submit to military training; but no one will pretend that that law was enforced or that any attempt was made to enforce it. Why? Because the spirit, the traditions, and the genius of the American people were in conflict with it; because the attempt to enforce it would have instantly brought to the front the identical conditions against which the Revolutionary soldiers fought. A significant element of that bill, which is not mentioned very often, is the authority to the States to make such exemptions from its operation as they might see fit, a condition which, of course, destroyed the effectiveness of the law, and that must have been known to those who in enacting the law allowed it to contain such an exemption. So that, Mr. President, if that statute is at all pertinent to the discussion, it is that it was so out of touch with the prevailing views and opinions of the people at that time that no attempt was made to enforce it. That may have been a misfortune; we may otherwise have inculcated a military spirit in the generations which have occupied the field of action between that time and the present; but the fact remains that a law more than 100 years old, now resurrected to show that this new policy has always been ours, certainly shows the desperation of its advocates, since it is conceded that the statute was a dead letter from its enactment.

Mr. President, there is much force in the reminder that we should not imitate the mistakes of Great Britain; that her blunders should be a warning to us, and we should avoid them wherever possible. That is good advice. We can have no better counsel from any direction. I sought to show—and to my own satisfaction, at least, I did show—yesterday that England made no mistake in testing her voluntary system to the full; that she made no mistake in postponing resort to conscription until the minds and consciences of the people had been educated through experience to the belief in its final necessity as a supplement to the volunteer system then in vogue. I hope that we will, as far as possible, avoid every blunder with which the experiences of that great people have been punctuated during the past two years and a half, and that we will be able to do so very largely if we study dispassionately the history of these times and find what were and what were not the blunders of her policy.

But, Mr. President, should we not imitate her successes while avoiding her mistakes? Has she not taught us something in the field of active and successful effort equally as valuable to us if we heed it, as the need for ascertaining her blunders and avoiding them? What was England's first act of military policy after war was declared? Did she not take possession of every line of transportation? Did she not assume control of her railroads and water communications, making them all subservient to her great need of national defense? And was it not the supreme demand of a great crisis? Has anyone here, has any advocate of conscription, even suggested that the United States heed this most successful step in war administration? I have not heard it.

Mr. President, during the hearings on the military training law this subject came up in connection with the testimony of Col. Lydecker. Let me refer to that testimony for a moment. The colonel said, and said very properly:

The question for you is, How are you going to arrange the military defense of the country by the utilization of the militia? You are first to prepare your Regular Army, and it is a very costly thing to do. The Regular Army must be the center of organization of all military force and strength in regard to the five elements that relate to the subject of war.

He then states these five elements, each of which is absolutely and essentially important to preparation, either for defense or for offense.

The five elements I perhaps need not repeat here, but the five things that must be attended to in order to prosecute war successfully are—the transportation, the material, the instruments of destruction, the instruments for medication and care of the sick and wounded, and then the masses of men who make up the fighting strength. These are the five things that must be required by every nation for preparation for defense or for war.

And he puts this first—

And that is the experience of every writer upon military affairs of whom I have any knowledge.

I then asked the colonel—reading now from page 415:

Would you extend that general control to the five essential elements of military defense to which you referred a few moments ago, including transportation?

Col. LYDECKER. No, sir; I would not. I have been brought up under a democracy, and I am a Democrat. I do not believe yet in Federal ownership of the railroads—

Mind, the question had nothing to do with ownership—the telegraph, or the other public utilities. I do not believe in it yet. The country may be socialized to the point where it would be necessary to do so, but I do not believe in that. I do not believe in a military autocracy. I do not believe in the Federal authorities owning the railroads until war begins, and then they should take them under full power, and the military authorities should have full control and run the railroads through such sections as it is necessary to properly control the transportation.

The colonel believed that after war begins this should be the policy. Has anybody heard a suggestion of such a policy from any source, either before or after we entered this war? On the contrary, we are asked to increase the toll of these great transportation companies upon the consuming millions of the country by permitting them to raise their rate for transportation from 5 to 15 per cent. Mr. President, if we are to prepare for war, let us prepare. As the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] so well said, we are in this fight, so let us fight. Let us not forget that everything necessary to success in this war may depend upon transportation; and we know that when it is in the hands of private corporations, they very naturally and very properly operate the roads to earn money, thus enabling them to pay a profit to shareholders. That is right; but, Mr. President, it is superior to the military necessity in their minds at all times, whether they are conscious of it or not. It is perfectly legitimate, but it would not influence the Government in war times beyond the need for supplying the people with life's necessities. In private hands, however, the public needs are essentially secondary to the usual demands of traffic.

I heard some time ago of a consignment of horses from Cheyenne, needed on the Mexican border for men ready to mount and use them, which were sent first to New York by the railroad companies and then forwarded to the border. I have wondered whether Uncle Sam paid the freight first from Cheyenne to New York, and then from New York to the border. I am not a betting man, but I should be inclined to wager that the bill was presented for that transportation, in any event. This is an instance of results that must follow from the competition of civic and commercial needs and necessities and the imperative requirements of the Government.

I am in favor of compulsory service when required, and the public needs demand as a military step full governmental control of the transportation and the intelligence companies of the country, comprising the railroads, the telephone and the telegraph companies, and the vessels conducting traffic upon our waterways. The Government has commandeered wireless telegraphy, and no reason can be assigned for it that does not justify the extension of the policy to the telephone and telegraph lines of the country.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator will remember that the very proposition he is now discussing was before the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, and the very amendment that the Senator suggests was adopted by the committee and finally enacted by Congress, authorizing the Government, in case of necessity, to take charge of and operate these public utilities.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, I well remember, Mr. President, that in the defense act of last year that matter was up, and if I recall aright I was the author of the amendment to which the Senator refers; but it was not enacted as I offered it. It does not provide for the seizure of all of these lines of communication, which Col. Lydecker says, and all military writers say, is one of the five prerequisites to a sensible, full, military preparation. That is what I think should be done. I know that we are at war, and I know that it is necessary to do whatever we can—keeping in mind always the rights of the people, and the effect upon those rights of hastily considered legislation—to meet this crisis as it should be met.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado further yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does not the Senator think that under that very provision which was enacted by Congress, when the emergency does arise, when the railroads are needed by the Government, it can take charge of them?

Mr. THOMAS. I think so; I also think the emergency confronts us; but unfortunately the Senator knows when you leave the matter to the discretion of functionaries the emergency is seldom if ever recognized. The emergency is here, and we are told that we should follow the experience of other nations and avoid their mistakes. We should also imitate their successes. We should do exactly as Great Britain and France did—not wait for any other than the overwhelming, present, all-pervading emergency—and act accordingly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield; yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is the Senator advocating now the policy of taking over the railroads at this time and operating them?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I am. We are at war. Military authorities say that the control of transportation is necessary. Col. Lydecker declared that when war was on, he thought it ought to be done.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What would the Senator expect to obtain from such operation which the country does not now obtain?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should expect to obtain first just what was obtained in England, the abolition of the numberless discriminations through the exercise of which the prices of the necessities of life are soaring beyond the reach of the average man. I should expect the Government to give equal rates and equal rights to all, just as was done in Great Britain. I should expect benefit to result through the discipline of the men, for they, like conscripts or volunteers, must also be trained to the arts of war; and I should expect scores of engineers to be at work determining where new lines should be constructed to prevent possible calamities upon our coast, which is now not so well provided. I should expect the disappearance and destruction of these gambling enterprises, which in times like these flourish upon the needs of the people through combinations which succeed through juggled transportation rates. I should expect, too, Mr. President, that through this operation the Government would make due compensation to the owners of the railroads, based upon the actual value of their property, just as as they are doing in Great Britain.

I read some time ago in the New York Times Supplement an article written by an Englishman which described the admirable improvements in service and benefits in rates resulting to all the people of the British Isles through Government regulation and control of transportation, and which concluded with the statement that when this war ended popular sentiment would compel the Government to continue that control and operation in the interest—the commercial interest, the social interest, the industrial interest—of all the people. That may be one reason why we can not do it. Here, as there, the inestimable and far-reaching superiority of Government over private control will create a similar public sentiment irresistible and nation compelling, under the operation of which these essential elements of modern commercial and social life would be permanently taken over by the Government.

Mr. President, we are told that we should help the allies all we can. I agree to that. I do not violate any of the proprieties, certainly no confidences, when I assert that what France needs now is not men; her man power is still ample. What she needs are supplies and credits; and we should arrange to give them both in ample amount and bend our energies to the one effort—to the principal effort—of raising and manufacturing supplies and building ships.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. What did Lloyd-George say the other day was the crying need from this country? First, ships; second, ships; and third, ships. Mr. President, in the repetition of that word he voiced what we know to be the one supreme need of this war in view of Germany's submarine warfare.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. KELLOGG. What authority has the Senator from Colorado for the statement that France does not need men now, as against the statement of her public men and other public men of England that she does need them?

Mr. THOMAS. I have the authority of similar statements, of the fact that we are informed from time to time of the number of men at the front. You can not use two or three men where only one is needed. Of course, I do not wish to have my position misunderstood. I am not saying that we should not proceed to raise an Army. Yes; by all means let us do it, and do it expeditiously. I am simply calling attention to other things which, in the course of our preparation, seem to me to be equally and in some matters more important. Of course, we are responding. It is proposed to build ships everywhere. God grant that we may do it. I hope some system may be devised whereby different parts may be constructed in different sections of the country and assembled upon the seacoast. There are other good things about England's defenses which we might well imitate, but I will not now recount them.

Now, Mr. President, a few words with regard to the details of this bill. I have contended—with what success I do not know—that the same inequalities and defects which are observable in the volunteer system and for which it is condemned will appear under this system until the public need requires all of our man power. That was true during the Civil War. I think it is true now. It is said that we need but a small percentage of our man power, and that calls into activity what is called the selective element of this bill. The mere exercise of the selective power reveals the presence of inequality. As provided in the bill it stops with the process of exclusion.

It may be that I have misread the bill, and that it does what I now criticize; but if it provided that all men between given ages should be unconditionally subject to the law, and that in the processes of selection those not needed for soldiers should be assigned to and compelled to serve in other branches of activity—on the farms, in the factories, upon the railroads, and in those other vocations which are a part of the Nation's preparedness—it would fulfill one idea of universal service; but it does not. The exercise of this so-called selective system—and if I am wrong I hope the chairman will correct me—begins and ends with naming those who are to enlist and those who are not. The man who is excused is excused without limitation or condition. He goes back to the thing which he was doing, and to idleness if he was doing nothing. He may abandon the thing he was doing, although the doing of it was the cause of his rejection. Now, I can conceive of no virtue in such a selective process, and all can perceive that sense of injustice and inequality which will inevitably arise in the breasts of those and their relatives who are required to go because of that discrimination by the military authorities, which conscripts him and dismisses his neighbor. If, on the contrary, the man excused from service was at once drafted into something useful and necessary, because he was skilled in the art to which he was assigned, they would not entertain, to the same degree at least, that feeling of unjust discrimination which ripens into discontent and impairs the morale of the soldier.

I can not find in this bill anything which establishes that system which I understand to be the English system now and which we are supposedly imitating. Now, that is precisely the volunteer service as its opponents contend. What difference does it make to the man who serves whether the slacker of whom he complains is a slacker by his own volition or by the direction of the Government? Does it not produce the same feeling of inequality? How, then, are you going to avoid by the enactment of this bill the very thing which is contended for as the fundamental difference between the draft and the volunteer system? You can not do it.

Let me turn for a moment, Mr. President, to the exemptions in this bill—and I shall run over them as hurriedly as possible.

The civil officers and employees of the United States are exempted. It is then declared that—

> Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-organized religious sect or organization, at present organized and existing, whose creed forbids its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed of said religious organization.

There, Mr. President, is an exemption which is rank injustice. Why should those entertaining convictions against war be divided into those who belong to denominations and those who do not? How will this exemption operate? Let me illustrate. I will suppose that my distinguished friend the Senator from Illinois has a son within the age covered by this bill. He does not belong to any church or religious denomination, but all his convictions are against service in war. They are as deep-seated and as profound as those of any church member in the world; yet he must go into the ranks. My friend from Utah has a son possessed of the same convictions and affiliates with a sect or organization whose creed forbids its members to participate in war. He is exempted from military service; not because of his convictions, but because of his church connection. Does the history of the volunteer service reveal any discrimination more monstrous than this?

I do not believe, Mr. President, if you are to have universal service, we should make any exemptions at all except public officials of States and the Nation and the mentally and physically unfit. I do not believe that in universal service a man should be exempted because he thinks war a horrible thing any more than the man who does not think so. Each is a citizen, invested with a citizen's duties. Exemptions like these breed hypocrisy and falsehood. But if you are going to make this exemption, be just and include all whose consciences prohibit their participation in acts of war, in bloodshed, in militarism, whether defensive or offensive, and do not limit your exemption to those who are fortunate enough to be identified with some religious denomination of similar creed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have in mind to ask the Senator from Colorado more than one question with regard to the section which he is now considering and which I think is radically wrong, as I shall endeavor to point out at some future time, although I am not opposed to conscription; but the thing I now desire to ask the Senator from Colorado, who is a member of the Military Committee, is this: Why did the committee adopt——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, let me interrupt the Senator by saying that illness prevented me from attending the meetings of the committee on this bill, save one, and consequently I wish he would address himself to those who are more familiar with its details.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will address myself directly to the judgment of the Senator from Colorado. The military service act of Great Britain adopts an entirely different criterion upon the point being discussed by the Senator from Colorado, and permits an individual whose conscientious scruples against fighting or against combative service to be relieved. I call that to the attention of the Senator from Colorado to emphasize what he just said about the injustice and apparent want of necessity of requiring that the man who is to be relieved shall belong to a religious organization whose creed is opposed to fighting. Great Britain has not adopted any such criterion.

Mr. THOMAS. I think I have stated that I could not conceive any reason for the distinction. There may be a practical one.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The language in the bill is the language which has been in every military bill that has been enacted since colonial days. I think it was first used during the War of 1812. The other proposition of exempting an individual who has conscientious scruples against serving was not brought to the attention of the committee, as I remember it, and the committee followed the language that has been used always in military legislation in this country.

As the Senator says, the military act of Great Britain does provide for individuals who have conscientious scruples, and it provides a tribunal which shall determine as to the justice or the reasonableness of the claim of the individual. That might not be a bad idea in this bill, but Senators and Members in Congress insist on following tradition and following the precedents heretofore established in this legislation, and the committee did that in this bill. It may not be broad enough, but that was what moved the committee to adopt the language which has been discussed in Congress for years, and which was finally crystallized in the statutes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to hear what the Senator has said, but I supposed we were attempting to profit by the wisdom of Great Britain and France and other countries.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, measurably; but we did not have those acts before us when the bill was prepared. I will say to the Senator with reference to the selective draft that there must be some method of selection, because there are, perhaps, 6,000,000 men who would be subject to the draft in this country. We are not liable to need that number of men now. Under the volunteer system they would go out from the factories and the fields and farms, from the industrial plants and from behind counters. That has been the history of all countries. Patriotic young men would enter the Army and cripple the industrial life of the country.

The purpose of this selective proposition was to leave those men in groups behind. They are to be drafted into the service as well as anybody else. The President will say, under the regulations prepared, "Here is a group of men engaged in munitions factories who shall be exempted; they are serving their country when they stay at their forges and do the work the country needs." So it is with other groups of individuals who may be needed in industrial life. I have heard it said on the floor of the Senate, but I forget, how many hundreds of thousands of men went from the factories and munitions plants and other industrial life in Great Britain who were finally brought from the trenches and put back into the industrial life to manufacture the very munitions and clothing which the troops needed. Those men were thus doing just as much for their country, and probably more, than the men in the trenches themselves.

Mr. CUMMINS. Ought not their compensation to be reduced to $15 a month, then, during the war?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is aside from the question. If I had my way, in time of war every man would serve his country for nothing—not only the enlisted men but the officers as well. That gets away from the idea of a mercenary army and puts everybody on the volunteer system. If I had my way, I would make them serve and let the Government keep them, and give them nothing for it; but I will not have my way. In all human probability Congress, instead of placing all on an equality of maintenance and support while serving the Government, will raise the pay of all.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. I am very anxious to get through. I want to be as courteous to these Senators——

Mr. FALL. I simply want to ask the Senator from Oregon a question, in view of his statement.

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. As it is necessary to encourage some of these men who serve their country in munitions factories, would he apply the same rule of nonpayment to a man in a munitions factory that he would apply, if he had his way, to the man in the ranks?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hardly think so, Mr. President.

Mr. FALL. Why not, if one is to be called and the other is left, and they are to render equal service to their country? The Senator would not allow anything to the man who is offering his life. Why should he allow anything to the man who is simply giving the work of his hands?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The man who is working in the industrial plant, unless the Government is operating it, is supposed to be making a profit for the owners.

Mr. FALL. Then I would go further than the Senator, if necessary, and commandeer the plants and take the profits, or see that there were none.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It may come to a point where that will have to be done.

Mr. FALL. If we are going to have nonpayment for work let us commence there.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator, if the Government has to commandeer these plants I do not see why they should not be placed on the same basis.

Mr. FALL. I am not indulging in heroics, but I am willing to serve without my salary as a Member of Congress if the Senator will join me, providing that other people also in the service of their country shall also surrender their emoluments and pay.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am willing to measure my patriotism with that of the Senator from New Mexico. Whenever the Senator——

Mr. FALL. I have no reflection to make upon the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield further?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall here insert the exemption clauses of the British military act, exclusive of the procedure for their operation:

CERTIFICATES OF EXEMPTION.

2. (1) An application may be made at any time before the appointed date to the local tribunal established under this act by or in respect of any man for the issue to him of a certificate of exemption from the provisions of this act—

(a) On the ground that it is expedient in the national interests that he should, instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in other work in which he is habitually engaged or in which he wishes to be engaged or, if he is being educated or trained for any work, that he should continue to be so educated or trained; or

(b) On the ground that serious hardship would ensue, if the man were called up for army service, owing to his exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position; or

(c) On the ground of ill-health or infirmity; or

(d) On the ground of a conscientious objection to the undertaking of combatant service.

Of course, I understand that the exemption to which I was addressing myself when interrupted is a rescript of former statutes. But as we are getting away from tradition I see no reason why, when we burn our bridges behind us, we should not keep pressing forward and give the man having conscientious scruples outside of a church the same consideration as the man having the same conscientious scruples inside of a church.

Now, let me refer briefly to some of the other exemptions. The original bill, what is called the committee print, is precisely that of the bill reported, except that the exemptions of all persons engaged in agriculture were not mentioned. That was inserted by the committee, and the Senate will notice that it is without limitation as to the class. Everybody engaged in agriculture may be exempt if the authorities see fit in this proposed scheme of universal service to say so. And they need not require the farmers to continue their pursuit after the exemption. I do not know why this far-reaching exemption was inserted, unless to placate the farmers of the Nation. That might quiet their opposition, but it is not fair to the balance of the Nation who remain subject to the provisions of the law, nor do I think it is fair that they should enjoy especial privileges in a time of great emergency. It is not fair to the agricultural community, because if the son of John Jones, farmer, is exempted, and the son of Reuben Jones, farmer, is conscripted, there is an inequality as glaring, if not more so, than any that you can detect in the volunteer system. Why should a partial selection be made from an entire industrial interest, perhaps the largest in the country, which may be excused in toto if the President shall so determine? Will you excuse those raising wheat and conscript those raising corn? Will you make selections from both? How shall you exercise the right of selection so that he who is called may not curse you for choosing him and relieving his neighbor's boy?

I can not reconcile these provisions, Mr. President, with what is said to be the purpose and the object of the bill. To my mind they are replete with trouble, with far-reaching trouble, the certain outgrowth of that discrimination to flow from the fact that we need but a small percentage of the men who will be subject to this law, and especially when we consider that there is nothing in the bill which authorizes the Government after a man has been exempted to draft him for the pursuit in which he is engaged or to compel him to take up some other and as a conscript contribute his service to the common cause.

It is true the volunteer system produces the inequalities to which the Senator refers, but the selective principle can be applied to the volunteer system of enlistments quite as readily as it can to any other. Canada is doing so. It should always be done, except where the entire force of the Nation coming within the age limit is required for military duty.

But I must proceed. Among those who are subject to exemption are "the physically and morally deficient." We have heard much about the slackers. The term has become one of reproach. In many instances it is justified and in many more it is not. Nevertheless it is a term of reproach. Is the slacker morally deficient? Who are the morally deficient? Can any man answer? Will any two men give the same definition? A man who can without any injury to himself enlist and does not do so when his country needs him is morally deficient in the opinion of many. We can mention many other classes of moral deficients. We are told—and I think it is true—that it is, generally speaking, the morally deficient who do not enlist, except from a spirit of adventure or where the probabilities for its speedy gratification are great. But under the provisions of this act, if it becomes a law, the very classes it is designed to reach can be exempted from the operation of its provisions. And the so-called slacker will escape anyhow. I venture the assertion, so far as the morally deficient are concerned, there are more of them beyond than below the age of 25 years.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I simply want to ask the Senator from Colorado if the conscription plan is put into effect why not remove the entire age limit and make a selection from conscripts everywhere and allow them to go on the pay roll when they are called to duty. I would say that I would favor a plan of that kind myself, using reasonable judgment in the matter.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not care to discuss that, because it has been referred to several times heretofore, and I think the reasons which have been given for the age limitations of the bill, while not convincing to me, are probably conclusive, since we need but a small proportion of our man power. Certain it is that the limit robs the bill to all claim of establishing universality of service. Nevertheless, it is beyond question a discrimination between men within a certain age limit and men without it, particularly where the same limit is not applied to those who may volunteer under the provisions of the law.

When so many exemptions appear in this measure and opportunity given for many more, when whole classes of the community are included in them, do we not see abundant opportunity for the exercise of political influence in securing the recognition of the claims of those who do not wish to serve? There is not a man within the sound of my voice, there is not a Member of either House who, under the provisions of the bill as it stands, will not be besieged to use his influence, to use every exertion possible, to secure exemption from the operation of the law, and especially in view of the admitted fact that a comparatively small percentage of those included will be needed. The result will be that those who would volunteer will be drafted and those who would not volunteer will stay at home.

So I think, Mr. President, the bill, irrespective of the fundamental objections to it, should be amended so as to make it in some measure what it purports to be—a system of universal selective service, combined with authority to the President to assign those exempted to other fields of effort and to conscrip them for those purposes when qualified to serve therein.

Now, Mr. President, let me say a word about existing laws upon the subject under consideration, and I am through. I do not think the volunteer system has been given a fair or any serious trial since the beginning of this war. In 1914 at the request of the administration we passed the volunteer law. I have it here. It was approved on the 25th day of April, 1914, and was enacted at the request and with the approval of the General Staff. It provides for the raising of volunteer forces and their organization and maintenance during the existence of war or when war is imminent, and only after the Congress shall have authorized the President to raise such a force.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to call the Senator's attention to this fact. When the national defense act was before Congress the Senator will remember what a desperate fight the friends of that very act made on the floor of the Senate to have section 56 retained in the bill. Now, the object of section 56 was to make applicable in time of peace the volunteer act of 1914, and the Senate voted it down.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator will remember, if I may interrupt him, that in that controversy he and I were in perfect accord——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am only calling the Senator's attention to it because he is disposed to criticize this bill now because the volunteer act of 1914 seems to him to have been abandoned when Congress itself turned it down.

Mr. THOMAS. No; the Senator mistakes my purpose. I am not now criticizing either the committee or the pending bill. What I want to suggest is that we have not been asked to legislate so as to make the volunteer bill effective. If that had been done, the emergency provisions of that measure, many of which are very commendable, would have been put in full force and effect, and we would then have had a test for volunteers which we have not now and have not had under the provisions of the existing law. The present campaign for recruits is not attracting volunteers nor appealing to the volunteer spirit of the country. I think, Mr. President, we should give, as we can give under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], full play to the operation of that spirit which I know exists. Had we done so, the enlistment of volunteers would have reached high tide long ago and demonstrated the futility of this bill. And we should make Army life more attractive. Instead of asking men to serve for nothing, the sentiment behind which I cordially approve, we should do what Canada has done, what Great Britain has done, and increase the pay now received by the American soldier. We should also make more wholesome provision for his vocational education in times of peace. We should diminish the chasm of caste which yawns between the commissioned officer and the man. By such methods we can attract all the volunteers we shall ever need.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator just a moment in this part of his argument?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think one reason for the increase of pay of the enlisted man in Canada and the provisions made for the care of his family was that the volunteer system took men who ought not to have been compelled to go. It took men with families; it took men with dependents; it took men who were very much needed at home. Under that condition of things, which is guarded against in this measure, it was almost essential that the Government should either pay the men more or else make a charitable institution of the whole Government and take care of its people.

Mr. THOMAS. Granting all that, Mr. President, I affirm that the selective principle can be made as applicable to the volunteer system as to any other. Canada has been doing so for some time.

Mr. President, I have spoken longer than I intended, largely because of the interruptions, which were very opportune, but which necessarily have protracted the discussion. I have endeavored to give some of the reasons why the amendments proposed by the minority of the committee should be incorporated into this bill, and why the bill in some of its details is radically and fundamentally defective, and why the bill should be postponed to the test of the American volunteer system of Army creation. I have by no means exhausted the subject, but I have done.

I do not flatter myself that I have convinced my associates, but I have discharged a duty to myself at least in spreading my view upon the RECORD, in reply to the thousands of communications with which I have been flooded from the advocates and the opponents of this measure since it was given a place upon the calendar.

Your bill may secure a majority here. It may become a statute, and as such the basis of our future military policy. If so, I trust that it may not, as I fear it will, profoundly alter the structure of our Government, substitute enforced service for the time-honored, Anglo-Saxon principle of voluntary duty; subject the citizenry of a Republic to the domination of the War Department, displace our Regular Army, and plant the seeds of militarism in the soil of our institutions. For this the military hierarchy have long striven; for this those who do not trust the people have long been striving. The Nation's supreme crisis is their opportunity, and well are they taking advantage of it.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I have received so many communications from different parts of the country, and especially from the good people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, opposing or approving the present stand of the administration in the international crisis that I desire very briefly to put into the RECORD a few of the reasons which impel me to support the administration, and do it heartily so long as it takes no backward step.

I do not believe there is a Member of this body whose dread of war is more profound than mine, and it is precisely because I want peace above everything else in the world that I shall vote for universal military training and service.

I can see no peace for us or anyone else until the present war is ended in the way we would have it end, and if I am right about this, it is high time that we assisted those who are fighting our battles.

Our forefathers brought with them to this country the gospel of democracy, but they brought it in their powder horns, and it is my belief that no purer, holier stuff was ever made than the powder which those old Concord farmers used at Lexington. It is up to us to emulate their example whenever it is necessary.

From the very beginning the issue of peace or war has been above and beyond the control of the President. He is not to be blamed for the conditions which exist to-day, or praised for the conditions which existed on the 7th of November last. As long as the central powers believed they could accomplish their purposes by victories on the land, they found it expedient and easy to keep us out of the war; but when they realized that their only chance of ultimate victory lay in the starvation of one or more of their enemies, they immediately put us into the war, and to-day our case is precisely that of Belgium.

In August, 1914, the central powers notified Belgium that if she would surrender her neutral rights on the land she would be unharmed.

A few weeks ago we received notice from the central powers that if we would surrender our neutral rights on the sea we would be unharmed.

Our case is that of Belgium, and our cause is the same. It is a cause as old as justice—a cause for which every liberty-loving Teuton as well as Saxon has fought for more than 15 centuries—and the fact now is that the atrocious methods adopted by the armies of the central powers have brought down upon the heads of those responsible the righteous indignation of the whole world.

In my opinion our position as a Nation is unassailable. The heart and conscience of the great mass and body of the German people bitterly opposed the leadership that started the war. Anyone who will look at the RECORD of the last week of July, 1914, will find abundant corroboration of this statement. I have here some editorial comments from the great liberal German paper, the Vorwärts, representing probably 60 per cent or more of the real will of the German people. That journal took a very definite stand, and I desire to call now the attention of the Senate to two or three expressions found in its editorials on July 25, 1914, the week preceding the declaration of war.

War fury unrestrained by Austrian imperialism is setting out to bring death and destruction to the whole of Europe.

Four days later, on July 29, it denounced the German foreign office for not accepting England's mediation proposal in the following language:

The camarilla of war lords is working with absolutely unscrupulous means to carry out their fearful designs to perpetrate an international war and to start a world-wide fire to devastate Europe.

On July 31, when it was evident that nothing could stay the guilty Hohenzollerns and Hapsburgs in their lust for war, the Vorwärts declared that the German Government was "utterly without conscience." Moreover, mass meetings were held in the great cities throughout the Empire, protesting the insane and brutal course of the Government. In Berlin alone, on the 29th of July, 28 mass meetings were held. At one of them there were more than 70,000 men in attendance. These were spontaneous meetings, called for the purpose of registering the protest of the German people against the "crime that the German rulers were about to commit."

Only a few years ago the master of Germany declared our Monroe doctrine to be a piece of "incredible impertinence." More recently Herr Barnhardi and Chancellor Bethmann-Hollweg stated the Imperial German world policy in the following language: "Necessity knows no law. The injustices we thus commit—in Belgium—we will repair as soon as our military object has been obtained," and that object is to "expand our frontiers for the accommodation of our surplus population."

In carrying out this plan the central powers have filled the world with spies and lies. They have maimed, murdered, robbed, raped, burned, and buried Christian men and women for the express purpose of stealing their land. This is the "kultur" of the German war lords and the creed of his satanic majesty.

The central powers overlook the fact that the natural law of evolution which, in the absence of reason, decrees the survival of the brutally fit, deals with one individual at a time and with individuals only. Cooperation and respect for the rights of others make nations possible, and the time has come when international cooperation is as necessary for the peace and prosperity of the world as national cooperation has been necessary for the peace and prosperity of a nation. The marvelous economic advances of the last century have obliterated national boundaries except for political purposes. Commercial evolution is already international; moral and intellectual evolution and growth are international.

More than a century ago that great German, Emmanuel Kant, said that the world would never have peace until the nations of the world could politically organize to enforce peace. But in these days, when international cooperation in politics is suggested, we are told by our statesmen that it would mean entangling alliances, and the historic advice of Washington in this regard is quoted as concluding the argument. We hear, too, the thoughtless exclamations, "Human nature is always the same; men always have fought and they always will," and so forth.

I have great respect for the advice given us by the Father of his Country, but Washington did not hesitate to enter into an alliance with France, and this great man once said, "Mankind when left to themselves are unfit for government." We must have more courage than this to-day. The instant we admit that the international mind should be a reasonable mind all our fears vanish. There are as many kinds of human nature as there are human beings, and all of them are constantly changing, and most of them are changing for the better. It is true that they all swing on the pivot of selfishness, and probably always will, and for this very reason international peace is possible. If everybody is on the make and aggressive, war does not pay anybody; cooperation in the interests of peace is the only thing possible with reasonable beings.

It is our business now to help stem the tide of barbarism until sanity is restored to central Europe.

But patriotic declamations and declarations will not do this. Appropriations of money do not win battles. Fortunately for us, the British fleet up to date has kept the devastating hordes of central Europe from our shores, but it will be criminal neglect for us to ignore the possibility of attack. The sea, instead of protecting us against the enemy, as has heretofore been the case, may now be used to hide and conceal hostile ships and permit them to select their point of attack without let or hindrance.

We do not want to back into this war with the idea that we can get out more easily. We must make common cause with those who are fighting our enemies. We must expect to see it through, and we must expect our allies to stand by until the end. We must give and receive assurances that will permit no misunderstanding in this regard. But to do this we may need soldiers as well as talkers, and soldiers enough to insure victory now and freedom from attack in the future.

Soldiering is a hazardous occupation at the best, and soldiers untrained and unequipped are worse than useless. If we must fight, we must win, and we can not expect to do this if we send our young men into the field unfitted for the work to be done. It seems to me very clear that the more men we train the surer will be the ultimate victory and the longer the succeeding peace. I can see no danger in strength in a just cause. Weakness is always powerless for good.

Now, it is clear to me that universal military training is the first step necessary if reason is to win the victory over cruelty and greed. When the right ceases to resist it ceases to exist. We do not fear the skilled surgeon, though he deals with deadly weapons. We welcome him into our community, because he is a protection against death and disease. Why should we fear military skill if we are sure of its purpose? We should let it be known that our goal is international peace based upon justice to all men. No more wars of conquest, but constant wars against it, if need be.

It is not many years since England was the ally of Turkey and her purpose was to prevent Russian aggression. Twenty years ago our statesmen were warning us against the Russian advance—the Slavic peril. Ten years ago it was the yellow peril, inspired by Germany. Russia and China are now democracies, the last thing on earth that our statesmen expected and the best possible thing for the peace of the world. Within a fortnight after Russia rid herself of ridiculous and dangerous czardom she told the nations of the earth that she stood squarely against aggression. She did not want Constantinople. She wanted peace and justice to all men, and she would fight for that to the last man, and nothing else.

The unselfish course we have taken in world politics has compelled the admiration of other nations, and if we remain loyal to that course the other nations must follow our example. Our remission of the Chinese indemnity, our freedom of Cuba and the Philippines, a work of pure philanthropy unequaled in the history of the world, Mr. Blaine's efforts in 1890 to secure the consent of the Latin-American countries to eliminate the right to title by conquest from the international laws of the Western Hemisphere, and our consistent forbearance with weak and semicivilized States, are things to be proud of. If, however, the square deal for nations as well as men is to be our watchword, there must be no doubt of our strength to resist aggression and injustice, and now is the time for us to reaffirm our international policy and put ourselves in a position to maintain it. Now is our opportunity to secure the cooperation of the world in the maintenance of our Monroe doctrine and encourage the extension of its vital principle throughout the world. We may well hope, and, I think, expect that England and France and Russia and Italy and Japan and the Americas will henceforth stand together for peace and intellectual, moral, and economic cooperation in so far as varying conditions will permit.

And we may legitimately expect great benefits at home in the immediate by-products of universal military training. Among these benefits will be better health for the rising generations. Fifty per cent or more of the present one is physically defective. We may expect greater respect for law and order and a keener sense of duty to neighbor and country. The intermingling of rich and poor in impartial and mutual service will result in a clearer conception of the duty which the fortunate owe to the less fortunate.

There is nothing too high or noble for us to attempt, and nothing we may fail to accomplish if we are in a position—if we are strong enough—to support our ideals as the occasion may require.

If the training is universal then the service must be universal. Universal training with voluntary service only would be absurd.

I realize that universal training and service is somewhat in the future. We can not expect to put this law for universal training and service into practical application so that it will produce armies containing any great number of men within the year or possibly within the two years, and it is quite likely that for our immediate needs some modification of the system should permit volunteers to a certain extent; and while I am in favor of selective conscription, I should hope that the system adopted by Congress would permit at least 100,000 men, if we have them and they are needed, to organize as volunteers.

I will call the attention of the Senate to an incident which has come to my knowledge recently in support of the position of those who would permit at this time the organization of a certain number of volunteers. A boy brought up within a stone's throw of where I live read about the war, took a great interest in it, and became convinced more than two years ago that France was fighting our battle and that it was his duty to enlist. So he went to France with a brother—two of them. You may have noticed in the metropolitan press two weeks ago that Douglas Dodge, of Weatogue, Conn., was awarded the war cross for special bravery in service. This boy inherited from his father a large fortune. His father is now dead. His mother is the president of the American Antisuffrage Society. But this is only one instance of many that could be noted of American boys going to the front. You may have noticed that a boy from Texas led the assault at Vimy with the American flag tied to his bayonet.

If it is necessary for us to send immediately some men to the front, I hope that we shall send a sample that those who follow must emulate and who will demonstrate to the world the danger of defying the United States; and I sincerely hope that the committee will agree to some amendment that will provide for what may be the immediate necessities of the situation, will permit volunteer service to a limited degree, because there is something about those boys—the one I have mentioned and the twenty or thirty thousand that may be there—that lifts them above any other service which you may expect to get. They have the right stuff in them, and plenty of it, and we are proud of them.

But if the war continues we must resort to universal training and service, and I have become firmly convinced that the Nation has everything to gain—physically, morally, and economically—by remaining loyal to the spirit of the fathers in deed as well as speech.

But in our haste to indulge in universal military training let it be clearly understood that the needs of the hour are transportation and food. The administration will be blind, indeed, if it does not see that just now we should concentrate all our energies upon escaping or sinking submarines and raising crops. The future peace of the world and the fate of democracy may depend upon the use we make of the present planting season. Every State and every county and town should organize a planting campaign and march to the front in double-quick time, and every man in every community should do his bit with money or muscle to help feed the heroes who are fighting our battles in the trenches of France. A famine in England next winter means surrender, and surrender means death and despair for tens of millions of brave men and women, and it may mean 20 years of war for the United States. If the central powers should win a temporary victory; if we should allow France and Belgium and England to bear this cross alone, and they should fail, there are few men in this country who will dare say that it would not mean from 10 to 20 years of war in the near future.

If the American women want to win the gratitude and admiration of the world and save their boys from the horrors of war, let them make the vegetable garden the fashionable salon for the season of 1917. The handsomest, bravest, sweetest women in the world to-day are the English and French girls in trousers and caps making munitions for their husbands and brothers and sweethearts at the front.

For more than two years we looked for our duty in a thrifty, indifferent neutrality, and we failed to find it there. For more than two years we tried to convince ourselves that cowardice is a virtue, and we failed again for obvious reasons. We see our duty now. We must train our boys to defend their country, and we must feed and equip the boys that are already at the front, if we would avoid bitter tears of regret and long years of conflict.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I propose an amendment, which I ask to have printed and to lie upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, whatever opinion may be held by the people as to the cause of the European war and as to the wisdom or unwisdom of the conduct of this administration in connection with the European belligerents during the two years and eight months prior to the recognition by Congress of a state of war between the United States and Germany, there can now be no difference of opinion between patriotic Americans on the question of the duty of the United States to anticipate by the most immediate intelligent action every reasonably possible emergency which it may meet in that war. What has been written has been written and it is now the highest duty of loyalty to democracy, unprejudiced by the past, uncontrolled by partisanship and uninfluenced by passion or weakly sentiment to understand the present and prepare to meet what may prove to be the supreme test of the Republic. That our Government and its institutions are threatened, no thoughtful, intelligent man will deny. That the United States must win in this most vital crisis of history is as important as is the survival of democracy and its concomitants.

Nearly 150 years ago the fathers lighted on these shores the fires of democracy, and they have been kept burning with increasing brightness until this hour. Their effulgent beams have been the beacon which has joyfully attracted the seeker for liberty and the lover of freedom from every section of the globe. By this light other nations have read their duty to mankind and freedom has been extended to other lands. But not all who have watched our fires have been grateful for their blessed light and warmth. Self-styled divine monarchs have realized that democracy was the mortal enemy of monarchy, and the effulgence of the former has filled them with a hatred uncompromising and a dread indefinable. By our beacon light our enemies have studied our weaknesses and have profited by them, so that while our Republic has demonstrated its true greatness it has at the same time disclosed its defects. Not the least of these defects has been the fact that in the midst of ravenous wolves we have left our human flock unprotected. We now know that we must strengthen our fold pending the time we are destroying these enemies of peace and progress. Our past neglect of preparation has rendered our present duty difficult and expensive. Further delay and procrastination now is certain to mean disaster if not destruction later. It is unfortunate that we failed in time of peace to prepare for the complete and unquestioned protection of our country. At such a time the preparation would have been less expensive; it would have been more intelligently effective; it would have avoided the grave and dangerous problems which now confront us; but again I am reminded that the past is gone. From the extravagant school of experience, however, we may acquire some wisdom. Our duty is here and now, and it is not too late to overcome some of the effects of error.

I am inexpressibly depressed when I think of the distressing possibilities which may come—aye, some of them must come even under the most favorable conditions—as a result of the war in which we are now engaged. The tax burdens which will test our industries; the want, privations, and sufferings. But I am somewhat revived by the thought that out of it will come a national and individual economy essential to the true progress of a nation and its people, which has been retarded to a great extent by that soul-destroying spirit of extravagance born of a desire for wealth, ease, luxury, and irresponsibility. I can see a new birth of patriotism essential to the life of the Republic. I can see democracies erected on the ruins of monarchies. I can see a world regenerated somewhat by the baptism of blood. But whatever shall be the cost of this war in terms of suffering, blood, and treasure, there is but one course for the United States Government to take at this time, and that is to mobilize its every resource to meet any emergency. The very present duty before Congress is to raise and equip an army. Without a dissenting vote in either House the largest appropriation for military and naval preparation ever known in the history of any nation has been provided, and we are now properly debating the question of how to raise the strongest and most efficient army possible.

I confess my deficient knowledge of the technical and yet controlling questions of army organization. I am unfamiliar even with the rank and duties of officers. My efforts and experience have been confined to the work of peace. I had almost believed that it was impossible for our great peace-loving country to engage in a European war. I am now, however, awake to the fact that I am a Member of that branch of the Government which is charged with the awful duty of preparing for entrance into the greatest war the world has ever known. At such a time and under such conditions I am inclined to give more weight to the opinions of men trained and experienced in matters of warfare. For 14 years I voted the people's money for support of the West Point and Annapolis Academies. I did it with the undoubting belief that war and war preparation was at once a science and an art to be mastered as other technical matters are mastered. In constructing a skyscraper, a suspension bridge, or a railroad we follow the advice of skilled architects and engineers rather than the advice of laymen, however honest or friendly. Only the learned and experienced scholar can write an authoritative textbook on mathematics. Only the trained and highly educated surgeon is trusted to perform major operations. In fact, our civilization is largely based upon the advice and leadership of experts who have specialized and whose knowledge and experience entitle them to advise and lead.

I know of no place in our social, political, or national economy where this rule is more applicable than in war. All the others deal either with material things or with isolated individuals. But war involves the resources and lives of a whole people. Nations are the objects of its operations. The present war is the most gigantic of history. Its methods are largely new. Only military and naval genius comprehends it, and so when nations centuries old are being toppled over as houses of cards, when free institutions are threatened with destruction, when mistakes of patriotic ignorance means additional death and disaster, I must look for knowledge to guide me in this fateful hour to the men our country has trained to advise and lead at such a time. I know that experts do not always agree and that theory sometimes is impeached by experience, but when theory and practice without an authoritative exception agree my duty becomes clear. Fortunately at this time those men who have been educated by the Government at West Point and Annapolis agree with the similarly unanimous opinion of those experienced soldiers who were not educated at our academies but in the camp and on the battle field. When all these square their theories with the experience of all nations, and especially with that of the nations of Europe, who have been warring for the last two years and eight months, I am bound by every dictate of duty to my country to ignore the advice of laymen when opposed to that of those who know.

I am not going to delay the Senate by recounting the history of our country's experience with volunteers. All of our wars have been fought at their beginning by volunteers, but at what a cost of life and treasure. Due to the mistaken policy which our Government has always followed, it has been necessary to enter all wars with untrained, poorly equipped soldiers, and so far as efficiency is concerned it has made, and will now make, little difference whether the voluntary or draft system was or shall be employed, except perhaps that with the same previous preparation the enlisted man is generally a better soldier than the conscript for the reason that he is more patriotic. But no great war ever was fought or ever will be fought largely by volunteers. Conscription must come, as it always has come, and in the end both patriotism and efficiency, aye, democracy itself, demand that equality of governmental benefits shall require equality of service and responsibility.

I have but little more patience with the man who is now talking of immediately sending an American army to Europe when we have no army to send and can have none fit to send within a year than I have for him who would, in terms, limit military service to the United States. Whatever army is raised must be mustered for service during the war and for whatever field the emergencies of war may select. Our present duty is to raise and equip an army as quickly and equitably as possible. Personally I believe that army will not be called to foreign shores, but at any rate its soldiers will have from 8 to 12 months' training before such an event can happen. How shall such an army be raised? It appears that nearly everybody believes in universal military and industrial training, but such training does not at present exist, and hence that principle can not aid our country now in creating an army; that is, such training can not be employed technically to fit our soldiers. If, however, it is established, it will be an inspiration to patriotism by inducing men to think of duty as well as privilege. I shall not occupy time now to discuss universal training. That it is right every patriotic, right-thinking man seems to admit; but the fact is an army must be provided now, and it will be composed at the start of untrained men. God grant that my opinion that it will never be called upon to make the supreme sacrifice, and certainly that it will not be within the year, shall be verified.

I am in accord with the men whose opinions are entitled to highest consideration that selective conscription is the fairest and most democratic method to employ. It is in harmony with universal training in this, viz, it recognizes the duty of universal service.

I am not, however, in accord with that provision of the bill which fixes the minimum and maximum ages of the conscript. I would like to have a census of all men in the United States between the ages of 16 and 70. I would then classify all of them as to special fitness for service to the United States. I know, as every thoughtful man knows, that our success in this war will depend not more upon our Army and Navy than upon our ability to feed and clothe, equip and maintain, our people and that Army and Navy. Not only that but the necessities of those countries which are fighting with us against a common foe are depending upon us for food and other supplies. A duty thus devolves upon our every citizen to serve in the manner for which he is best fitted. It would be an expensive if not a fatal mistake to permit men and boys to leave those necessary employments for which they are fitted without at least putting in their places others equally efficient. After making such a selection, I would list all those remaining men between the ages of 21 and 45 who are physically fit and from that list, equitably apportioned among the States, I would draw by lot the number of men required for an army. The rich and the poor, the patriot and the shirker, all would be placed on an equal footing as to liability for service.

The patriot with red blood in his veins shrinks at the word "conscript," because he feels that it would disgrace him to be compelled to serve while his comrade volunteers. If all were drafted, this humiliation would not exist.

There are millions of fathers and mothers in this country who raised their sons to be soldiers if soldiers were necessary to the honor and preservation of their country, but they feel that other boys like theirs should be subject to the same duties and obligations. They are willing and anxious that their loved ones should bear their share and only their share of the national defense. It is improbable that all of the men of military age and fitness will be taken into the Army. Not 1 in 12 can serve, but every one of the 12 should be subject to conscription. If, however, the volunteer service is employed, only the conscientious and patriotic will enlist, and they are of the very best of our people.

I see no valid reason why physically fit men up to 45 should not be liable to army service. They have had 26 years more of the benefits of government than has the boy of 19. Many of these men want to serve. Many of them have had valuable experience in the Spanish War and in the militia. They would enlarge the field of eligibles and lessen the chance of each individual citizen to draft. You ask the boy to fight for the uncertain future. You deny the man an opportunity to repay the certain advantages which he has already enjoyed.

It is barely possible that our boys under age may be called to the colors later, but at present it is not necessary and they should be allowed to finish their education, their apprenticeship in trade, their preparation for life. I have received many letters from fathers asking that they be permitted to serve in place of their boys. No worthy reason has been presented to me why this should not be done. I expect to offer an amendment to this end if no one else does.

Mr. BRADY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him at this point?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. BRADY. I wish to offer a suggestion at this time relative to the very splendid argument the Senator is making. I should like to have the Senator give an expression as to his viewpoint relative to exemptions from service as well as the limit of years. The pending bill provides, as the Senator is well aware, for those from 19 to 25. An amendment has been offered including those from 18 to 35. The Senator suggests that he will probably offer an amendment embracing those from 21 to 45. I should like to have the Senator express himself as to what he thinks the exemption should be from that selective conscription service.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have already stated that first I would classify all of our people. A man who is well at 70 years of age can render distinctive service to the country. I know there are many men in this country who are prepared to do certain work for the Government on the farms or in various industries who would not be fit for field service. I have purposely increased the age to 70 for industrial or domestic service, but have confined my military list to the ages between 21 and 45. From that, if I had my way about it, I would exempt all the men between those ages who are now engaged in employment necessary for the maintenance of an army and for the maintenance of the industries of the Republic. I would keep them employed at home. I would keep certain people on the farm. I would keep people in munition factories. I would keep certain other employments busy or well filled because that is a part of the need for our success.

Mr. BRADY. I realize that, and I desire to have the Senator cover that point fully. At this time I desire to ask him whether he would have the men who are not physically fit for military service drafted for the other lines of service he suggests?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would. I would certainly not draft for military service a man who is not fit physically to serve.

Mr. BRADY. Who is not capable of rendering military service. The Senator thinks that is the object to be attained?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Quite so.

Mr. President, I realize the prejudice which attaches to the word "conscription." I would divest it of that odium by making it universal in its application. I would give every man of military age and fitness the same chance. I would not penalize patriotism for the benefit of shirkers and cowards. I would endeavor to instill in all the paramount idea of service for benefits. Only as a last resort would I call to the Army and Navy for continuous field service the boys upon whose life preparation the future progress of our Republic depends.

Whatever method for obtaining an army is employed, the Government must provide for the dependents of its soldiers, and the man in the ranks must receive greater pay than is at present provided. Those who do not enter the country's armed service must in good conscience care for those and their families who do enter it. Especially must this be done if the voluntary method is employed. I have no doubt that such a provision would stimulate enlistments. The crucial test of deciding between country and the necessities of dependent loved ones should not be applied to our men by a rich and prosperous people. The possibility of dependency should be avoided, and I believe it can be avoided.

Perhaps I have already occupied more time than I ought to have occupied. I realize that time is of the very essence of our success, but I also know that such success depends largely upon the kind of action we take now. Haste may mean irreparable waste, and Congress should not enact legislation without at least first reading the bills proposing it.

I realize that it would be more popular to advocate voluntary service, but, sir, he is an enemy of his country who courts popularity at such a time as this. Can Senators, most of whom will under any circumstance be exempt from field service, think of their political futures while providing for a war in which their constituents' lives and fortunes will be sacrificed? Mr. President, I believe I speak the true sentiments of a great majority of Senators when I say I would gladly sink into political oblivion—aye, I would unhesitatingly yield up my life—if by doing so I could alleviate the heartaches, avert the loss of life, and more speedily accomplish the success of our arms and the permanent triumph of democracy. Such a sacrifice would, of course, be insignificant. What may happen to me is unimportant; but what may happen to my country and my countrymen is all-important, and to it and them I pledge my unselfish devotion. I believe in universal military training. It can not, however, be of any service to us in this present duty, but should be inaugurated for the immediate future. I believe in universal service. Conscription approximates such service and places our citizens of all nationalities, of all stations in life, upon an equal footing. That is democracy.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, having had the honor of serving upon the committee which has had the pending measure under consideration, and having voted to report it to the Senate with a favorable recommendation, I consider it a duty to my conscience and to my country to present my reasons for such action on my part.

Moreover, having served as a volunteer myself, and having seen what I believe to be the imperfections of the system, I feel that I am in a position to comment, and that I should comment, upon the merits of the bill now before the Senate.

I have an honest conviction that the administration should be sustained in its effort to create an army of 500,000 men, in addition to the Regular Army and National Guard—now lacking about 500,000 recruits—an army where the burden of service will fall alike on all and give the Government, under its central authority, an efficient, controllable, mobile force of fighting men.

Having a proper regard and respect for the opinions of other Senators who oppose this measure, I desire to state why I believe the universal compulsory system is better, in the light of past and recent history, than the volunteer system.

As a preliminary to my remarks upon the bill itself, I desire to say with all the emphasis that I can command that I do not for a moment question the sublime valor of hundreds of thousands of patriotic Americans who in the several crises of the Nation's history have voluntarily rallied to the colors and fought and died in defense of liberty and justice. Their heroic deeds make resplendent the annals of the Republic.

Nor, in my position in this matter, have I anything but praise for the members of the National Guard, with which I was identified eight years. They, too, when the call to duty has sounded, have responded splendidly and rendered the best service of which they were capable.

For over a century Americans have been unwilling to accept the most fundamental of truths, namely, that self-preservation, with nation and individual alike, is the first law of nature. To bring about an awakening, it has been necessary for fate to turn two-thirds of the world into a maelstrom, and finally to bring this country to its very brink.

We have passed through five wars without being willing to recognize the fact that our military system was always a lamentable failure; that most of these wars were frightfully costly in blood and treasure, solely because of unpreparedness, and that, without exception, each one should have been brought to a close much sooner than it was.

Now, however, fronting the most crucial experience in our history, we are made to realize that our existing and former systems were fundamentally defective, and that to save ourselves from annihilation as a Nation, we must make a radical departure and adjust ourselves to the imperative demands of this impending crisis.

No one at all familiar with real American history can fail to recognize the fact that the conduct of the Revolutionary War by the Continental Government was wretchedly faulty, in that Congress could not give, or did not give, Washington an adequate army of properly trained soldiers to oppose the regulars sent over by the British Crown. The irregular volunteer forces placed at his disposal were almost useless, and rendered abortive all the plans of the commander in chief.

Washington, in a letter to the President of Congress, September 24, 1776, said:

> To place any dependence upon militia is assuredly resting upon a broken staff.

He also said:

> To expect, then, the same service from raw and undisciplined recruits as from veteran soldiers is to expect what never did and perhaps never will happen.

Writing October 22, 1780, Washington exclaimed, in an agony of despondency almost reaching despair:

> If we mean to continue our struggle, we must do it upon an entirely new plan. We must have a permanent force, not a force that is constantly fluctuating and sliding from under us, as a pedestal of ice would do from a statue on a summer's day, involving us in expense that baffles calculation—an expense which no funds are equal to.
> It is idle to suppose that raw and undisciplined men are fit to oppose regular troops.

Writing March 1, 1781, to Richard Henry Lee, speaker of the Virginia House of Delegates, Thomas Jefferson, then governor of that State, said:

> Whether it be practicable to raise and maintain a sufficient number of Regulars to carry on the war is a question. That it would be burdensome is undoubted, yet it is perhaps as certain that no possible mode of carrying it on can be so expensive to the public, so distressing and disgusting to individuals, as the militia.

"Light Horse Harry" Lee wrote:

> A government is the murderer of its citizens which sends them to the field uninformed and untaught, where they are to meet men of the same age and strength, mechanized by education and discipline for battle.

It is not necessary to dwell further upon the evils of the volunteer system during the Revolution, which prolonged for eight years a war which should have been determined in eight months.

The War of 1812 was so attended by blunders and humiliations that a review of its history can not fail to bring the blush of shame to the cheek of the patriotic American.

In October, 1812, a body of troops, less than 1,000 in number, crossed the St. Lawrence River to attack a British force. An engagement took place, which would have resulted in a victory for the Americans had the militia on the New York side of the river crossed to their aid. What was the result? Let McMaster, the historian, tell the story:

No sooner did the militia behold a real battle, no sooner did they see the dead brought back in the boats and hear the groans of the wounded, than fear overcame them and they refused to cross. Soldiers who the day before were clamorous to be brought face to face with what they called the British hirelings now stood on their constitutional rights and refused to help their countrymen. They were, they said, militia, and the only services for which the militia could be called out were to uphold the laws, to put down insurrection, to repel invasion. The Constitution did not give the President power to send them out of the United States, and they would not go.

Holding such views, they stood quietly on the American side, saw the British gather in force and march up the hill, saw their countrymen, overwhelmed by numbers, driven back foot by foot to the edge of the cliff and down the side of the river bank, where, as no one would row a boat across, the little band of 600 threw down their arms and surrendered. With them were captured some 300 skulkers and cowards, who had been crouching at the river edge all day.

Concerning the lamentable happenings in and about Washington in 1813 we need say little. It is a black page in American history. The Volunteer Army defending the city was routed with a loss of only 8 killed and 11 wounded. The Capitol was destroyed and the White House was sacked. The invading forces, it is said, comprised only 1,500 British troops.

So much for the "efficiency" of the volunteer system in the War of 1812!

Concerning the War with Mexico, let us quote from a modern writer, who, after commenting upon some early successes of our arms, says:

About one month later at Pueblo, his [Gen. Scott's] progress came to a sudden halt because the terms of enlistment of 7 out of his 11 best regiments were on the eve of expiring, and Scott discovered that most of the men intended to exercise the alternative offered to them upon enlistment, and to terminate their services at the end of 12 months. In the midst of a hostile country and only three days march from the capital, with virtually no enemy to oppose him, Scott was unable to budge for more than three months until he had been joined by reinforcements—all of them raw by comparison with the troops which had left him. For three months his situation was very precarious, and it was only good luck that averted a calamity. When he did fight his way into Mexico, in August, 1847, it was at a loss for which there was no justification.

Certain proponents of the volunteer system have said, and still others will say, that the Mexican War was mainly won by volunteers. This is quite true. Yet the system failed in the crisis I have indicated.

During the Civil War the inadequacy of the volunteer system was exhibited in a startling manner, especially during the early stages of the struggle. The first Battle of Bull Run demonstrated the futility of compelling raw recruits to undergo a baptism of blood. As one writer, a Northern man, says:

As a result of this battle the South was demoralized by victory and the North by defeat, and nothing further of importance occurred that year, notwithstanding that there were 437,105 more Federal troops under arms than Confederates.

A former Secretary of War, Luke E. Wright, in an address some time ago, said:

The fact is that the Confederacy in our Civil War thought that they would lick the Yankees in just a year. They gave themselves ample margin, and so they enlisted their men for 12 months. The 12 months expired and they were mistaken, woefully so; and thereupon by a conscription act all of those 12 months' men were simply blanketed into the army for the rest of war.

The Federals only gave themselves 90 days days to finish the Rebellion, and they went upon the idea of voluntary service; but at the end of 12 months they seemed to be no nearer than they were at the beginning. They had to reorganize their whole system. Then they began a system of bounties, and finally went to the system of drafting or conscription.

The occurrences of our last war, that with Spain, are familiar to all present-day Americans.

The muddling which characterized the recruiting of the volunteer army hurriedly mobilized in the spring of 1898 is ineffaceably stamped upon the memories of us all. Such a breakdown in every direction, including the Quartermaster's, the Commissary, the Ordnance, and the Medical Departments, was never before known in the annals of warfare.

The men who volunteered were brave men, patriotic men, enthusiastic men, full of the spirit of service and devoted to the sublimest ideals of citizenship.

But they were not soldiers. Many of them were office clerks, salesmen, factory operatives, raw, green, soft, thoroughly undisciplined, absolutely lacking in all the essentials of army training, ignorant of the simplest principles of hygiene and sanitation, hurriedly rushed to the front, poorly equipped and trained. And what was the result?

Is it necessary to ask? Is there any American who has not heard of the horrors of Montauk Point, of Chattanooga, of Tampa, and of the other great camps, where scores of fine young Americans, filled with an enthusiasm that was glorious, were stricken down with typhoid and other dread scourges, martyrs to a system of inefficiency?

I had some experience in the Spanish-American War with the volunteer system. I observed also the result obtained from our small Army of Regular troops, so striking in contrast both as to self-care and efficiency. I saw men of the Volunteers die by the score—brave men, useful men—whose lives could have been saved had they been safeguarded by a proper system of preparedness. I saw the best men volunteer. I saw and knew of these men broken in health because they were sent away too soon and did not receive proper food or proper care.

I saw political pull exercised to secure positions for men physically unfit and mentally unprepared to be sent to the front. I saw them receive the pay of colonels and majors—yes; of generals—while men of the Regular Army, soldiers bearing the scars of Indian battles in the conquering of the West, humbly submitted to orders and failed to rise above a captain's pay, although they had waited a lifetime for well-earned promotion.

And who was responsible for the entire failure of every phase of the mobilization program of 1898? Who was responsible for the chaos which prevailed? Who was responsible for not the comedy but the tragedy of errors which marked and marred every stage of the conduct of the war?

I remember quite distinctly that Senators upon this floor, and many gentlemen of the other House, were vigorous in their denunciations of the then Secretary of War, Gen. Alger, because, forsooth, he was not a miracle worker and failed to achieve the impossible.

Did the consciences of those men smite them, that they sought to place unmerited blame on the shoulders of the War Department's head? Did they not, down deep in their hearts, recognize what every student and writer of American history knew only too well, that it was Congress and Congress alone which, because of neglect and indifference, had permitted the country to be hurled suddenly into war, without adequate equipment for such an awful contingency?

What a catalogue of inefficiency and disaster, covering the entire period of the Nation's war history, from 1775 to 1898.

It is idle to do more than mention incidentally Great Britain's distressing experience during the early stages of the present war. Let me quote briefly from a gallant young American, Eric Fisher Wood, who, according to a recent news item, now lies in an English hospital suffering from wounds received in the recent great struggle about Arras. Addressing a Washington audience a year ago, Mr. Wood said:

Military experts agree that at the commencement of the present war the British territorial battalions were superior to our own militia regiments. They had certainly received the equivalent of more than four months' training. And yet, in spite of the desperate need of reenforcements in Flanders, no territorial battalion could be fitted to withstand the test of fire until it had received eight months' additional training. The first territorial battalion to see service did not do so until it had spent eight months in a training camp.

Mr. Wood wisely added:

Troops which have received less than one year's training are worse than useless. Their addition to a weak army only tends to make that army weaker. I repeat that it is axiomatic that troops can not be made fit for battle unless they receive more than one year of training.

The volunteer system was given a splendid test in Great Britain. After an extraordinary campaign, unparalleled in the history of the world, a considerable army was raised, but eventually a resort to conscription was found to be imperative in order to mobilize the supreme strength of the Empire against the despotic Governments of central Europe.

A remarkably illuminative picture, exhibiting the respective merits of the two military systems—the regular army and the militia—as they existed in Belgium at the beginning of the war, was shown in an address delivered in this city by Capt. Granville Fortesque, of the United States Army, as follows:

I saw the defense of Liege. I saw the ninth regiment of the line and the fourteenth regiment of the line, men who fought like lions against tremendous odds, who stood up to the last minute, giving every ounce of fight that there was in them, because they were trained and disciplined fighters, and I do not hesitate to say that it was the force developed in those trained and disciplined fighters that saved France. You all know the heroic defense of Liege. I do not have to recount the stories of splendid heroism; how they went back only foot after foot when pressed by enormous artillery superiority.

Now I am going to show you another picture. From Brussels I went down through the valley of the Meuse to Namur. The same kind of men—they were Belgians—were entrusted with the defense of Namur. When I went there dozens of officers were sitting out in front of the cafes. On inquiry I found out that these were more or less irregular troops, gardes civique and others, who had not yet come under the regular service discipline.

What happened? Two hours and a quarter after the first German gun was fired at Namur the city was surrendered. Why was not the defense at Namur as efficient and as effective as the defense of Liege? Simply because there you had militia forces operating and not the trained and disciplined regular forces of the Belgian Army.

What more can a reasonable man, a reasoning man, ask? Emblazoned upon the pages of history, in letters of undying light, so that he who runs may read, are found innumerable evidences of the failure of the volunteer system.

With history presenting so powerful, so unanswerable, an argument in favor of a regular army, supplemented by compulsory training and service, what have we, the opponents of the latter system, to present? They tell us that compulsion in our military system is an innovation. How amazingly inaccurate! In the earliest period of colonial history, in nearly every Province, the trainband system was introduced by legislative enactment. Compulsory training was exacted, and failure to report for duty on training day was punishable by fine. Wherever, as happened in some Colonies, war came, compulsory service followed compulsory training. Such, we know, was the system in Massachusetts and the other New England Colonies from their very foundation. In the first-named Colony it was provided "that every person, with certain specified exceptions, above the age of 16 is required to serve in a military capacity."

So, too, in my own State, New Jersey, in 1668 the general assembly passed an act providing for compulsory military training of all men between the ages of 16 and 60 years, and imposing fines for failure to report on mustering day. Furthermore, in 1675 another act was passed, whose opening clause was as follows:

> Forasmuch as it is requisite of necessity amongst all men to be in a posture of defense against enemies or dangers that may accrue, and especially we being invited hereunto by the insolence and outrages of the heathens in our neighboring colonies, not knowing how soon we may be surprised.

There was an illustration of preparedness which I would commend to my fellow countrymen at the present time.

I am happy to state that throughout its entire colonial history there was never a drop of blood shed in actual warfare upon New Jersey soil. Had war come, as in Massachusetts, then compulsory training would have been followed by compulsory service.

In the Province on the opposite side of the Delaware, founded by the great Quaker, Penn, the colonial legislature refused, for over half a century, to pass a military defense law.

As early as 1689, during a war scare, the provincial council, composed almost entirely of pacifists, refused to equip a military force.

There came a time when Pennsylvania was ravaged by the Indians, and men, women and children were scalped, homes were burned, crops were destroyed, and cattle were stolen. The once-peaceful land of Penn was swept by fire and deluged with blood, because no provision had been made for the training of her citizens.

Surely no one familiar with American history, early American history, will suggest that the compulsory element in military service is an innovation. In this connection, however, I am compelled to make a confession. The trainband compulsory service law was rigidly adhered to in the early history in the Colonies, or certain of them. However, human nature in the eighteenth century was very much like that of the twentieth century. There came a time when, menacing war clouds having disappeared from the sky for a time, men grew lax in their conceptions of public duty and public service. Then the compulsory-training act became practically a dead letter.

What was the result? When the War for Independence suddenly burst upon the world in 1775 the Colonies were altogether unprepared, and independence was secured only after a vast sacrifice in blood and treasure.

The criticism most frequently heard from the lips of those opposed to conscription is that the system is undemocratic. As a matter of fact, it is the very essence of democracy, which is defined as "political and social equality in general."

That nation alone enjoys pure democracy where every citizen demands equal rights and equal privileges with every other citizen. On the other hand, that nation alone enjoys pure democracy which requires equal obligations and equal duties from each of its citizens, without regard to race, color, environment, wealth, or social position.

Lincoln declared that no nation could survive which was half slave and half free. If living to-day, with this stupendous crisis facing him, he would be the first to declare that neither this nor any other people could maintain its prestige, honor and solidarity, if one-half were patriots and one-half were evaders.

A strange democracy, indeed, is that which is willing to have its battles fought alone by the enthusiastic, impulsive, red-blooded men of the Nation who volunteer their services, while a vast majority of its citizens, endowed with no such spirit of duty and sacrifice, slink and cower in the rear, far removed from even the smell of burnt powder.

A distinguished Senator said upon this floor a day or two ago, that the words "conscript" and "convict" might have a similarity in this connection.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me—I think he is referring to me—I gave what I understood to have been a statement of another, and with the comment that there was in this country, in my opinion, a sort of feeling that justified it. I did not myself draw the comparison.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understood that the Senator from Colorado quoted from another.

I find no such definition given to the word "conscript" in any standard dictionary. The Century defines it, used as an adjective, as "registered; enrolled." Employed as a noun, it simply means "one who is compulsorily enrolled for military or naval service."

There is nothing there to suggest prison stripes or a convict's cell. There is no taint or ignominy in the word "conscript" when properly employed.

If the Senator will cross the seas in imagination—he will thus be safe from German submarines—he will see a wonderfully inspiring sight "somewhere in France"—a magnificent army, whose deeds will uplift and inspire the souls of this and future generations, all of them "conscripts." I doubt if anyone would presume to designate these valiant compatriots of Lafayette as "convicts."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Notwithstanding the fact that the compulsory system has been in vogue, as the Senator from New Jersey very properly says, since the earliest colonial days, the word "conscript" never was used in connection with the military system until 1798, and then it was based upon the plan of army organization which was reported to the French Assembly by Gen. Jourdan, who had had the matter assigned to him to work out a system under which Napoleon operated.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator is, of course, familiar with the term "conscript fathers," a common rendering of the Latin phrase "patres conscripti" used in addressing the Senate of ancient Rome. Senators were of two classes, we are told, patres, "fathers," or patrician nobles, and conscripti, or those "elected" from the equestrian orders. Whether the "conscript" Senate of the Romans was better than the "volunteer" Senate of America is an academic proposition which I will not discuss in this connection. I might add, however, in passing that it does not seem necessary to resort to "compulsory service" in order to find men to sit in this honorable body.

From the opponents of conscription we hear the doleful cry that a resort to it is a step toward "militarism"; some say a step toward "imperialism."

Does not "militarism" come from the top and not from the bottom; from a despot and not from a free people? "Militarism" is the natural correlative of autocracy. Universal service is the essence of democracy and thus the antithisis of militarism, which by reason of universal readiness will be made impossible in our own land and wiped out of existence as a dominating influence in the world at large.

One of the finest expressions of opinion concerning universal service is that from the pen of Dr. David Jayne Hill, former ambassador to Germany, who says:

> No true American desires "militarism" in the United States, and it is to be hoped that we shall never become its victim. It is not in the character and temper of our people to permit it either from without or from within.
>
> But it is in no respect a drift toward "militarism" to say that every able-bodied young man in our country should first be well instructed in the meaning and value of our free institutions and taught a wholesome respect for civil authority, and then be impressed with the privilege and obligation of a full preparation of mind and body to defend them.
> A resolute determination to do this would not only cause any power to reflect long before it would disregard the rights of American citizens, but it would elevate and ennoble the tone of the present and the coming generations of American youth. Wholly apart from any danger on land or sea we need the ethical influence of an enlightened patriotism.

> Once properly apprehended, the inspiration of national security and American defense would act like a tonic upon our whole people. For years we have been preaching the necessity of performing the dull duties of voting and paying taxes, with the result that we have found little exhilaration in either of them. But why not make every young man feel that he is, in truth, a part of the country and leave with him the sweet memory that he has really served it by fitting himself to be its defender?

Other opponents of conscription say it is unpopular. In granting that I beg to add that war, also, is unpopular but imperative when a nation is compelled to choose between that and German domination.

Never was warfare so unpopular as now—especially the intensified brand of warfare introduced by the archmaniac of Europe which disregards not only international law but all the fundamental laws of humanity as well.

We are not considering questions of popularity but the fundamental questions of national life and its preservation. We are not striving for applause but endeavoring to preserve to future generations the benefits of civilization. If there is any American in public life who is considering only those things which are popular, his sense of duty must be horizoned by the confines of his own immediate constituency.

I have heard the question asked upon this floor, "What is the difference between universal training and universal service on the one hand and 'selective conscription' on the other?" One distinguished Senator, for whom I have a very high regard, in raising this question has said that he is in favor of the former but is not clear in his mind that he can support the pending measure. The question is a very simple one and can be simply answered. Academically there may be a difference in the two terms; in effect, there is but a single difference. The bill for universal training, which I most emphatically favor, will prepare us for some future war. This measure will so equip us that we may participate in this war, and thus perform our duty as a civilized nation in the pending struggle against barbarism.

I make bold to assert that had we a universal training and service measure upon our statute books, and in operation for a year or more, we would now have no necessity for a conscription bill. Because of the failure of past Congresses to make proper provision for such an emergency as this we are compelled to resort to the measure now before the Senate, which, it should be noted, authorizes the President "to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

Another measure, either the so-called Chamberlain bill, or something along the same line, must follow the enactment of the bill now under consideration to furnish a permanent system of national defense.

The words "universal" and "compulsory" are, in effect, so far as the present question is concerned, identical, for universal training and service can only be secured by compulsion. Theoretically such is not the case. Practically it is.

If the truth were told, the main objection to "conscription" is to the word itself. The term "compulsory military service" has no more terrors for me than compulsory taxation or compulsory education, against the latter of which there was a general and vigorous protest when the system was originally suggested not so many years ago.

The issue before the Senate to-day is whether we shall have a uniform "draft" of all men between 19 and 25 years of age to raise 500,000 men for a national army, under the plan worked out by the Commander in Chief and the Secretary of War, or whether this Congress shall insist that the country adopt a plan to call for 500,000 volunteers in opposition to the best judgment of those who have studied the problem and believe the "draft" system is the only safe one to apply at this time.

There have been many opinions expressed. One has been that if we impose the "draft" system we might face a revolution. If this Government has become so weak that it can not enforce its own authority, it is time for us to know it.

I have had numerous young men say in my own State, where the volunteers are slow in enlisting—it costing, as I am told, about $100 to get a single recruit—"I want my Government to tell me to go. I am willing to go, but I want to know that the other fellow is called, too."

Former President Roosevelt, who may be recognized as the father of the preparedness propaganda, says:

> Military service should no more be optional in a democracy than should the payment of taxes. One should be accepted as an obligation just as much as the other * * *. Military training should be recognized as a matter of right and not as a matter of favor with all our citizens. In a free democracy the nation has a right to the services of its citizens both in war and in peace.

Former President Taft, who prior to entering the White House had served at the head of the War Department, has repeatedly declared his belief that only by a resort to compulsory military service could the perpetuity of the Republic be insured.

Another former Secretary of War, Luke E. Wright, has thus expressed himself:

> The fact is that the volunteer is not a reliable soldier, and any people that leans upon him leans upon a broken reed. * * * That system is a failure. It is wrong in principle and it is bad in practice. No people have been able to fight a long-continued war, to endure a strain upon all their resources under the volunteer system.

Still another able Secretary of War, Henry L. Stimson, in a recent magazine article, says:

> The volunteer system has become obsolete, not only because modern war has grown to such gigantic dimensions that the necessary force will not be obtained by volunteering, but even more clearly because, with the growth of democracy, the unfairness and injustice of such a system has become increasingly apparent.

The senior commanding officer of our Army, Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, has thus presented his views:

> The volunteer spirit is splendid, but the volunteer system is absolutely insecure. It is false. Analyze the country's military history and it will be seen that it was because of the volunteer system that our wars lasted so long.

Mr. President, an army to be efficient must be of one mind, and that mind the commander in chief's; otherwise it will not have morale and spirit. An army to be effective must be a machine.

We are fighting the most efficient army in existence. If Germany conquers in this war, she conquers the world. No other nation of strength remains to stop her supremacy, and her long-known and cherished ambition to attain the hegemony of the world will be accomplished, and your children and mine will be brought up under Prussian philosophy, and the world will go back to the Dark Ages in compliance with a Hohenzollern policy.

Let us not commit the unpardonable blunder of building upon the fact that this Nation has in the final analysis emerged victor in her several wars.

This is not a war with Mexico. This is not a war with Spain. This is not a war with an effete, decadent nation, lacking in virility and sunk into a state of desuetude. This is not a war where any nation can muddle through.

This struggle, which destiny and not choice has compelled us to engage in, is fought against the most brutal foe the world has ever produced. He has insidiously, relentlessly planned it for decades, while the balance of the world slept, utilizing all the physical and mental forces of a war-mad dynasty, and we are face to face with a proposition, a condition, that is appalling.

"Old things have passed away; all things have become new." This is particularly so of modern warfare. It is worse than idle to suggest that America's participation in this struggle of the ages should be predicated upon anything we have done in past wars.

We must exercise the highest degree of efficiency. We must put every ounce of our national character into the scale. We must mobilize every fiber of our being. There must be a coordination of all our assets—spiritual, intellectual, and physical. Only thus may we expect to be a real factor in evolving order from the chaos which now envelops the world and to bring about a peace that shall endure.

Do not let us trifle with the eternal verities when the earth is aflame. Let us not falter and dawdle. Let us not depend upon theories which have been long since exploded, or systems that have always failed. In a word, let us give America at once that plan of military action now employed by every one of the European belligerents, compulsory service; without which our efforts will be futile and our aid to our allies pitifully inadequate.

Why should we, Mr. President and Senators, set our opinions against the absolutely unanimous judgment of the military world? Our President, the Commander in Chief of our Army, has strongly urged nondependence upon the volunteer system. So have former Presidents Roosevelt and Taft. So has the present Secretary of War. So have four of his predecessors, Lindley M. Garrison, Elihu Root, Henry L. Stimson, and Luke E. Wright. So has the senior major general, Leonard Wood. So have the General Staff officers of the Army.

If the technical judgments of these men are to be ignored and the opinions of laymen are to be accepted, why not abolish the War College and wipe West Point out of existence?

An able officer of our Regular Army has said:

> I ask of you not to confound valor with effectiveness.

Few men are heroic or even brave by instinct. It is the nature of man to shrink from danger and death. The soldierly quality is not congenital. The man-at-arms, unlike the poet, is not born. He is the creature of man's handiwork pure and simple.

To fit a body of men to face the bayonet, the machine gun, or the gas bomb requires something more than abstract courage. It is only by a tedious process of welding, molding, and pounding into a state of perfect discipline that soldiers are made.

An hour's maneuvering in an armory each week, a few days spent in a camp each summer, these do not make a soldier. The mills of the military gods grind slowly and the finished product comes only as the result of a laborious, strenuous, crucial process. The weaklings fall by the wayside, the fit survive.

The Cincinnatus of apocryphal history is an interesting figure to ponder upon, yet no man need question what his fate would be as a participant in twentieth century warfare. The "Minute Men of '76" would survive about a minute in the trenches before Verdun or on the bloodly slopes of St. Quentin.

Frequently have I heard it said within the past few days: "Let us try the volunteer system, and then if that proves a failure we can resort to conscription."

Was there ever a suggestion more amazing, more delusive?

Try the volunteer system! Have not we Americans tried it for nearly a century and a half, and always at a frightful cost? Did not the British try it for nearly two years and then abandon it to save the nation from annihilation?

Do not men know that procrastination is not only the thief of time but the thief of opportunity as well—opportunity that may never return?

At a time like the present, when dynasties are toppling and the crushing and crashing of nations go on about us, can we afford to procrastinate, to temporize, to fritter away precious days "trying" systems and policies which have always failed and always will fail?

"Try the volunteer system," indeed! If we resort again to that obsolete program, and then at the end of a year start in to inaugurate the compulsory system the war will be over without the firing of an American gun. Either we will be vassals of Prussianism or the laughingstock of the civilized world, for in vain will have been uttered the inspiring appeal of America's present-day Peter the Hermit, who said:

> Let us pay with our bodies for our soul's desire. Let us without one hour's unnecessary delay put the American flag on the battle front in this great world war for democracy and civilization and for the reign of justice and fair dealing among the nations of mankind.

In carrying out the military program of our Government, we are not preparing for the present alone. We do not merely aim to aid in bringing to an end this Hohenzollern-inspired war. We are laying the foundations for all future contingencies, for any recrudescence of savagery which may seek to disrupt the social fabric of society and shackle the civilized world.

Lend no ear to that blind sentimentalist who predicts that there will be no more wars—the same disciple of pacifism and passivity who, in the spring of 1914, uttered the same prophecy.

In spite of the fact that she was a victor in 1871, Germany's memory was long and she struck again in 1914. Her memory will be equally long in the case of the United States. For a time, if defeated now, she will sing her hymn of hate in a minor key, but she will sing it just the same. Then, when least expected she will cry "Gott strafe America!" And the blow will fall. Let us be ready.

In closing my remarks, Mr. President, I want to call upon my colleagues and the Nation at large to conduct this war upon the high plane and for the sublime purposes enunciated in a speech recently delivered by the greatest of living Englishmen, Lloyd-George, who said:

"We have been living in a sheltered valley for generations. We have been too comfortable and too indulgent, many, perhaps, too selfish, and the stern hand of fate has scourged us to an elevation where we can see the everlasting things that matter for a nation—the great peaks we have forgotten of honor, duty, patriotism, and, clad in glittering white, the towering pinnacle of sacrifice, pointing like a rugged finger to heaven.

"We shall descend into the valley again, but as long as the men and women of this generation last they will carry in their hearts the image of these mighty peaks whose foundations are not shaken, though Europe and even the whole world rock and sway in the convulsions of a great war."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I voted for the resolution declaring war on Germany, and I believe I voted right. I voted for the bond issue to prosecute that war, and I believe that was a right vote, and before we get through with this bill I am going to vote for a measure that will prosecute this war to the best of this Nation's ability.

Germany had sunk our ships and drowned our citizens. She had taken away our rights on the high seas. She had even joined or tried to join with other nations in forming an alliance to overrun our country and divide up our territory between them. Under these circumstances, Mr. President, no American, in my judgment, could take any other course than to vote for war against this Nation that had so disregarded our rights.

I despise German militarism. Indeed, I go further than that and I say that I despise militarism wherever it may be. It has no place in a free country. I admire the German people, but I believe that the German Kaiser is the greatest criminal on the face of the earth to-day. I hope the Hohenzollern dynasty will go down, and go down forever, in this conflict. I have no sympathy with the dynasty nor with the head of it, and I want to wage this war in the quickest way to rid the world of this despot.

Holding these views, the question arises, What shall be the course of this country in organizing an army to fight Germany? The majority of the committee of which I happen to be a member has brought in a report recommending what is commonly called the selective draft plan—not universal service, not universal training, but a selective draft of a comparatively few of our citizens; not a plan that takes in all men of military age and imposes the military burdens equally, but a plan that takes in the boys of our country and seeks to have us wage war against this great German nation of trained and seasoned fighters with boys between 19 and 25 years of age.

Let us see for a moment what the bill does and how these boys are obtained. In the first place, the Secretary of War tells us that under the terms of this bill we can not begin to organize until the 1st of next August, and it may be September or October before the arrangements are completed; and then it will take from 10 to 12 months to train our troops. Next August is a long time off, gentlemen of the Senate. What are we to do between now and then to prepare our country for this great conflict that we have undertaken?

Well, as testified to by the Secretary, we begin, after the passage of the bill, to enumerate these boys between 19 and 25. We have got to prepare rules and regulations to enumerate them, and then send out to every county and precinct in the United States and get them enrolled, and then, when we get them enrolled, there will be about 6,000,000 of them, it is estimated—about a million to the year. When we get the 6,000,000, what is the next step? Why, we have to assort out the fit from the unfit. It is estimated that 42 per cent are physically unfit and 58 per cent are good for service. In round numbers, that will leave about 3,500,000 men that are selected in the first instance; and then we have got to appoint other officers of the Government to pass upon exemptions. We have a long list of exemptions in this bill, many exemptions, and the general estimate is that probably 500,000 of these boys will be eliminated by the exemptions in the bill, and that will leave us the 3,000,000 men out of whom to get the first 500,000 under the terms of the bill.

How are we going to get them? By selective conscription. Imagine for a moment how this will work. The President does not select. The Secretary of War does not select. Some Army officer selects which one of the six he will take in each community in order to get the 500,000. You gentlemen who have been talking and believing, and honestly believing in universal service, in putting the burden of the defense of the country upon all of the people, can you not see what a small body it finally falls on? The whole burden is put upon less than 3 per cent of our population to carry on this war, and they are boys, under the terms of this bill, a large portion of whom are not old enough to make a contract! These boys are not even citizens.

That is what this bill does unamended. It is not universal service at all; it is partial service. And did you ever stop to think that that might be the reason why it is quite popular in some quarters? There are many people in this country who would like to see the burden put on the other fellow, and no doubt there are great numbers of the 97,000,000 of our population that are easily content to let one-sixth of the 3,000,000 boys do our fighting for us by selection—selective conscription—under the terms of this bill.

You may say, after that exposition of it, "Why are you going to vote for it, then?" I am going to vote for it on two grounds. One is that I believe we will get the men, and we have got to have the men. We are in this war, and we have got to fight it. The other one is that under the terms of this bill the whole machine goes out at the end of the war. Those are the grounds on which I am going to support this bill, with an amendment for volunteers at first, if it is possible to get it put on here.

With that general statement as to the provisions of the bill, it is a question for this Senate, for this Congress. If you want to adopt the most partial system that it is possible for you to adopt, vote down all amendments and put the burden of this war on the 3,000,000 young men, 500,000 of them going out in the first instance, and then selecting 500,000 more from time to time as the days roll by.

Some say, "Why, this eliminates politics." Can we be told that? Why, Senators, do you not know that when they come to select one out of the six in each of our States, every kind of political influence is going to be brought to bear to have this man or that man excused out of the six in each instance? And we are going to do it, too. In my judgment, it is a question of whether you want to adopt the most partial and unfair system, or whether you are willing that the burdens of the defense of our country may fall on as many of our citizens as possible.

Now, I want to read for just a moment my amendment. It is very simple. I do not change the wording of this bill at all.

It does not interfere with any provision of it. It does not delay it a moment. It goes right along; but I just add as a separate section, on page 2 of the bill, this:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to raise 500,000 volunteers under the provisions of "An act to provide for the raising of the volunteer forces of the United States in times of actual or threatened war," approved April 25, 1914, in so far as the same is not inconsistent with the terms of this act; and he shall immediately call out and train 500,000 volunteers. Should that number not enlist within 90 days, all deficiencies shall be secured by draft as herein provided.

Is that a good amendment? The Senate said so on March 3, 1914, just three years ago. The distinguished chairman of our committee brought in a report on the volunteer bill three years ago in February, in which he said that the volunteer bill that we put on the statute books then was approved by all of the expert military authorities in our country. All of them were for it then, and yet three years pass by, and now all of those same experts, we are told, are against it. I have been much interested in some of the statements made by the distinguished Senator when reporting the bill in 1914. In this present report very considerable argument has been raised about the volunteer system; that it has been a failure; that it is undemocratic; that it is ineffective in our country and in others, and yet, just three years ago, on February 20, 1914, Senator CHAMBERLAIN said as to this volunteer system which afterwards became the law, and which he now decries, as follows:

The legislation now proposed (the volunteer legislation) has received the approval of the military authorities and has been pending in various forms before Congress for the last seven years. It has been urgently recommended by every Secretary of War since the incumbency of Mr. Root. Its general purpose is to provide for a complete organization of any force of volunteers that may hereafter be called out, whether that force be a single regiment or an army of a million men. It harmonizes with the militia organization under the Dick bill, and with the existing laws governing the Regular Army. It is elastic and flexible in that the organization of the volunteer forces is to conform to that of the Regular Army, future changes in the latter automatically carrying corresponding changes in the former, as is now prescribed by law for the militia.

This bill was duly passed by the Senate by unanimous vote and received the approval of President Wilson on April 25, 1914, just three years ago. And yet this law that was put upon the statute books under a favorable report of the distinguished Senator from Oregon is now declared wholly ineffective, useless, and of no value. I voted for that bill believing that it was a good bill at the time, and believe it is a good bill now and that it ought to be used. Now let us see what my amendment does. It simply calls out 500,000 volunteers, and they have to enlist before August 1 if the bill passes by May 1, or perhaps earlier if the bill passes earlier. How is that going to hurt or interfere with the terms of this bill? Not at all, because it does not interfere with a line of it. They can go right along with their enumeration, right along with their process of selection and exclusion and exemption. It does not change a word or a line. It does not delay it a moment; but what does it do in the meantime? Why, unless I am greatly mistaken in American citizens, it will give us an army which will be training in the various mobilization camps of the United States in less than 30 days.

When have Americans not come forward at a time of crisis like this? They have always volunteered. When have they become so degenerate that they are not willing voluntarily to fight for their country? Is it possible that we can believe that the sons of men who fought in the Civil War on both sides, or the sons of men who fought in the Spanish War, have become so degenerate that they will not fight for their country in a crisis like this? I do not believe it, and I have no sympathy with that idea. But let us see for a moment.

Mr. WEEKS rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator excuse me for just a few moments?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have a line of thought, and I shall be glad to answer any questions just a little later. I am a new Member here, and I shall appreciate it very much.

What happens? Why, they say: "If we have this volunteer system, we can not have trained men." Is it any harder to train volunteers than to train conscripts? I do not want to send abroad or anywhere else, to fight, men who are not trained, and there is no purpose here to do it. We are in this fight, and my belief is that we ought to begin, and begin at once, to prepare our Army to win this fight.

You can not win a fight and put off for three months the beginning of your organizing. That is no way to fight. Why, Germany will think we do not mean what we say when we only begin to enumerate and count up our forces. Ah, but let them begin to organize and train in the field, and you will find that it will be the greatest object lesson that could possibly be given Germany in this conflict.

Well, now, I say, time is of the essence of this thing. We want an army, and we want it at the earliest possible moment, and we want men drilling in the field at the earliest possible moment. I say that if you adopt this amendment that I have offered, under the terms of the act as it stands to-day you will have an army of 500,000 men actually drilling by August 1, the very first date upon which the draft plan can even be started.

What is the objection? Why, the first objection is that under the volunteer plan you can not get the officers. Let us see about that.

For 500,000 men it will take 18,538 officers. We have not got them. Under the volunteer plan we have got to get them from the body of the country. When we come to the conscript plan we have got even fewer, because we cut off our real material. Under the conscript plan what have we got? Why, they say: "If you adopt the volunteer plan it will make the selection of the officers political." There can not be any greater mistake than that. The President appoints every officer under the volunteer plan, just as he appoints every officer under the conscript plan. There is no difference in the law as to the one or the other. But what is the real difference? The real difference is that we have got, among the body of the people men who have been educated in military schools, men who have seen service in the Spanish-American War, men who have seen service in the Regular Army, men who have seen service as officers in the National Guard but now do not belong to it, men who have seen service at Plattsburg, and you can not get them. They are practically eliminated under the terms of this bill unamended.

But how are you going to get the officers for the conscript plan? Well, the plan is this: They say they have a Reserve Officers' Corps, and they have got 8,000 men on it. That is true. I doubt if there is a Member of this body who has not put a few officers in that corps. You know how it is done. A young man writes to you and says he wants to join that corps. He has heard about this conscription, and he wants to go in as an officer rather than as a conscript; and I do not blame him. He gets three of his friends to give him a certificate of good character, and then he tells the department whether he has ever had any military experience and whether he has been at a military school a year, or whether he has been at Plattsburg; and if he has the right kind of backing and can stand a limited examination, he goes in on the Officers' Reserve Corps; and that is the kind of officers they are going to have under the conscript plan.

In addition to that, they are going to establish camps all over the country, at various places in the country, to train these officers. With troops? Oh, no. Actual training? Oh, no. What kind of training are they going to get? Well, they are going to be given an academic training by Army officers—good training, no doubt; but what is the best kind of training? It is where the officers are trained with troops.

What will happen under the volunteer plan if we get it? Why, under the volunteer plan, if we get it, men who have served as officers in the Spanish-American War, men who stand well in their community and whose friends are willing to go to war with them, men who are willing to trust themselves to officers who are more or less experienced, will select these officers in the first instance, and they can be weeded out by the War Department if they are not of the right kind. But at all events, I say that these officers who have had experience, who have had training, who have seen service, many of them, are far more effective officers than the young men that we are putting into the Army Officers' Reserve Corps; and that is what you have to decide on that proposition.

Senators, you are asked to decide upon these two plans. Either take them both together or exclude the volunteer plan; and when you exclude the volunteer plan, what do you do? Well, let us see what we do.

In the first place, every man over 25 years of age who has served in the Regular Army will be excluded under this plan. He can not go to this war. He might desire to volunteer; he might desire to be a noncommissioned officer and go with a whole battalion or regiment; but, "No; you are excluded. We are going to put in conscripts instead." That is one of the military assets of our country. We have spent large sums in paying some of them retired pay; we have spent large sums upon these men in the past to use them in the event of a crisis just such as we have now; and yet under the plan as proposed, unamended, you would throw away that military asset.

And here we have had the National Guard for years.

We have spent many millions of dollars to build up the National Guard, and it may be misspent and it is misspent, as Senator WILLIAMS says to me on the side, if you throw it away. They have been trained. They are one of the military assets of this country that this bill discards. All members of the National Guard over 25 years of age, and it is those men who volunteered and went to the Spanish War, many of them good soldiers and many of them who would be glad to go again, but being over 25 years of age now, there is another military asset gone.

In the next place, we have been assisting for 40 years, through military colleges known as land-grant colleges and a number of other military colleges lately, to educate and train these young men in the colleges. It is estimated, and I think very correctly, that there are at least 400,000 of these young men who have been trained in colleges who are over 25 years of age.

Every one of the 400,000, trained at the expense of the National Government in part, is excluded from going into this war by the terms of the pending bill.

Lately, as you all know, we have spent two or three million dollars—I believe we appropriated $3,500,000 the other day—for training camps throughout the country at which men between 19 and 45 were to be trained, as I recall it. We are training about 50,000 of them a year—we have been for two or three years—nine-tenths or more of whom are over 25 years of age. That is another of the military assets of our country. They can not come in under this plan if they are over 25. They might want to go to this war; they might want to fight for their country. It is just probable that some of them might be patriotic. They inherited some patriotism from their forefathers. It is just possible they may not all be like those in New Jersey, if my distinguished friend from that State is correct about the statement he made concerning his own State or his own young men. But they are cut out. They can not go, however patriotic, however courageous, however available they may be.

There are five distinct military assets of this country that the Government has spent money to train, and they are just frankly laid aside and left out of this bill. For what reason? I do not know what the reasons are. I can easily see that the plans proposed here of selective conscription have some claims to popularity. I think a selective draft of the Senate by which 3 per cent of it was forced to go to the front and fight in this war would be pretty popular with the other 97 per cent.

Mr. THOMAS. After the selection was made.

Mr. McKELLAR. After the selection was made, especially; but if you arrange the method of selection to begin with and let it only apply to 3—as I believe there are 3 gentlemen in the Senate under 40 years of age—if such a law were passed, if such a thing were possible, that those under 40 should go to the front and fight for their country, I do not believe the other 93 would have any very great trouble in agreeing to an act like that.

Mr. STONE. It would be a good example.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would be a fine example, but pretty hard on the three and unfair as a policy.

Now, further, I want to talk about some objections which have been raised to the volunteer amendment. Some say we can not have a plan like this because it is part volunteer and part conscript. That is true. We have got that right now, have we not? Of course I am a new man here, and I have not exactly learned as yet the methods by which we reach conclusions in this body, but I have been struck with one thing, that gentlemen rise in their places, inveigh against the volunteer system in one breath, and in the next breath they are telling what a splendid volunteer system we have already in this act. Some one said we can get 300,000 more volunteers under this act, another gentleman said 400,000, and another 500,000, and one gentleman said here this morning we could get 900,000 under this act. Let us be frank about it. That is not the intention of this act. As I remember the testimony of Mr. Secretary Baker, he was very frank about it. If this act goes through without amendment it is not intended to get any more volunteers. It is intended to substitute the conscript system for the volunteer system. That is what it seeks to do. They are just waiting to see what is going to be done.

In talking about the volunteer system the advocates of conscription say it is a good thing as far as it goes in this act. I want to say this: If the volunteer system is a good thing, why do they not accept it in a way that will make it effective? Why do they not accept it in a way that will give us 500,000 of more or less trained soldiers in less than 30 days, which it would do, in my judgment.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand the Senator does not want to be interrupted.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would be delighted to be interrupted a little later.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am absolutely seeking information. My mind is entirely open upon this proposition. I want the best information that I can get. I have been attracted by the Senator's statement that it will be the policy of the War Department to permit the acceptance of no volunteers in case the draft bill goes through. Will the Senator oblige me by reading the testimony or statement of the Secretary of War? If he has it here, will he quote it or refer me to it?

Mr. McKELLAR. The testimony of the Secretary before the Committee on Military Affairs was not taken down and transcribed, but as I recollect the statement it was that they are having a hard time getting volunteers now; that they did not know whether they would want to come in for seven years or for the term of the war; and then they explained that they expected them to go in for the term of the war; that the enlistment was to be for the term of the war, but they were not getting men, and that they had absolutely prohibited any increase in the units of the National Guard, and did not expect to add any more units to it, but at all events merely to fill up the ranks at present of the Regular Army as it now exists and of the National Guard as it now exists. That is my recollection of what was said.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] was seeking information. I have understood it to be the position of the Secretary of War that any number of men might volunteer their services, not that volunteer organizations as such would be received as separate units in the aggregate of the Army, but that as individual volunteers any number would be welcome to be incorporated in the organization as it is to be made up under the bill. I should like to know whether that is correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Secretary so testified. I read his testimony in the House hearings, but I repeat he gave me the impression that he regarded the volunteer system as an absolute failure and that it was the purpose of the department to do away with it at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator, of course.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator advised us that he does not desire to be interrupted, for the reason that he is a new hand here.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I am a new hand.

Mr. BRADY. I just want to say that he is a new hand, but he has demonstrated by his very eloquent and forceful argument that he is not a new hand at the business. There has been so much said about the testimony of the Secretary of War before the Military Affairs Committee, and there seemed to be so many different opinions as to what the Secretary said at that time, that I took it upon myself to write the Secretary a letter and ask him certain questions. His reply, I think, entirely explains all this matter. I will not interrupt the Senator at this time, but I wish to say that after the Senator has concluded I will read into the RECORD the letter which I received this morning from the Secretary of War.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I am in error in any way, I shall be delighted to have the Senator or the Secretary correct me. I just give my impression of the verbal testimony that I heard.

Mr. BRADY. It is simply an honest misunderstanding.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, assuming that men can be added as volunteers, it is to fill up units all over the country. A man volunteers in Memphis; he may be put in a Vermont company or regiment or battalion. He volunteers in California and he may go into a New York brigade. I do not think that is a fair system of volunteering. We all know that, especially when we send troops to a foreign war, men from the same locality like to go in the same company and the same organization as far as possible, so as to be with their friends. Homesickness is one of the trials of any army, and especially when you send them to a far country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will in just a moment. May I first make this explanation? I have not very much more to say in my remarks, and when I get through then I would be delighted to answer any question. I shall be delighted to hear the Senator from New Hampshire now.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply want to make an observation along the line the Senator has just spoken. An instance came to my attention to-day where two brothers enlisted expecting to be together in the Army. One has been sent to Texas and the other does not know where he is going to be sent.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator for the illustration.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the beauty of the present volunteer system.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the defect; I know the Senator meant the word "beauty" in that sense. It is a defect in the present system of volunteering. If this volunteer system is so good, as far as it goes in this bill, why not make it effective by letting the men come in independent organizations?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I notice that in the Senator's remarks he seemed to assert that in the training camps which are intended to equip and fit and train and drill officers who in their turn shall fit, train, and drill recruits there is nobody above 25 years of age. Am I correct about that?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; officers can come in——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I so understood him; and if so, he has misunderstood the situation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am very glad the Senator called my attention to that, because if I made such a statement it was in error, and I can not believe I made it; at all events, I did not mean to make that statement. What I meant to say was that the vast majority of the young men at present in the Officers' Training Corps are young men who are not over 25 years of age. I know that is true of those coming from my State. I have recommended a couple of hundred or more in the last 35 or 40 days.

Mr. WILLIAMS. For the men who received training during the Spanish-American War and for the ex-cadets of the military academies of the country where the military course has been recognized as equivalent to a Regular Army training the chief use will be as second lieutenants, first lieutenants, captains, for the purpose of training the other men who are coming in. That is the highest utility for them, and I want to say that the War Department has published to the entire country the fact that they desire the first 10,000 who are going into training to be men of somewhat mature age, and the War Department has given its reasons for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to know that they are seeking some of the better material. But I will say this: The Senator will find upon examination that the War Department has virtually eliminated from this war the five classes of military assets which I have heretofore enumerated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will find in a memorandum the War Department has drawn up—probably it sent a copy to the Senator; the department sent one to me and to other Senators—the department states just what I am talking about.

Mr. McKELLAR. The President will have exactly the same right to appoint those officers who are being trained in the volunteer forces that he has the right to appoint them in the conscript force, the only difference being that in the conscript force it will be limited to the officers in the Army Officers' Reserve Corps and those others prescribed by this act. If we have a volunteer force, it will not be limited to the officers who present themselves with the volunteers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator pardon me just one moment longer?

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is a material difference besides what the Senator has mentioned. When these men get through with the three months' training in the camps they have to stand a military and mental examination, and the Government thereby becomes satisfied that they are fit and equipped. In the volunteer units of which you speak, where the men select their own officers, the equipment of the officers is absolutely unknown to the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that if he had examined the act approved April 25, 1914, providing for a volunteer army, he would have seen that the President is given the absolute authority to name every officer in the volunteer force. I can not subscribe to the proposition that you can make an efficient army officer by training him three months at a training camp.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, after they have gone out with those units.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; he has the same right under that law to name the officers as he has under this bill to name the officers for the conscripted troops.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But under this system he names the officers after they have passed an examination.

Mr. McKELLAR. He has a right to demand an examination of any officer in either volunteer or conscript force.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To disorganize the units so far as the existing officers are concerned and reorganize them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all. If the Senator will examine the law, he will find that the provision for the appointment of officers under the volunteer-army act of 1914 gives precisely the same power that the President has to appoint officers under this act.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Right along that line, and seeking further information——

Mr. McKELLAR. If I am able to give the Senator any information, I shall take pleasure in doing so.

Mr. WOLCOTT. As I understand the Senator's statement, if a unit should present itself under the volunteer system for service to the Government, and if the unit comes, of course, fully organized with its officers chosen, and the United States Government should be of the opinion that that unit is poorly officered, in the sense that the officers are not qualified, the power remains in the Federal Government to discharge them from their official place and to substitute in lieu of them fit and competent officers?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, and not only that, the Government has the right to refuse to accept them until they have stood an examination and qualified themselves as officers, which means just this, that in the volunteer forces there will be a greater number of competent officers for the President to choose from, and he has exactly the same right in every instance.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then, if I understand correctly the Senator from Tennessee, he is making this point—I want to see the drift of his argument—that the contention made by the advocates of the conscript system, who are at the same time the opponents of the volunteer system, namely, that the volunteer system will produce a force improperly officered is not well taken.

Mr. McKELLAR. That claim is absolutely without foundation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It struck me that that was a very forcible point made against the volunteer system, and I wanted it cleared up.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would be a strong point if it was correct. If the Senator will read the act of 1914 he will find a provision precisely the same for the appointment of officers under a volunteer system as under this bill, and by the way the same classes of our citizens are enumerated in the two cases, with one slight exception.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the Senator is mistaken in the position he takes. The bill as it is now before the Senate for consideration provides for taking into the service units of the National Guard as now organized.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not speaking of the National Guard at all. That is out of it, because they do come in in the same way, except instead of the act of 1914 they come in under the act of June 3, 1916.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator is proposing that additional units shall be taken from the States into the Regular Service.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I am proposing that the President shall call out 500,000 volunteers under the time-honored system which has been in vogue in this country ever since this was a country, under the amended law of 1914, which gives him the same right to appoint officers of such a volunteer force as he has under this bill to appoint the officers of a conscripted force.

Now, if the Senate will indulge me just a few moments longer, I want to have a word or two to say about the volunteer system.

The history of the volunteer system, Mr. President, is the history of the warfare of the Anglo-Saxon race. There never has been in the history of the world since there was an Anglo-Saxon race a time when any nation of that race ever resorted to conscription at the beginning of any war. The distinguished Senator, my friend from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], for whom I have the highest admiration and regard, as I understood his speech a few moments ago, undertook to argue that all our wars, the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the War with Spain, had all been gigantic mistakes. I do not so read American history. I may not have the comprehension to understand it, but as I do my belief is that we won every war that we have undertaken. Mistakes were made, of course; they are made in every war; but what has been the result? The result is that America has won. It is easy enough for self-constituted experts who have never been in a battle, 140 years, or even 50 years, after the war to criticize the mistakes of those great heroes of our country who won the wars; and thinking men do not pay any attention to such criticisms. Here a little nation, a little puny aggregation of States along the Atlantic seaboard just a little over 100 years ago, under this system of volunteers has step by step, war after war, added to her territory until to-day she is the greatest nation on the face of the earth under the present system of volunteers.

Are we going to traduce the memory, the courage, and the patriotism of our Revolutionary forefathers by saying that their system was a mistake—that they ought to have done better than they did? They won that war. Should we not be proud of that success? Is it becoming in us at this late day to belittle their courage and patriotism?

Then we come to the War of 1812. Some say we did not win it, and we did have some very disagreeable things happen in that war, but it was all cured by the victory at New Orleans. We won the Mexican War by volunteers. Then came the Civil War; and, by the way, it is said here that volunteering then was a failure. It won the war. The Spanish War was won by volunteers.

How can any thinking man familiar with the history of his country say that the volunteer system, under which this country has grown from 3,000,000 to 100,000,000 people, from a puny little aggregation of States to the greatest Nation on earth, the most powerful, the richest, the ablest, and the best Nation of men on the face of the earth—how can it be said that we have made nothing but a series of failures in war? The contention is ridiculous.

Sometimes it is said that America is not a warlike Nation. Think of five great wars in a little over 100 years. We are distinctly a warlike Nation, and the good part of it is that we won all of them.

It is easy enough for Senators to pick flaws in the proceedings after the fact, and for great self-constituted military experts in military—and civil life, too—to tell the country how those wars could have been won more easily or more economically; but the facts are that they were won, and it is results that tell. They were won under the volunteer system, and I venture the assertion that if the Congress stands by the volunteer system to-day, when we get through with this fight with Germany, though she is the most powerful nation on earth, we will have won again.

England has just raised a volunteer army of 5,000,000 men. She resorted to conscription and secured a million more. In other words, her army is five-sixth volunteer and one-sixth conscript, and there is not a better army on the face of the globe to-day than the British Army. Then, there is little Canada, with just 8,000,000 of people, and she has raised 400,000 troops by the volunteer plan, and sent over 300,000 already to Europe, where they are fighting for the allies. And there is Australia, that has contributed a like number to the allies by the same volunteer system. Indeed, Australia by a referendum turned down conscription. And here is the United States, with 21,000,000 men of military age, that has always followed the volunteer system, and yet we are asked to institute in the very beginning, without giving any man the right to volunteer—we are asked to pass a conscript law and force our young men to go.

But it is claimed by some of our so-called military experts that the volunteer system has been a failure. We have tried it in five wars, and we have won all of those wars. But they then reply that those wars could have been won easier and with less loss of life and property with a conscript system. Oh, Mr. President, it is easy to pick flaws after the fact, but it is the result that counts; and the result has always been under the volunteer system we have had the highest success, and after the war was over our soldiers have passed into the peaceful pursuits of man, as is proper under our system of government.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Of course, whether we adopt the conscript plan or the volunteer plan the present officers of the War Department will very largely have control of those forces, so that from the standpoint of personal interest no reason occurs to me why they should favor one plan rather than the other. How does the Senator account for the fact that the War College and nearly all the Regular Army officers who have made the profession of arms a study favor the conscription system?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not account for it at all; but I say to the Senator if he will look at the hearings before the House committee taken two or three weeks ago and printed, he will find, as I recall those hearings—and if I make a mistake I certainly have no desire to make one—the Secretary of War said that this was his plan, not a War College or General Staff plan, and that he submitted it to Gen. Scott, to Gen. Bliss, to Gen. Kuhn, and to Gen. Crowder, and the bill was drawn after those four officers had submitted the plan. That is my recollection of the testimony. That is a matter, however, that the record will show about. The General Staff was just as much in favor of the volunteer bill of 1914, which they now seek to set aside, as they are now for this bill. The Senator will find the absolute facts in the record.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to say a word——

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will merely ask a question at this time; but I yield to him.

Mr. POMERENE. I shall be very brief. I have not any doubt that Secretary Baker consulted experts. I have known him for a good many years, and I know that he is a man who never comes to a conclusion without having a reason for it that is satisfactory to him.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have the same high opinion of Secretary Baker that the Senator has. I am a great admirer of the Secretary.

Mr. POMERENE. I have not any doubt that if Secretary Baker has accepted the advice of men at the head of the War College it is because it has met the approval of his own mind.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure of that.

Mr. President, having said that much about the volunteer system, I now come to the one that it is proposed at this late day in our history to substitute for it. I have taken the trouble to examine into the success or failure of the draft plan, hoping to be able to give Senators some information as to the success or failure of the draft plan. I want very briefly to give the latest experience that this Nation has had with that plan.

In 1863, when the Government of the United States was confronted with a situation of more extreme danger, perhaps, than it ever had been confronted with before or ever will be again, the Congress of the United States passed what was known as the draft bill. Now, mind you, this Nation was then fighting for the Government's life when this draft plan was passed. Volunteers had not come forward in sufficient numbers, and it was sought to supplement and to strengthen the armed forces of the United States by a draft law. Such a law was not passed at the beginning of the war, as we propose here, to supplement and to strengthen the Army, but it was passed more than two years after the war began. What happened? Well, here is what happened in the first instance: There were 2,700,000 men, in round numbers, raised by the Union in the Civil War, of whom 2,654,000, to be absolutely accurate, were raised by volunteering and a paltry 46,000 were raised by draft—less than 3 per cent. To be absolutely accurate, 2.3 per cent of the Union forces of the Civil War were raised by draft, and history does not record when any conscript in this country ever distinguished himself.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Wait just one moment, and then I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I was simply going to say that the figures given by Gen. Miles were a little over 50,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will explain that discrepancy. The reason that Gen. Miles gives those figures is that he included a few who were drafted who did not actually serve; but I am talking about the drafted men who served their country from 1863 to 1865. What happened? I can not better be accurate about a thing like this than to read a very short excerpt from a report by Gov. Seymour, the then governor of New York, to his legislature on January 5, 1864. I quote from him accurately, as follows:

> Like results are conspicuous in all parts of our State and in all sections of the country—in New England, Pennsylvania, and the West. The attempt to fill our armies by drafting was abortive. While it gave no useful result, it disturbed the public mind; it carried anxiety and perplexity into the workshops, the fields, and the homes of our citizens. It not only fails to fill our armies but it produces discontent in the service; it is opposed to the genius of our political system; it alienates our people from the Government; it is injurious to the industrial pursuits of the country.

Gen. Miles has also recently testified that while he was down on the front fighting for his country, after this draft law was passed he had to withdraw regiments of trained troops to be sent back to New York and to other places to quell the riots that had been brought about by this undemocratic draft measure. That is the history of the draft in this country.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will yield right there——

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask, was not that due to the fact that the State authorities of New York practically refused to sustain the carrying out of the volunteer law?

Mr. McKELLAR. It was due to the fact that in all instances where men have been free they have objected to be treated as slaves; it was due to the fact that we never have resorted to conscription except as a last resort to aid our country in time of peril; and when we have done it, it has been a failure. It is due to the fact that conscription has always been considered in this country as the most despicable form of military despotism.

Now, let us see one step further. Much has been said about the failure of the volunteer system, under which we have won all of our wars, but, as I said before, very little has been said about the failure of the draft system. I took occasion on the day before yesterday to write to The Adjutant General of the Army to give me the exact facts and figures as to what was done under the draft plan. This letter was written on yesterday, and is signed by Gen. McCain, The Adjutant General of the Army. He says:

It appears from the final report of the Provost Marshal General that the whole number of men drafted from the several States and Territories for the United States service under the enrollment act of March 3, 1863, and its amendments—

Think of it, now! The whole number enrolled—was 776,829. Of that number 161,244 failed to report, 46,101 were discharged because the quota was full, 47,247 were discharged by order, 315,509 were exempted, 73,607 furnished substitutes, 86,724 paid commutation and were discharged, and 46,347 were held in the service.

That is the record of the draft system. Out of 776,000 men enrolled to fight for their homes, not in a foreign war, 46,000 conscripts were finally secured. Suppose we shall have that same result here, what will happen?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator excuse me for just one moment? Let me finish this statement.

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. What will happen? Well, if the same proportion, the proposed conscript law would do this: If we enroll 6,000,000 young men and have the same result that we had in 1863 when the life of the country was at stake we will get 360,000 men out of the 6,000,000. That is what the result of the draft system was before.

It is said we now have a very different system; that at this time the Government is stronger, and that is so. I know it is so; but, Senators, are you going to substitute force for freedom? That is the question for us to decide.

Now I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator has just referred to the large number of men drafted and the comparatively small number who were afterwards accepted as conscripts. I had a letter this morning from a gentleman who was an officer in the Civil War, who quit the service as a captain, who made this explanation in part of the so-called failure of the draft system. I may say that I am not privileged to give this officer's name, but he is one of the leading lawyers of Ohio. He said that after the draft system had been inaugurated and the men drawn, nearly all of those men, when they found that they had been drafted, went personally and enlisted as volunteers; and that, while they appeared on the rolls as volunteers, it was largely because of the draft system. Can the Senator from Tennessee advise us as to whether or not that is correct?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know how correct that is; but I have no doubt, in my own mind, in future years in this body, when Senators are discussing the question of whether this draft measure is a failure or a success, that kind of specious argument will be used to mitigate the failure of the system.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President, this man was himself a volunteer, and he served four years during the Civil War.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course there may be always individual instances and exceptions to the rule. We can not determine a policy of government, a policy of raising an army, by the experience of an individual in one war or another.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, does the Senator know whether or not that was general?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not the slightest idea.

Mr. POMERENE. I know this man, and I know that he is one of the most reputable men in Ohio. He himself, at the head of a company, was detailed to arrest many of the men who were drafted, and he afterwards took them into camp and permitted them to enlist as volunteers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Naturally, I have no knowledge of the facts to which the Senator refers.

Mr. POMERENE. That may explain very largely the small number of drafted men, of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. McKELLAR. Probably it may have had something to do with it. I have no doubt that when we arrest a number of these boys under the provisions of the present act we will mitigate the arrests as far as possible by getting them into the service without visiting upon them the penalties for not having voluntarily come in.

M. POMERENE. Let me further interrupt the Senator for just a moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator does not make this distinction between the draft act of 1863 and the present proposed law. Under the act of 1863 men could buy immunity by paying $300 in lieu of enlistment.

Mr. McKELLAR. And send a substitute.

Mr. POMERENE. And could send substitutes in their places. There is nothing like that in this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to express my very great admiration for the majority of the committee that they do not recommend any provision like that in this bill, and I think to that extent at least the pending measure is a great improvement on the draft act of 1863.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, there is another question I should like to ask the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator, but I hope I am not consuming too much of the time of the Senate. I have a little more to say.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am asking these questions of the Senator because I think he has given much study to the proposition he is advocating, and I have not heard the side of the subject to which he addresses himself discussed very much. Some considerations have been suggested which seemed to my mind rather strong arguments against the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. If I caught the point of the argument I heard yesterday by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]—and a very able argument it was—at one point he made this suggestion, which appealed to me as a rather forceful one: He said that while under the volunteer system it might be possible in the first instance to get units into the field at full strength, yet as the wastage proceeded, there not being any machinery for the recruiting of those to take the places made by this wastage, the volunteer system would prove ineffective. He instanced the case of some regiments in the Civil War reduced to a hundred men, yet retaining all their regimental officers. Under the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee proposing a volunteer plan is there anything to prevent that sort of possibility?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if that question was troubling the Senator, I am delighted he asked me about it, for this reason: Under the terms of this bill, with my amendment incorporated in it, all the wastage will be taken care of.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Under the draft provisions?

Mr. McKELLAR. Under the draft provisions of the bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will it be, Mr. President?

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely. The draft features of this bill will remain in effect. The men will be enrolled. The volunteer feature of the amendment will not take the place of anything, except that the first 500,000 men will be drawn from the body of the country in a universal way, under the idea of universal obligation rather than partial obligation. They will simply be drawn from the body of the country first.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Well, Mr. President, I do not pretend to any intimate acquaintance with the various military acts, but from a cursory glance I have made of them I think the Senator must be in error as to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all. I will read my amendment, which makes it perfectly plain.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to see how it does so.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is to be added as a separate section:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to raise 500,000 volunteers under the provisions of "An act to provide for the raising of the volunteer forces of the United States in times of actual or threatened war," approved April 25, 1914, in so far as the same is not inconsistent with the terms of this act, and shall immediately call out and train 500,000 volunteers. Should that number not enlist in 90 days, all deficiencies shall be secured by draft as herein provided.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes; but that does not meet my question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I see what is in the Senator's mind, and the explanation——

Mr. WOLCOTT. If, after 90 days has expired and we have the 500,000 men in the field, and then wastage takes place, what is going to supply the deficiency?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will read the bill, he will see that by August 1 all of the enumerations will be made and the War Department will be training the second 500,000 men under the terms of the bill, which will proceed right straight along in its operation. My amendment does not interfere with it for a moment. We will have the other 500,000 ready to be trained. A million men are wanted; and the bill with my amendment will give 500,000 volunteers and 500,000 conscripts.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, still my point is not cleared up. I should like the Senator from Tennessee to point out to me in the draft features of this bill wherein any of the men drafted can be utilized to make up the wastage in the volunteer force of 500,000 for which the Senator's amendment provides.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is perfectly plain, as the Senator will see if he will just read the bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Where is it found?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is found in the third paragraph of the bill, which my amendment leaves untouched, and which reads:

Third. To raise by draft as herein provided, organize, and equip an additional force of 500,000 enlisted men—

The Senator will notice that it reads "to raise by draft." Then in the fourth paragraph of the bill it is provided:

Fourth. The President is further authorized, in his discretion and at such time as he may determine, to raise and begin the training of an additional force of 500,000 men organized, officered, and equipped as provided for the force first mentioned in the preceding paragraph of this section.

That provides for the third 500,000 men under the terms of this bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Which paragraph covers the point I have suggested?

Mr. McKELLAR. The third paragraph, on page 2, which reads:

Third. To raise by draft as herein provided, organize, and equip an additional force of 500,000 enlisted men, or such part or parts thereof as he may at any time deem necessary, and to provide the necessary officers, line and staff, for said force and for organizations of the other forces hereby authorized, or by combining organizations of said other forces—

I think that covers it. It is just as plain as the noonday sun that under the terms of this bill the President has the right to fill up not only deficiencies but any wastage or anything else.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to that particular clause. It had escaped my eye.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as long as the Senator is being interrupted, perhaps he would not object to a further interruption.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am anxious to get through, but at the same time I am delighted to yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am sure that no one will find fault with the Senator for extending his remarks as long as he likes, because they have been most interesting and instructive.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. What I want to call the attention of the Senator to is a phase of the subject which I do not think he has exhausted, if he has touched upon it, and that is this: The Senator has well said that we have been living under the blessings of the volunteer system. On December 15, 1916, the authorized strength of the Regular Army was 126,552, while the actual strength of the Army was 100,902 men, as I recall. In December, 1915, Congress authorized an increase in the enlisted strength of the Regular Army of 20,000 men; but, so far as I know, up to this time we have not even obtained the 20,000 men.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is in error about that. We now have about 150,000 men in the Regular Army. We had on the 1st of April, as I recall, according to the latest reports of the War Department, 129,000 or 130,000 men in the Regular Army, and there have been 20,000 or 25,000 added to the Regular Army by volunteers since then. Of course, we can add to the present units of that Army and bring it up to a strength of about 275,000, so that there is a chance for about 125,000 more men to volunteer.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is possible that the increase in the Regular Army which was authorized at the time to which I refer, has been met, but I know that a few months ago, I think perhaps as late as January of this year, we had not enlisted from December, 1915, to January, 1917, the 20,000 men authorized.

Mr. McKELLAR. But there have been a great many enlistments in the last month, so that the strength of the Regular Army is now about 150,000, and it is rapidly increasing. If we would give the men of America the opportunity to enlist, we would soon have an army.

That, Mr. President, brings me to the next point I have in mind, which is this: What we need, if we are going into this war, is an army; and we want that army now. I am opposed to putting it off until next August or next September or next October. Delay is always dangerous when it comes to war. A distinguished Confederate leader, Gen. Nathan Bedford Forrest, who happened to live for some time in the same town where I now reside, once said, "The art of fighting a successful fight is to get there first with the most men." That is good doctrine to-day. We have got to train these troops, whether they are 19-year-old boys or whether they are men who have even had some previous experience under the volunteer system. Nobody wants to send raw recruits against a European army, and nobody is going to do that; so we will have to train them. It is perfectly manifest that if we can get 500,000 men to volunteer within 30 days we will be just that much quicker getting a trained army. I am against even a day's delay.

It is a great misfortune, according to my notion, that a call for volunteers was not issued on the very next day after we declared war. In that event, by this time we would have had an army drilling in the camps of our country and being trained to fight its battles. That is what we ought to have done; but it is no longer useful to discuss what might have been done. It is what we are doing now, and I, for one, am opposed to postponing the creation of an army for three months and a half or four months and a half or six months, as the case may be, for I think it ought to be created now.

What are some of the objections to making provision for a volunteer system? It is said it will not do to have a half-and-half system—half volunteers and half conscripts. I do not blame anyone for making that contention. I should dislike to be a conscript in an army, and I think most of us feel the same way. I think very few would enjoy being put in that situation. I have not any sons myself, but I doubt if any Senator who has sons would like to have them conscripted in the Army. It is opposed to what real red-blooded men believe in.

But, Mr. President, we have a volunteer system now. There are at least 300,000 National Guardsmen and Regular Army men who have volunteered, and it is sought to raise 500,000 more by draft. The proportion will then be 3 to 5. Will it make the situation any worse to call for 500,000 volunteers, and then have 800,000 volunteers and 500,000 drafted soldiers?

It is proposed to raise an army of over a million men; everybody knows that. I think it is necessary; I think it ought to be done, and ought to be done as soon as possible; but it is not a logical objection to say that if we add a volunteer feature to this bill it will make our Army part volunteer and part conscript.

I now come to another feature. It is said that under the proposed draft system we will catch the "slackers." Well, I must confess that in the busy life I have lived I do not know very much about "slackers." I am not an expert on "slackers." I have not any respect for them in civil life, and I have not any respect for them in military life; and if it is proposed here to make an army of "slackers," we are doing a very poor business, because I do not believe men who are "slackers" in civil life will make very good soldiers. I would dislike to go out with a company of "slackers."

But let us see what we are doing to the "slackers." As I remarked here yesterday afternoon in the course of a question, most of the "slackers" that I know—if I know what that term signifies—are men over 25 years of age. Amongst the boys between 19 and 25 you rarely ever find any "slackers," as the term is commonly employed. If that is the case, what are we doing under this bill? Instead of making the "slackers" go forward and fight, we are giving them an honorable immunity from war. A man over 25 years old may be the worst "slacker" in the country, and yet he is given an honorable immunity under this bill. Senators say that one of the vices of raising volunteers is that the girls say to the boys they have no respect for them and will not associate with them unless they go to war, and those who will not go to war after such treatment are "slackers." That is one class of "slackers." Well, there will not be any such in this war, because all those over 25 years can reply to the girls, if anything like that is said, "I am barred from going to this war; the law bars me; I can not go. Congress has forbidden me to go." I say that argument is not sustained; that under the provisions of this bill that the "slackers" will be required to go. I say we will get no more "slackers" under the proposed partial selective draft system than we will get under the proposed system of volunteers.

Now, I come to another question——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just one moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me give an illustration of one kind of "slacker" that has come to my attention: An old farmer in my State had one son who volunteered and went to the Mexican border. His neighbor, right across the fence from him, had four sons, and none of them went. Now, this young man has been called out a second time, and his father wrote me a letter saying that he hardly thought it was fair that a man should go out and fight again when his neighbors, right across the fence, were laughing at him and saying that they would not be caught in any such fix as that.

Mr. McKELLAR. That case is not in point, for this reason: Under this bill we have the right to exempt that young man, whether he is a volunteer or whether he is a conscript. It is immaterial. The Government does not have to take him because he volunteers. It has a right to exempt him. With all due respect, I do not think the illustration cited is a case in point at all.

I now come to what has been called the democracy of the service. If this partial law, by which the burden of this war is placed primarily upon 500,000 boys—one two-hundredth of our population—if that is democracy of service for one's country, then I am utterly unable to understand the term. Is that universal service? Is there any universal service about that? Why, it is the narrowest limit of service that can be effectively established. It is putting the burden of war on the smallest number of people possible, and a large part of this small class are not even citizens.

But my distinguished and very greatly beloved friend, a man for whom I have the warmest affection, and I think we all have, the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], on yesterday made this argument: He said that he objected to the volunteer system because it required the best blood to go forward; that we got the flower of our country under a volunteer system, whereas under this system we would get slackers and all. Let us see what we get under this system. Let us see whether this contention is correct.

We first take the 6,000,000 of boys between 19 and 25. That is a pretty fair sample of our male population, is it not? They are pretty carefully selected. You could not have gotten 6,000,000 better men, physically, morally, and in every other way, in a blood way, as well as in every other way, than by such a process. But does it stop there? Not at all. You first say: "We will not take any of that 6,000,000 who are physically unfit," and you have the doctors to examine them all over the country. They have to pass a physical examination; and under the experience of the War Department, when you make that examination, you eliminate 2,500,000 of them, and you reduce the available number down to 3,500,000 under this system—this partial system. Then, when you do that, you come along and get the morally deficient, and you get those whose religious views will not let them make good soldiers, and you get those of certain exempted classes, and you exempt all those. You narrow it down to 3,000,000, according to the best view. And then what do you do? Why, you take those 3,000,000 of the very flower of our country, and you just select the best one man out of every six!

Now, I may not know a thing in the world about reasoning; I may not know anything in the world about getting the best blood; but, unless I am fearfully mistaken, I do not believe a better plan could be devised to get the very best blood in our country to go forward in the first draft. I say that this talk about volunteers bringing forth the best blood of our country as a sacrifice, while it may be partly true, is not one-half as true as the process of getting the best blood that is used in this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just one word, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield, of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. While we are talking about universal military service, while these 3,000,000 young men are put into the service, there are 19,000,000 of military age who entirely escape.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have that under a subsequent subdivision of what I have to say. I will refer to it now. We have at least 21,000,000——

Mr. GALLINGER. Twenty-two.

Mr. McKELLAR. Twenty-one millions of men, and maybe twenty-two, as the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire says, of military age in this country; and I have heard for three years the argument of the militarists in every newspaper, on every stump, and in every place that what this country needs is universality of both training and service. They say that the burden of defending the country ought to be put on the same basis as taxation; that it ought to be applied to all alike. It is a very persuasive argument, I will say, and it has a great deal of force. I am not prepared to say that it is not all right; but does this bill give it? Instead of putting the burden on 21,000,000 men, it puts it in the first instance on 500,000 and in the second instance on another 500,000 boys.

It is easy enough for men to say: "Let George do it. If anybody is going to get killed, let Bill be killed." It is a popular argument. It appeals to the many. It is evidently appealing to all men over 25 years of age in this country. They are using a good deal of persuasion all over the country to limit it; but is that right? Why, this age limit ought to be changed in any event. I think amendments have been offered here to change it; and, by the way, I will refer to that phase of the matter right now.

We are asked to leave the traditions and the history of the Anglo-Saxon race for the first time since William the Conqueror went to England in 1066 in the matter of the formation of an army, and we are asked to pattern after the military despotisms of Germany and of Russia and of Austria; and even such despotisms as those never took the services of a boy 19 years of age.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. In just a moment. I have the figures here that were given me awhile ago. Germany, which we are asked to follow, fixes the minimum age at 20 years, and a number of the countries fix it at 21. I have no doubt the Senator has the same figures, and I will read them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was going to call the Senator's attention——

Mr. McKELLAR. I have those figures right here, I think; and, so that the Senate may be absolutely certain about it, I will give them.

In Germany, universal and conscription, actual service begins at 20; Austria-Hungary, 21; Turkey, 20; Roumania, 21; Bulgaria, 20; Serbia, 21; Sweden, 20; Norway, 28; Denmark, 21; England, volunteers much younger; France, compulsory, begins at 20; Russia, universal and compulsory, begins at 20; Italy begins at 20; Japan at 20; Brazil at 21; Portugal at 20; Greece at 21; Switzerland at 21; Chile at 21; and Argentina at 20. Those are the figures as taken from the records. Now, are they correct?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was not questioning those figures. I wanted to call attention to another matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he was referring to the accuracy of the figures.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not to those figures; no. If this law violates the Anglo-Saxon tradition and the tradition of our own people, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that his own State has done the same thing. In 1909 a law was passed in Tennessee providing that all able-bodied male citizens between the ages of 18 and 45 who were residents of the State should constitute the militia, making certain exemptions, and section 6 of the same act subjects them to the draft.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is correct about Tennessee. I am proud of the fact that we permit boys to enlist by volunteering at the age of 18, and I think that is all right. I have no fault to find with it, but I am speaking about the policy here. We older men are undertaking to put the burden of this war on boys who are not old enough to make a contract, who are not citizens. I do not believe in it. I may be wrong. I have heard from but one boy in all this controversy under 23 years of age, and he said that he thought it was wrong. Of course, an individual opinion does not make any difference.

Now, it is remarkable what peculiar views we have about this bill. I think most people have an idea that we are passing on the question of universal service. I have even heard some Senators, in an unguarded moment, say that this was the principle of universal service.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption, I want to say that the bulk of the telegrams which I have received, both for and against this measure, assume that this is a bill for universal service, when as a matter of fact it is not.

Mr. McKELLAR. A great many of the telegrams that I have seen have urged me to vote for the General Staff universal-service plan; a great many other telegrams have urged me to vote for the Chamberlain military training bill, showing that because of the advertisements and propaganda that have gone out there is well intrenched in the public mind back home the idea that we are passing upon a democratic measure for universal service for the defense of the country, when as a matter of fact, when you examine the provisions of this bill without the amendment that I have offered, you see that it is the most partial and undemocratic kind of a measure, and does not provide for universal training or service at all.

Mr. President, there is one other matter that I want to discuss right here. It is strange what kind of views we have. Just a few days ago I saw in a newspaper published in Washington a terrific onslaught upon certain Members of the House because those Members of the House favored putting an amendment for volunteers on this bill, and I think the very day after that onslaught was made that very paper—the editor of which is no doubt one of the ablest men we have in this city, whose editorials I always enjoy—turns deliberately around and makes one of the best arguments for the volunteer provision in this amendment that I have seen submitted by anyone, and I am going to weary the Senate for just a few moments by reading an editorial in the Washington Post of Sunday, April 22, 1917. The article is entitled—

"THE ROOSEVELT VOLUNTEERS."

Officers in the War Department are said to be opposed to granting permission to Col. Theodore Roosevelt to raise a division of volunteers for early service in France, because they think it would be inconsistent with the plan for raising a regular army by selective draft.

If this objection were valid, Col. Roosevelt's patriotic offer should be declined.

But where is there any inconsistency? Where would the two plans conflict, and how?

Col. Roosevelt proposes to raise a division of volunteers, to be commanded by Regular Army officers. He proposes to accept men above the age of 25, who would not be subject to draft.

The President's plan for selective draft would not be affected in the slightest degree by raising a division of volunteers. Is it argued that young men who could not get into the Roosevelt division would lose heart? They would be subject to draft just the same. Is it suggested that young men drafted would suffer under the imputation that they had not volunteered? The answer is that they could not volunteer. They would be upon exactly the same footing as other men of their age rich and poor. Is objection made because the volunteer division would go forward first and gain all the credit? There will be credit enough for all who go to the front. The emergency calls for the American flag at the front. Is it to be kept at home because somebody would get credit for taking it to the battle line? The man who raises this objection should search his heart and ask himself if he is not willing to sacrifice his country's welfare to his own desire for first honors.

The law providing for universal selective draft could not cast any imputation upon any man. It would not prevent any men above 25 from volunteering in the first expeditionary force, nor cast doubt upon the patriotism of those who did not volunteer. The Roosevelt division would be created to meet an emergency. The army raised by selective draft would go forward when ready. Neither could replace the other, and neither could possibly interfere with the other.

There is work to be done for all Americans. If 100,000 men above 25, already familiar with arms and drill, are ready to fall in for service in France, why hold them back? Is the War Department unable to provide for 100,000 men now? It can be given means and the task of outfitting 100,000 men will furnish valuable experience to be applied to the bigger task later on.

Every one of Col. Roosevelt's division would be a picked man, capable of rendering invaluable service to the inexperienced men who will be raised by selective draft. Thousands of them could be brought back after active service at the front to train the recruits according to the actual needs of modern war. Just as the American volunteers now at the front could be of the greatest service in training men here, so the Roosevelt division would be available.

In the meantime the American flag would have been planted in France, never to withdraw while German armies were on French soil. The improvised forces would in due time give way to the Regular Army of the United States, which would carry the flag to victory.

If that argument is applicable to 100,000 men, why is it not applicable to 500,000 men? Why single out one and say, "You can go to the front, as your fathers have," and deny the privilege to the thousands and the hundreds of thousands of other men in this country who want to go and fight for their country?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator from Tennessee favor Col. Roosevelt raising a division if he wishes to?

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, I do not object to any man's raising a division. I think that any man who wants to raise a division in this country ought to have the right to do it. I believe in the freemen of this country doing the fighting. I do not believe that we ought to resort to a partial system of conscription.

And that brings me to this point in what I have to say: I have felt greatly embarrassed in the position that I have taken here. I was educated in a military school, served in every position from private to captain, graduated as one of the captains of a company, and served with the National Guard for some years. I have been on the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives. I have taken a more or less active interest in the military affairs of our country. I started what I had to say awhile ago with the statement that I abhor militarism. I believe in a democratic army. I believe in a volunteer army, and always have believed in it. I inherited that belief. Likely you have. I still believe in it. I have no doubt you do. I believed in it three years ago when the Congress, of which I was then a Member, passed the volunteer bill. We thought it accorded with American history and traditions and American honor and American right. We believed it. I have not changed my mind. I still am of that opinion; and with that history I regret more than I can say that I have to differ with some of my friends.

Mr. President, there is no man in this country whom I admire more than I do Woodrow Wilson, the President of the United States. I think he is the greatest man on the face of the earth to-day. I believe in him. He is my friend and I am his friend. I regret to differ with any plan that he has indorsed. But at the same time, with such knowledge as I have of the facts, I can not do else in this Chamber than to vote the way I believe is right. When I first came to Congress, and began to cast my votes on various questions, I adopted the policy of trying to find out what was the moral side, what was the right side, of every question upon which I was called on to vote; and as long as I have served in Congress I have never yet voted except in accordance with what I believed to be right, and, so help me God, I never shall vote in any other way. I regret more than I can say that I differ, even in this detail, with the leader of my party; but I would not be a man if I did aught else than follow my mature conviction of what is right and vote for the volunteer system, because I believe that is right.

Mr. President, the very term of conscription in this country of free men is offensive, and every man to whom it has been applied in the history of this Republic has been looked down upon with contempt by his fellow men. The reason for this is because we have only conscripted men when we could not get volunteers.

Now, in the very beginning of the war for us to set aside the volunteer system of raising an army, the system of free men, the system which gives us our best soldiers, the system which gives us the most courageous soldiers is set aside in one act, and instead of that system we are to have a system of exclusive conscription. In the eyes of all men it will be said that the only reason that this proud Republic resorted to conscription in the beginning was because we had so degenerated that we did not have enough patriotic men to volunteer to fight their country's battles. That can be the only excuse offered for such a system in the beginning of a war. I have no sympathy for such a contention. I believe that the Americans of to-day are just as courageous as any men in the history of this Republic. I believe that they would win fame for their country and their flag, and I for one am opposed to applying that hated term of conscript to them until all other methods have failed.

Mr. President, I am from a State that is known in the sisterhood of States as the Volunteer State of this Republic. She won that name by the willingness of her sons to offer their services in war as a sacrifice for our common country. In the Revolutionary War it was John Sevier and Tennesseans who turned the tide at Kings Mountain, and gave to this Republic a local habitation and name forever. In the War of 1812 her sons distinguished themselves on every field, but it was left to that immortal hero, not only of Tennessee history but of the history of the world, Andrew Jackson, who won a name and fame for the Volunteer State, and the dearest hope of my heart is that as the Volunteer State we will be known as long as the Republic of America is known to the world. In the Civil War, Mr. President, Tennessee furnished more troops in proportion to her citizens to both armies than perhaps any other State in the Union. Her sons lived up, whether they were on the one side or the other, to the proud distinction of history as the Volunteer State of the United States.

In the Spanish-American War again her sons were enrolled in the first call for volunteers and bore themselves proudly and courageously through that conflict. And now, Mr. President, when the country is threatened again the sons of this proud Commonwealth have already enlisted in the National Guard in greater numbers than the law requires, and tendered organizations have already been rejected. The people of that State come again and ask the American Congress to let their sons fight as volunteers for our common country and our common flag. Are you going to deny these sons that right? Are you going to say to them, "Your history is a mockery and your name a symbol of dishonor"? Are you going to say to them, "You will no longer be called volunteers according to the history and traditions of your fathers, and the proud name your forefathers earned on many battle fields is to be wiped out forever"? Are you going to say to them, "Heretofore you have been called volunteers, but hereafter your name will be conscript"? God forbid, Mr. President, that any such law will ever be passed by this Congress!

Mr. President, we have always believed in this country that all just government came through the consent of the governed; that is the principle of the volunteer plan of raising an army. We are asked to disregard that plan and to substitute what in its place? The answer is force. No longer will a man in this country have a right to fight for his country. He will be forced to fight for his country provided he happens to be within a certain age. Instead of universal service we will have partial service; instead of laying the burdens of defense upon all men of military age, we are laying it upon an insignificant portion that comes between the ages of 19 and 25. Instead of obligation of all men to defend their country we are asked to put that obligation upon less than 6 per cent of our population, and this 6 per cent is composed of young boys of our country. It may be right, Mr. President, but I for one am unable to see the justice of the scheme. It will be a sad day for free America when we substitute force for patriotism.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of answering the many able arguments made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], but simply for the purpose of reading a letter from the Secretary of War in order to clarify the atmosphere relative to his position and the position of the General Staff as to the number of volunteers that will be permitted under the present bill.

We are facing a great crisis, the greatest, I believe, in the history of this Government, and what we are all attempting to do is to come to a fair understanding as to what it is best to do for our country at this time.

The Committee on Military Affairs, of which I am a member, worked earnestly in preparing the bill that is now before the Senate and had several hearings. I happened to be a member of the subcommittee that held public hearings. During the subcommittee hearings all the statements were taken down by a stenographer, but unfortunately the day the Secretary of War appeared before us we did not have the statements of the Secretary and those who accompanied him taken down by a stenographer. For that reason there has arisen a misunderstanding as to what was said.

I therefore, on the 20th instant, addressed a letter to the Secretary of War asking him what present organizations in the different States will be permitted to be completed and what the status of the men will be who enlist in the National Guard. In answer to my letter he addressed the following communication to me, which I hope I may be permitted to read without interruption so as to have it properly in the RECORD, and then we can discuss any features of the same that Senators feel should be discussed. I now read the letter from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 20, 1917.

Hon. JAMES H. BRADY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your letter of April 20, 1917, addressed to Gen. Crowder on the subject of the number of men that would be permitted to volunteer, assuming that the pending Senate bill for raising additional forces has been enacted into law, I take great pleasure in furnishing you the information requested.

In a letter dated April 15, 1917, to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, on this same subject, I wrote as follows:

"A request was made by the committee during my recent hearing to have inserted in the record a summary of the number of places the draft of a bill submitted by the War Department provided for individual voluntary enlistments. The summary given below is furnished in compliance with that request. The numbers given refer to the Army only, of course, and do not take into consideration the outlet for voluntary enlistments for the Navy and Marine Corps, which forces are to rely entirely on voluntary enlistments.

Authorized strength of Regular Army, all increments included, exclusive of Philippine Scouts	293,000
Present strength	131,481
Available for voluntary enlistments	161,519
War strength of National Guard organizations now existing	329,954
Present actual strength	123,605
Available for voluntary enlistments	206,349
Needed to raise existing units of the National Guard to war strength and the Regular Army with all increments added to war strength	367,868

The bill provides that a training cadre may be transferred from those two forces to train the additional forces. The War College Division recommends as a minimum cadre for training a force of 500,000 men in time of peace 148,850 men, and this would add that number of places for voluntary enlistments in the Regular Army and National Guard when this training cadre was taken for the first additional force of 500,000 men.

The law as drafted and construed by the Judge Advocate General before your committee would permit recruit training units for the Regular Army and National Guard to be maintained by voluntary recruiting. The minimum strength of such recruit training units would approximate one-third the strength of the units to which they would supply losses, or give a total strength of recruit training units for the Regular Army of approximately 98,000 men and 110,000 for existing units of the National Guard, or a total number of volunteers in the recruit training units of 208,000 men.

The bill further provides that special and technical troops may be raised by volunteer or compulsory methods. If these be raised by the volunteer system, it would add to the total number given above for voluntary enlistments, but as the number can not now be definitely determined they are omitted.

SUMMARY.

Additional numbers that may be filled by voluntary enlistments under War Department plan:

Units of the Regular Army	161,519
Units of the National Guard	206,349
First training cadre	148,850
Recruit training units for existing National Guard	110,000
Recruit training units for the Regular Army	98,000
Total	724,718

The figures quoted above answer the question asked in your letter in regard to the additional number volunteering in the Regular Army and the additional number volunteering in existing organizatons of the National Guard. The bill makes no provision for volunteer except as discussed above in any other of the authorized forces.

In reply to your fourth question "as to just what present organizations in the different States will be permitted to be completed and what the status of the men will be who enlist in the National Guard," I would say it is the intention of the War Department to raise existing organizations of the National Guard to peace strength of the Regular Army before permitting the organization of new units of that force. In order to complete the elements now lacking in the existing 12 divisions of the National Guard, the War Department will prescribe of what the new units shall consist; that is, whether they shall be Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, etc. A memorandum explaining this matter in detail, prepared in the Militia Division, is attached hereto.

The status of new men who have enlisted in the National Guard since the declaration of war will be identical with those of such men who have enlisted in the Regular Army and those selected for the additional forces to be provided by the act now under consideration; that is, they will be discharged at the expiration of the existing emergency.

Trusting that the information given above answers completely your letter of April 20, I am,

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Mr. President, it seems to me this letter gives us all the information we need relative to the number of men that will be permitted to volunteer under the present plan of the General Staff and the administration, and should enable us to discuss the present bill with a better understanding as to what the language of the same means, and what the intent and purposes of the War Department are.

We are to-day all aiming for the same end. I hope to see a law enacted that will be just as nearly as possible satisfactory to every Member of this body. But we must realize that we are at war. The time for talking and tears has passed. The time for action is here. While we may differ as to the manner and the method, I do not believe there is a Member of this body who differs as to what our purpose is, and that is to win the awful struggle that we have entered into.

We are necessarily compelled to raise a large army. The only question that we are discussing to-day is, How shall we raise it? What is it, Senators, that we are disagreeing upon? There was not a dissenting vote on the passage of the bill giving $7,000,000,000 as a war fund. We were all agreed upon that. The Senator who just preceded me, an honest man, an able man, an honored Member of this body whom we are glad to receive here, honestly differs from me as to the manner and method in which this army should be raised. But what are our differences?

I want to raise an army of 1,200.000 men as our Commander in Chief and the General Staff recommends it should be raised. I am not going to set my opinion against the opinion of the War College of this country, against the opinion of all the generals of our Army, and against the opinion of the man whom the Senator just said, in his judgment, was the greatest man on earth. I may not agree with him so fully as to all that, but I do agree with him when he says it is right and proper to follow him just as far as we can in this emergency.

As I said before, what are the differences? Take the bill section by section and we find that we agree on practically everything until we come to the method of raising the Army. I am just as much in favor of the rights of man and of democracy as any human being can be. I believe that the chance of every man in this country should be equal, and in attempting to secure that condition I believe we can reach the matter of equality in no fairer way than has been suggested by the administration and approved and adopted by the Committee on Military Affairs in recommending this measure.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has made an eloquent plea to permit the brave men of Tennessee to volunteer. They are given that privilege under this bill. The history of the brave men of Tennessee is one of which not only Tennessee but the entire Nation may well be proud; but under this bill we do not intend to deprive them of the opportunity to volunteer. What army do they want to join? Under this bill they can volunteer and enlist in the Regular Army or in the National Guard. What the General Staff is trying to do, and what the President is trying to do, is to get a central control, simply because the war in Europe, which has cost billions and billions of dollars and millions and millions of lives, has taught lessons that we should heed. Therefore, Senators, let me ask you why the men of Tennessee can not volunteer under the bill as reported by the committee. The Secretary of War tells us in this letter that in units of the Regular Army there is opportunity for 161,519 men to volunteer. That is the same Army that fought the battles of the War of Independence, the same Army that won the War of 1812, in which Jackson fought, and the same Army that went to Mexico. Our citizens have the opportunity to volunteer in that Army; but, if they do not want to do that, there is an opportunity for 206,349 men to enlist in the National Guard. If they prefer to organize a home guard and have their own regiments and have them turned over by the State to the Nation as units, they can volunteer in such organizations, and their term of service will only be for the war, just for this emergency, for the length of time that they are needed to defend their country. So, Mr. President, it seems to me that every opportunity is given to every American citizen to volunteer.

The question has been raised as to the age limit. This body must decide the age limit. The bill has been framed to cover certain ages, which the committee and the General Staff thought were right. If it is proper to raise the age limit from 25 to 35, as has been suggested, an amendment may be proposed to accomplish that purpose.

With this evidence before us as to what the Secretary of War has said and as to what the intent of the administration and the General Staff is, all these questions may be easily and thoroughly understood.

I hope that I may so conduct myself in the discussion of this matter that those who disagree with me will understand that I appreciate and know and feel that the difference between us is only a difference of opinion and not of purpose. It is my hope, as I have heretofore said, that we may counsel together, agree upon the sections of this bill that we can agree upon, and then, when we come to one or two subjects about which there may be difference of opinion, let us discuss them for a reasonable length of time, vote upon them, and then send the bill to the President to be signed, so that we may let Germany and the world know that America is in this war with a determined purpose to fight to a finish. By doing that we will do more for democracy and our country than in any other way. I hope we will finish the discussion at as early a date as possible, enact this measure into law, and then proceed to the consideration of other necessary business that must be transacted in order to prosecute the war to a successful conclusion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question. Does the bill limit the volunteers who may be raised under the provisions of the bill to the same age as in the case of those who are to be conscripted, to wit, between 19 and 25?

Mr. BRADY. A man can volunteer in any of the branches of the service to which I have referred between the ages of 18 and 45.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am glad to hear that. I thought from a remark that the Senator made that he was of the other opinion. Has the Senator in mind the total number who could volunteer under the terms of this bill? As he read from the Secretary's letter it was in fragments, the numbers being stated as to different organizations. I do not know whether the Senator has added the various numbers together.

Mr. BRADY. The total number who can volunteer under the proposed plan is 724,718.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And they can volunteer at any age up to as high as 45 years?

Mr. BRADY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to submit a proposed amendment to the pending bill raising the age limit. I ask that the amendment be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that action will be taken.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask leave to offer an amendment to the pending bill, to be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I offer an amendment to the pending military bill, and ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That action will be taken.

ODD FELLOWS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration——

Mr. FLETCHER. Before the Senator makes that motion I will ask him to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably the bill (S. 1800) to amend an act approved June 29, 1906, and entitled "An act to authorize the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia to sell, hold, and convey certain real estate." It is a unanimous report from the committee, and has reference to the Grand Lodge of Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia, which lodge is about to engage in constructing a new building. Everything is hung up pending an amendment of their charter. This amendment will authorize them to encumber the present site for the purpose of erecting a new building or to put a new building on another site and sell the present site. It will only take a few moments to pass the bill, and I think it ought to be done.

Mr. BRADY. Does the bill involve the expenditure of any amount of money from the Treasury?

Mr. FLETCHER. It involves the expenditure of no public money. It involves simply the power of the lodge to place a trust upon the property sufficient to put up a building.

Mr. BRADY. Before giving my consent to the passage of the bill I should like to have it read.

Mr. FLETCHER. It pertains to the lodge here in Washington. It simply amends the law relating to the grand lodge which heretofore has been passed by Congress. There is some question raised as to their power to place a trust on property that they might acquire in exchange for their present property.

Mr. BRADY. It is a private matter?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is entirely private, and relates to the local lodge of Odd Fellows in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It simply proposes to make a change in the charter of the local organization.

Mr. BRADY. Then I see no reason why the bill should not pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN addressed the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was merely going to ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The bill of the Senator from Florida can be passed by unanimous consent without laying aside the unfinished business temporarily.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved June 29, 1906, entitled "An act to authorize the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia to sell, hold, and convey certain real estate," be amended to read as follows:

"That the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia, a corporation created under and by virtue of an act of Congress approved June 12, 1860, be, and hereby is, authorized to sell and convey for, or to borrow and secure by deed of trust thereon, such sum or sums as may be satisfactory to the several organizations hereinafter named as owners, those parcels of ground in the city of Washington, D. C., known and designated on the plat of said city as lot No. 11 and part of lot No. 10 in square No. 457, together with the buildings thereon, known as Odd Fellows' Hall, the title to which property is now held in trust by the said corporation for the following organizations, owners thereof, namely: The Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia; Columbian Encampment, No. 1, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Central Lodge, No. 1, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Washington Lodge, No. 6, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Columbia Lodge, No. 10, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Beacon Lodge, No. 15, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Excelsior Lodge, No. 17, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; and Eastern Lodge, No. 7, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the consent of each of said several organizations being evidenced by a written instrument bearing the seal and the signature of its executive officers; the proceeds of said sale or loan may be applied to the payment and liquidation of any debt on said property or toward the purchase of other ground and the erection thereon of a building or buildings for like purposes as those for which the above-described property has been held, or to the erection of a new building, or to repairing or rebuilding on the ground now held, said property to be held in trust for said above-mentioned organizations according to their respective interests therein, and for such other organizations of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows as may hereafter contribute to the cost of such property, according to the amount respectively contributed by each: Provided, That any purchaser or purchasers of such property shall not be required to see to the proper application of the money paid therefor.

"SEC. 2. That the said corporation shall be authorized and capable of taking and holding real and personal property in trust for said organizations to any value not exceeding the sum of $1,000,000, and shall have full power and authority, upon a resolution or resolutions of each of said beneficiary organizations, to, from time to time, encumber any ground and the improvements thereon so held in trust for said organizations, or any part thereof, in such manner, for such purpose, and in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by said resolution or resolutions."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask that the following petition from citizens of Seattle, Wash., be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Unreservedly we ally ourselves with that fundamental democracy toward which all mankind strives, and of which the English-speaking people are happily the chief exponents, as against the medieval autocracy by which the Imperial German Government temporarily dominates its own people and plunges the world into armed conflict.

We favor conducting this war with the utmost of resolution and expedition and pledge thereto, so far as we may, the hearty cooperation of our entire citizenship. We recognize the great sacrifice of personal interests cheerfully accepted by the men of our Army and Navy and favor making the most perfect possible provision for their success, for their safety, and for their well-being. To that end we purpose doing, in our several capacities, whatever may be possible to us. We will refrain from profiting by the sacrifice of our neighbors and favor making that practice generally impossible by limiting permissible profits on the sale of munitions of war and necessities for life. We also favor conducting this war on a cash basis, so far as may be done, in order to avoid burdening our posterity with debt for a philanthropic endeavor, the cost of which our Nation can meet from day to day by eliminating wasteful and useless private expenditures, by the joint application of our united labors to useful purposes, by putting our vacant lands to productive uses, and by directing into the Public Treasury all private incomes over and above reasonable requirements for living expenses.

In furtherance thereof we respectfully urge upon Congress the speedy enactment of appropriate laws limiting the rate of permissible profits in certain cases, laying a special war tax of 3 per cent on personal income above $5,000 per annum, and increasing that rate with respect to larger sums, so that no person may spend for himself during the war a larger sum than the salary of the President of the United States, namely, $75,000 per annum, or thereabouts.

We further request the President and Congress to enact the necessary legislation to create a food commission for the purpose of eliminating waste and preventing speculation, and we make the following recommendations:

No. 1. That the commission make an immediate survey of all the food resources now on hand in the United States.

No. 2. That the commission commandeer the storage warehouses and that the storage of food be controlled by the commission.

No. 3. That the price of all foodstuffs be fixed by the commission.

No. 4. That the commission encourage the planting of crops and the raising of cattle, hogs, sheep, and poultry in every possible way.

No. 5. That the commission act as the middleman and distributors of food from the producer to the retailer, without profit to the commission, until the war closes.

The foregoing petition was unanimously indorsed by a large mass meeting held April 12, 1917, at the Tivoli Theater, Seattle, Wash., at the call of the Commonwealth Club, and the undersigned committee was instructed by said mass meeting to immediately forward the same to Congress.

OTTO A. CASE, Chairman.
Mrs. GEORGE A. SMITH.
F. E. RAWLINGS.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented 25 telegrams from citizens and firms in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against volunteer enlistment, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON. I present a petition from citizens of Stearns County, Minn., pledging support to the country, which I ask to to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAUK CENTER, MINN., April 20, 1917.

Senator KNUTE NELSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As loyal and patriotic citizens of Stearns County, in mass meeting assembled, a thousand strong, we pledge our services to the Nation's cause to the extent of our lives and fortunes.

We offer our services to do all in our power to help in the production of food and the cultivation of the soil that none may suffer for the lack of proper food. We offer to do all we can to help build up an army of workers who will enlist for the cause of democracy.

We offer this resolution in order that a more effective force may be gathered to help strengthen the Government in using its resources to bring the war to a speedy and successful close.

We offer this message to you that you may act immediately and crush once and for all time the great monster and foe of human liberty and freedom. We appreciate such men as you and trust you will live many years to serve as a representative of our Nation.

Respectfully submitted.

A. J. DUBEAN,
Mayor of Sauk Center, Minn.
JOHN N. McGIBBON,
President Board of Education.
M. D. AYGARN,
Superintendent of Schools.

Mr. KNOX presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Dubois, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation providing a selective draft system, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Portage, Homer City, and Oakmont; of the congregation of the Christ Methodist Episcopal Church, of West Philadelphia; of the Presbytery of Butler; and of the congregation of the Ebenezer Methodist Episcopal Church, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition during the period of the war, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COLT presented the petition of Augustus T. Swift and 32 other citizens of Rhode Island, praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Business Men's Association of Olneyville, R. I., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the saving of daylight, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a petition of the faculty and students of the University of Texas, Austin, Tex., praying for the raising of an army by selective draft, based upon the principle of universal liability to military service, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of 292 citizens of Cisco; of sundry citizens of Celina; of 300 citizens of Odem; of 35 citizens of Irene; of sundry citizens of Electra, Hartley, and Carthage; of the congregations of the Baptist and Methodist Churches of Slaton, Woodland Heights, Houston, and Mullen; of the Business Men's Bible Class of the First Baptist Church of Temple; of the congregations of the First Baptist Church of McKinney, the Baptist Church of Arlington, the First Baptist Church of Richland, the First Christian Church of Paris; of the Pastors' Association, the presidents of Simmons College and Christian College of Abilene; and of sundry churches of Douglassville and Carleton, all in the State of Texas, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of 53 citizens of Galveston; of sundry citizens of Houston; of the Farmers' Institute of Westover; of the Williamson County Farmers and Citizens' Institute; and of H. O. Nelson & Co., of Houston, all in the State of Texas, praying for selective conscription, and indorsing the administration's war policies, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of six citizens of Greenville, Tex., praying for the passage of the House volunteer army bill, and remonstrating against the Senate bill, favoring the age limit from 21 to 40, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REJECTION.

Executive nomination rejected by the Senate April 24 (legislative day of April 23), 1917.

U. V. Whipple, of Cordele, Ga., to be United States district judge, southern district of Georgia.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 24, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, let the light of Thy truth possess our minds, and the sweetness of Thy love come into our hearts, that we may love mercy, do justly, and walk humbly with Thee this day, and at its close enjoy the peace and tranquillity of soul which comes through right living; for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to know if it is proposed that the general debate shall continue throughout the day?

Mr. DENT. Just prior to the adjournment yesterday afternoon unanimous consent was obtained that the procedure to-day should be the same as yesterday, and that this whole day should be used for general debate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 3545, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] is recognized for 45 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Kentucky begins, may we know how the time stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has used 2 hours and 46 minutes, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] has used 2 hours and 50 minutes, so that the time used has been practically evenly divided. The gentleman from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not unmindful of the responsibility that rests upon me and upon every Member of the Congress of the United States in these trying hours. And I feel that each member of the committee and the House approaches this most important question with a full desire to do that which is best for the country. I, with the majority of the committee, have been assailed by militaristic bodies and organizations through a certain element of the press throughout the country as being opposed to giving the President of the United States the power and the authority for which he asks to conduct this war. That statement is untrue, and everyone familiar with the facts knows that it is untrue. I do not charge that that falsehood went from the press gallery of this House, nor do I believe that it did. In fact, some members of the press have admitted to me that their reports appeared in some of the papers which they represent entirely different to the way they wrote them. One newspaper man came from New York for the purpose of interviewing the members of the committee, and frankly admitted to me after he had done so that we had been grossly misrepresented. But, that same chain of newspapers that have been misrepresenting facts to the American people in this case have heretofore misrepresented and libeled Members of Congress with the result that their charges were disproven by the facts and discredited by the people in due time.

It is true that there are some points on which the committee has been unable to agree with the plan of the General Staff of the Army, notwithstanding the fact that the plan of the General Staff has the sanction of the President. In fact, there is not one single Member of the committee or the House, so far as I know, who is willing to accept the plan of the General Staff exactly as it came to us, because it contained some provisions which were absolutely arbitrary and which, if enacted into law, would place unnecessary hardships upon the people, without adding to the efficiency of the Army. The committee therefore, by unanimous vote, eliminated or amended those provisions. One of those provisions, to which I shall refer later, would have subjected men to punishment in the Federal courts and confinement in jail for failure to register for draft, even though prevented from doing so by circumstances beyond their control. And your committee felt that it is the duty of Congress to protect the people against such indefensible hardships and injustices, and yet we have been criticized by some of the newspapers for doing so.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that it is not popular in some sections or among some people for a United States Senator or Representative to even have an opinion of his own at this time, much less express it. But that does not change or alter the sworn duty of Members of Congress to their constituents and their country. It seems that some people have lost sight of the fact that the only guaranty of the perpetuity of democratic government is freedom of thought, freedom of expression, honesty of purpose, and majority rule on the part of the people and their representatives in the solution of our great national problems. Some people have also lost sight of the fact that the Constitution of the United States imposes certain duties upon the Congress, and imposes upon its Members an oath to faithfully perform those duties. Some of those duties prescribed by the Constitution read as follows:

Congress shall have power—
1. To raise and support armies, * * *.
2. To provide and maintain a navy.
3. To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

Yet in the face of that language contained in the Constitution of our country, the greatest document ever written, that document which constitutes the pillar upon which our Government rests, and which guarantees its existence, some people, in this good year of 1917, less than 130 years after the adoption of that Constitution, believe that Members of Congress, the duly elected representatives of the people, those people who make up the Army, who fight the battles of their country and die for its rights and its liberties, are not supposed to express an opinion or proclaim a conviction as to who or what class of the people shall be called to perform those arduous and painful duties, and if they dare to do so they are attacked by the militaristic journals and societies of all the country; but that shall not deter me in the discharge of my duty to the masses of people, upon whose shoulders and hearts the burdens of this war will most heavily bear.

I realize the necessity of unanimity of action between the legislative and executive branches of the Government at this time, and I and several other members of the committee have devoted several days to an effort to bring about absolute unanimity. We have all been willing to yield opinions and make concessions, but the military authorities have been unwilling to make any concessions, even in matters which are immaterial to the efficiency of the Army but most vital to the people. The one glowing evidence of that fact is their persistent effort to build the Army out of boys under 21 years of age. The only reason they give, or that I have heard them give, is that boys of that age are more obedient than older people. No one disputes that children, as a rule, are more obedient than men; but this is a man's war, and, by the eternals, they shall never fight it with children if I can prevent it.

As I said a moment ago, we have all been anxious to bring about unanimity of action, and to effect that result have been willing to yield opinions. Speaking for myself, I am frank to say that regardless of my opinion that those desiring to volunteer should have an opportunity to do so, I offered before we reported the bill, because of my desire for unanimity of action as well as my willingness to yield opinion, to yield on that if the administration would yield on the minimum age limit and recommend that it be made 21 instead of 19. I made this proposition not alone in the interest of harmony but also because I believed that the question of keeping the burdens of this war off of the undeveloped youths of this country the more important of the two. But they refused to do so, which forced me to yield not only my opinion but my conviction on that vital question of the minimum age, or be classed as opposing the administration. And then I accepted the gage of battle and shall fight to the last ditch, utilizing every means at my command, both in the House and in conference, to keep the burdens of this war off the shoulders of the undeveloped youth of this country, who have a right to develop to manhood under normal conditions and should be protected in that right. The question as to whether the Army shall be made and the battles fought by the mature men of the country or the immature youths is not a military but a civil question, yea, a humane question. On matters strictly military I am willing to yield my opinions to the opinions of our military experts, especially in this crisis. But on questions which are not military in character but which affect the basic principles of the Republic and the fundamental principles of humanity and Christianity I refuse to turn over my brain, my heart, my conscience, and my soul to the military experts of this or any other nation on earth. [Applause.]

I favor the volunteer system because I believe it in keeping with the ideals of a free people, and, further, because I believe that an army can be raised more quickly by voluntary enlistment and that it will be a more effective army than a conscripted army. I shall therefore vote to retain the provision in the bill which authorizes the President to call for volunteers; but if that provision shall be stricken out by the majority vote of both Houses, thereby confining us exclusively to the draft system, then, in the name of justice and humanity, let us draft men, not children.

I shall not refer further to this subject at this time, but will return to it later.

I shall now come directly to the merits of the bill. As I have said, the Secretary of War presented to the committee a plan drawn by himself with the advice of the General Staff which had the sanction of the President of the United States, asking us to enlarge the Regular Army to full war strength; first, by voluntary enlistment; second, by conscription if the forces do not come by voluntary enlistment, and we give him that. Next he asks for an increase in the National Guard to full war strength, first by voluntary enlistment and second by conscription in the event that men do not enlist, and we give him that. Then he asks for authority to raise two additional increments of 500,000 men each, all by conscription, and stated that it would take about five months to put the machinery into operation for raising these increments by conscription. And the committee said: "We are willing, Mr. Secretary, that you shall have all the authority necessary to raise all the forces that you may need in the prosecution of this war regardless of the number that may be required. We will give you the draft system, for which you ask; not because a majority of the committee favors the draft system, for we do not except as a last resort; but we will provide for it in the bill so that it will be at the command of the President in the event he should need it, which we hope may not occur. We will also insert in the bill a provision authorizing the President to call for volunteers so that the men who want to volunteer may have an opportunity to do so while you are getting the draft system organized and perfected." We insert this provision in the bill in the hope that the President will exercise the authority which it will give him if it is permitted to remain in the bill, and confidently believe that if he does exercise that authority by giving the men of America an opportunity to volunteer it will never be necessary for him to exercise the power of conscription.

Because this provision was inserted in the bill, the committee has been attacked by the militaristic forces of the entire country; so let us attempt to see and understand why they are so opposed to it when it does not even make it mandatory upon the President to call for volunteers, but only gives him authority to do so. Ah, gentlemen, we had just as well be frank. We know and the military experts and their supporters know that we know why they are making such desperate efforts to have the volunteer provision stricken out of the bill. The reason is perfectly obvious, and I can not violate my conscience by remaining silent and saying by my silence that I indorse compulsory military service, both in war and in peace, as the military authorities desire it. If you will carefully follow the arguments of the representatives of the General Staff during this debate you will observe that they are working as hard to establish a compulsory policy for the future as they are to prepare for the raising of an army for the present war.

I have always favored adequate preparedness for national defense, and during my six years' service on the Military Committee I have worked hard for it. I favor widespread military training; but in peace times, at least, the young men of America should be permitted to choose their respective professions or pursuits, which is denied them under a compulsory military system, for the young man who is preparing to enter some permanent profession or pursuit knows not what hour the summons may come calling him to fill a vacancy in the Regular Army. And, on the other hand, the man who desires to enter the Army and make it his life's work is not permitted to do so unless his name happens to be drawn from the box, all of which is contrary to American ideals, and when this shall happen in the future I do not purpose to be placed in the attitude of having indorsed it. I therefore take advantage of this opportunity to call attention to the effort that is being made toward permanent compulsory service for the future and to voice my protest against it.

There has been a fight in this country from the beginning of the Republic to fasten upon the country a compulsory military system for peace times as well as in war. Proposition after proposition leading to that has been put up to Congress from time to time under normal conditions, and it has been refused by the Congress, and the people have sustained Congress in its refusal.

But at this time we see in the actions of the General Staff the boldest of all efforts to fasten upon the country once and forever a compulsory military system, which the Government has not heretofore been willing to accept. When questioned as to why they refuse to encourage immediate enlistment for service at the front, they say it is "because it would be a recognition of the old volunteer system, which is broken down." I read in the papers the other day that when the question was asked why Col. Roosevelt was not commissioned to go to France, it was stated it was refused "because it would be a recognition of the old antiquated volunteer system."

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I would rather not yield at the present time, but I will later. But, my friends, all of you know or should know that the oldest and most antiquated military system known to civilization is the compulsory system. Go back 470 years before Christ to the wars between the Greeks and the Persians, the greatest battles known to civilized man, and what do we find there? We find an army of less than 110,000 Greeks on the one side, freemen, fighting for the love of country, defeating an army of 2,600,000 Persians fighting as conscripts. In the Revolutionary War, the first war of our country, at the Battle of Trenton, Washington, with his volunteers, captured the British colonel, Rahl, and his thousand Hessian conscripts without the loss of a single American. And yet they say that the compulsory system is the only one and is a new and modern idea.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is the gentleman certain that the Greek Army was a volunteer army?

Mr. FIELDS. I only know what history says.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is the gentleman sure that history says that?

Mr. FIELDS. The Persian King, Xerxes, himself in speaking of the Greeks and in reasoning how they could not reckon with his forces, made the following statement:

> Besides, continued the king, there is a great difference in the character of the troops. The Greeks are all freemen, while my soldiers are all slaves—bound absolutely to do my bidding, without complaint or murmur. Such soldiers as mine, who are habituated to submit entirely to the will of another and who live under the continual fear of the lash, might perhaps be forced to go into battle against a great superiority of numbers or under other manifest disadvantages; but freemen, never.

Let us see what the historian says about the Persian Army. Abbott, the great historian, says, in speaking of the Persian soldiers:

> They were all slaves and had been torn from their rural homes all over the Empire by a merciless conscription from which there was no possible escape.

That brings us to the point as to whether or not a volunteer army is a more effective force than a conscripted army, and all history from that just cited, during the reign of Xerxes down to the present, bears testimony that the volunteer army is the most effective, and I am unwilling to go on record by my silence or otherwise as indorsing the attacks which have been made upon and the arguments which have been made against the volunteer system and the service previously rendered under it. Men must fight willingly to fight effectively. The volunteer always fights willingly and eagerly; the unwilling conscript does not.

Our Government was founded through the efforts of our volunteers. Our flag was planted by our volunteers. Our battles have been fought and our victories won by volunteers, who fought not by compulsion but as freemen, fighting willingly, not grudgingly; fighting spiritually, not mechanically. And, Mr. Chairman, their loyalty, their valor, and their achievements have been the pride of America, which through the efforts and under the protection of volunteer forces under a volunteer system has become the richest, the grandest, and the mightiest Nation on earth. But now that system which permits warriors to fight as freemen—that system under which our Government was established and has been maintained—is attacked and its destruction sought. It is to be overthrown by the militarists of the land and supplanted by a compulsory system without evidence that it has failed in the past or is likely to do so in the future.

We hear much said in the arguments against the volunteer system of the mistakes made by Great Britain at the beginning of the present war under her volunteer system. Well, let us see if these charges are well founded. Statistics show that Great Britain enlisted 5,000,000 men under her volunteer system before she adopted conscription, and has enlisted one and one-half million in about the same length of time since she adopted conscription. Therefore her mistakes were not due to the volunteer system, but to her indiscriminate methods of enlisting or assigning her men. She permitted men to enlist as privates who should have been held in reserve as officers, or who were most valuable men in their munitions factories or other industries essential to the support of the army, thereby disorganizing her industrial and productive forces. But we have guarded against those mistakes in the bill under consideration. We give the Secretary of War wide discretion in the enlistment of men either under the volunteer system or by conscription. Under this bill the volunteer or conscript will be examined as to his usefulness in industrial pursuits, and if it is found or decided that he is more valuable in civil or industrial life than at the front, or that he has children or dependents who need him at home, he is not permitted to enlist. Therefore if the volunteer plan remains in the bill we will have none of the mistakes that were made by Great Britain of which you have heard so much.

I referred a few moments ago to the real issue at stake between those of us who oppose compulsory military service except as an absolute necessity and those who favor it for both war and peace times. The real issue is this: Our hopes are their fears. We hope that the volunteer provision will be retained in the bill and that the President will exercise the authority which it gives him by issuing a call for volunteers and that that call will prove so successful that it will not be necessary to again fasten upon this country the conscription that we experienced during the Civil War, which was neither satisfactory nor profitable, and which was precipitated by the War Department as a step toward compulsory service, as I will endeavor to show before I conclude. And they fear it; they fear that if the volunteer provision is retained that he will issue the call and that the call will be responded to by such a mighty force of fighting men that it will never be necessary to conscript a single soldier to fight this war, and that is the only issue.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that the success of the volunteer system would interfere with the future plans of Army officers—is that the gentleman's thought?

Mr. FIELDS. I mean to say this: That if the President should issue a call for volunteers, to be raised in local or State units so that neighbor could go by the side of neighbor and friend by the side of friend, that call, in my opinion, would be responded to by the fighting men of America in such numbers that the power of conscription would never have to be exercised, and the hope of those who are trying to force permanent conscription onto the country would go glimmering and their propaganda would fall to the ground. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Is the gentleman prepared to yield now for a question in connection with what he was discussing a few moments ago?

Mr. FIELDS. I yield.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman made reference to Col. Roosevelt. I do not wish to embarrass my colleague by this question, and if it will embarrass him he need not answer. It has been rumored that there may be reasons other than military ones why Col. Roosevelt's proposition to raise a volunteer army has not been accepted. Does the gentleman know anything about that and does he think such a matter should figure in this crisis?

Mr. FIELDS. I do not know why his services have not been accepted, and I do not care to discuss that phase of the subject. But if what you indicate be true—and I am not charging that it is—I will say that this is not the time for figuring on or quibbling over who shall have the glories that are to be carried back from the battle fields of Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I referred a moment ago to the exercise of the power of conscription in the Civil War. Let us see what number of the men who fought in that war on the side of the Union were conscripted. The records of the War Department show that only 2.3 per cent of the total were conscripted; the remainder, or 97.7 per cent, were volunteers. I do not know whether it is correct or not, but I have read that 60 per cent of those conscripted into the service deserted. Whether that be true or not I do not say, but we do know this: You know and I know and every other man knows that a man does more effectively the service that he likes, performs more effectively that duty which he performs willingly, than do the men who are forced to perform it. There is no question about that. Gen. SHERWOOD states that he had in his command 70 men who had been conscripted, and that 68 of them deserted. Before I get away from it I desire to refer a little further to this charge that the volunteer system was a failure. What occurred when the Civil War began? Men volunteered faster than they could take them and in greater numbers than they could use them. Reading from the reports of Provost Marshal Fry, I find the following:

Under the authority of Congress referred to in the foregoing, a force of 637,126 men was in the service in the spring of 1862. The popular impression was then that this immense number would be sufficient for overthrowing the military power of the rebellion and putting down all armed resistance to the Federal Government. Congress and the people deemed it necessary to check the enormous current expenditures by discontinuing the enlistment of men for the Army. The popular demand was yielded to, and on the 3d of April the volunteer recruiting service was closed by general order from the War Department. Under this order recruitment for the Army was immediately stopped, property at the rendezvous sold, and the offices closed throughout the country. Owing to the unexpected and unfavorable turn of the fortunes of war in the following months and the consequent depletion of the armies in the field, the recruiting service was resumed by general orders June 6, 1862.

When the war started men came and offered their services in numbers so great that they could not be used, and they were turned away without recognition of their loyalty and their patriotism, and as soon as it was seen that further enlistments or further recruits were necessary demand was started throughout the country for a conscription law, which was placed upon the statute books without delay. And that law stifled the spirit of patriotism, made the war unpopular in the North, and resulted in unrest and riots in many sections. It took more to suppress the riots than the conscripts were worth.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman spare me time there for one more suggestion, and I promise not to interrupt him any more?

Mr. FIELDS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman, I am sure, recalls with reference to the situation in Kentucky at that time that there were a number of units organized in our State that wanted and tried to get mustered into the Federal service, but could not, as the quota was filled, and they. therefore, went on and served, some of them for a year and a half, along with the Regular soldiers, and were never mustered in because there was no room for them under the call. In some counties in the section of the State, where the gentleman and I come from, the total number of volunteers was greater in the Union Army alone than the total number of voters then in those counties. One of these counties formerly in my district is now in the seventh district of Kentucky, now represented by my friend, Mr. CANTRILL.

Mr. FIELDS. I understand that is correct. Kentucky discharged her duty then, as she had previously done, and is ready to do so again.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Yesterday one of the Members made the statement that the volunteers could not be used, they would come more rapidly than they would be utilized, and the gentleman's reading this morning from the RECORD would indicate something of the same sort. Is there weight in that argument that volunteers would come so rapidly that they could not be utilized, and therefore later would be ineffective because they would not offer themselves again? Is there argument in that or not?

Mr. FIELDS. I think there is much weight in the argument that men would come faster than they could be used, but if I were administering the laws I would then and there register them. Then I would enroll them in the service just as fast as I could get to them, and turn no man away who wanted to fight for his country.

Mr. LANGLEY. In other words, conscription would be rather a restraint upon enlistments, which is contrary to the argument they have been advancing here in support of it. The volunteers would really come too fast for them.

Mr. FIELDS. We could most assuredly raise an army more rapidly by voluntary enlistment at this time.

Let me suggest this: In this crisis no one wants to hamstring the administration and the Commander in Chief in this war. But we must all recognize the fact that we need the best fighting force that can be had, and who, in your opinion, would make the best fighters in the trenches of Europe if our boys shall have to fight there? An army of youths, two-sevenths of whom are under 21 years of age, undeveloped physically and mentally, many of them with no spirit of fight within their bosom, or an army of sturdy volunteers who had enlisted because of their desire to fight? Why, the question answers itself. Men upon this floor have criticized those who fear to fight, yet they can not help it. They were not the masters of their creation. God Almighty created them. I have long since decided that it is not proper or right for me to criticize my fellow man because his Maker made him different from me. This is not a time to inflict punishment upon men because they are not brave. This is a time to wage the battles of the United States to a successful victory. Let them be waged with brave men, not cowards; with fully developed men, not boys who are but mere children, unable to endure the hardships of war.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I yield.

Mr. BATHRICK. Is it not a fact that the average age of the soldiers of the Northern Army was about 19 years?

Mr. FIELDS. It is; and it is also a fact that statistics of the War Department show that for every death in battle there were more than two deaths by curable and largely preventable diseases, largely because of the tenderness of these youths and their susceptibility to disease. [Applause.]

Mr. BATHRICK. Well, will not the gentleman concede that under more modern surgical methods in the field this would not occur?

Mr. FIELDS. I am unwilling to concede that undeveloped youths under any condition are not more susceptible to disease than the developed man. Now, one other point——

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I do.

Mr. BARKLEY. Without regard to any personal opinion as to the minimum age limit, what is there about boys of 19 or 20 years that makes them more susceptible to disease than a man of 40?

Mr. FIELDS. I rely upon the highest authority I can find upon this subject, which I accept rather than an opinion of my own or others who are not authorities on the subject.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. JAMES. Does not the gentleman know that the death of these volunteers, boys of the age of 19 to 21, was due to the incompetency of the volunteer officers? If the gentleman had experience in 1898 he would know that.

Mr. FIELDS. There may have been many causes for the numerous deaths, but the best authorities that we have teach us that boys of that age are not as hardy as men fully developed, and we can not get away from that fact.

Mr. HARDY. And they are not capable of taking care of themselves.

Mr. FIELDS. The remark of the gentleman from Texas is apt, that they are not capable of caring for themselves. They have not the will power to resist temptation, they have not the control of their appetites and passions like mature men have.

Now, let us come to the question of selective conscription. Those who favor it say that it is an equitable proposition because it is just like our taxing system that every man is forced to perform the duty that he owes to his Government. Every man pays taxes, but every man does not fight for his country. You propose to apply the selective-draft system to citizens of designated ages and then call from that class certain ones upon whom the call chances to drop by lottery, and in this way we may call one man who is practically useless in the Army and leave by his side another one who is full of the spirit of fight and who wants to enlist, but who under the system is prohibited, who would be a most valuable man in the ranks. Therefore the Government suffers the loss of a good soldier and accepts a poor one. You can not legislate equity into war or into the distribution of its burdens. There is no equity in it; it is a cruel process that we must unfortunately resort to for the preservation of our national life, but when it comes to distributing the burdens there is no way by which it can be done equitably unless it would be to draft all men, each to serve the same length of time, and even then the burdens would be greater on some than on others because of differences of temperament, so there is no way of equally distributing the burdens of war.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FIELDS. I do.

Mr. FESS. I am trying to seek light; I have an open mind on this matter. The selective conscription will leave the man in the munitions factory receiving $3 to $5 a day that he is now commanding and take the boy who is not thus employed and send him to the line at $15 a month. What will the parents or the citizenry of the locality seeing this feel and say as to the discrimination? What effect will it have upon the citizenry in the discrimination?

Mr. FIELDS. That is the seriousness of the proposition.

Mr. FESS. That is the thing that is troubling me.

Mr. FIELDS. That is the seriousness of the proposition. We must all admit the fact that, regardless of what our personal opinion may be, we must deal with public sentiment in this great conflict. Laws are made by public sentiment; they are executed by public sentiment, and the law that does not meet public approval will bring to the country we can not tell what in a crisis like this. That thought has given me no little concern. But let us hope that whatever is done will receive universal approval and prove most successful.

Now, I must hasten on. I return now to the point upon which I absolutely differ with the administration and upon which I can not yield, and that is the minimum age limit. [Applause.] When I started the fight in my committee to raise the minimum age limit from 19 to 21 I was told that I would stand alone, but I did not believe it, for I knew that I was right and felt that this Nation could not afford at this time to commit such an error. This is not a matter of sentiment or opinion, it is a question of conscience, because it touches the principles of humanity at the present and affects the race in the future.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I do.

Mr. McKENZIE. In the interest of fairness will the gentleman from Kentucky, my colleague, not say to the committee that many of those of us who stand for conscription agree with him on that proposition.

Mr. FIELDS. I was just coming to that point, if the gentleman will permit me. There was opposition to my efforts to raise the minimum age limit when I started the fight, but every man upon that committee is a good, honest, conscientious thinker, and when the proposition was finally passed upon by the committee I am proud to say that my amendment to raise the minimum age limit from 19 to 21 received 20 votes to 1 vote against it. [Applause.]

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman yield at that point, because I think it is important?

Mr. FIELDS. I yield.

Mr. WISE. Is it not true that while we are deceiving ourselves on the proposition that we raise the age limits to 21 and 40 that under the testimony of the Secretary of War we are taking his bill wherein every man who is actually called to the service will be between 21 and 25? Did not he say that he would not consent at all unless he had the right to call them in groups, and he would call the first group first and in that way he would get them between those ages? And you never would get them above those ages.

Mr. FIELDS. If my colleague will permit me, I am discussing the minimum age limit, and we do say positively in our bill prepared by the Military Committee that the minimum age limit shall be 21. I will reach the proposition to which the gentleman refers before I conclude.

Mr. LANGLEY. Is it not 19 in the Senate bill, which is now being considered in that body?

Mr. FIELDS. It is 19 in the Senate bill, and we will have that to deal with in the future, and I learn that an amendment will be offered in this body to reduce the minimum age to 19. I therefore desire to devote a few minutes' discussion to it at this time so the membership may have time to think over it carefully, after which I am sure you will sustain the decision of the House committee or House conferees.

Now, why do I oppose conscripting the youth of this country for this military service? First, this is a man's war and should be fought by the men of this country. Man owes his second duty to his government; his first to his God. But the child by divine right belongs to the mother, and the Government should protect her in that right, and I do not propose to consent that the first wound inflicted in this war shall be inflicted upon the heart of American motherhood. [Applause.] Oh, you say, the boy after he is 21 must go, and what is the difference? There is a great deal of difference. When a man reaches his majority the question of his duty in war is a question between him and his government. His mother yields him, because it is his duty to go. But call the tender youth, who the framers of the Constitution said because of his physical and mental immaturity is incapable of participating in the Government, and subject him to the burdens and the ravages of war to die for the country in the Government of which he can not participate because of his immaturity, and you outrage justice and crucify the principles of humanity. I pray God that the Congress of the United States and the manhood of America may have the strength and the courage to forego the commission of such an act.

Mr. LUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. LUNN. I want to ask my colleague whether he believes it is the intention or the desire of the War Department to fight this war in the trenches or anywhere else with youths under 21 years of age?

Mr. FIELDS. We are not dealing with intentions, we are dealing with facts, we are dealing with a concrete proposition, a definite plan, presented to us for raising an army for probably the most arduous military duty that any army of this country has ever faced, and that says plainly that at least a portion of the Army, and probably all of it, shall be boys under 21 years of age.

And another thought in connection with that, my dear sir; we must realize that when men are called into the Army for this war they are called for service. They are not called to pleasure resorts; they are not called to places for mental and physical development, but they are called for arduous military duty. And when you go into the home and conscript the youth who is still under his mother's care the effect is just the same upon her and upon society, whether you are going to put him into the trenches two years from now or to-morrow. There is no difference in the moral effect upon the home. Therefore I refuse to strike this unnecessary blow at the homes of the United States, which have enough to suffer, God knows, at the best.

Mr. LUNN. Yesterday you asked me if I did not want to be fair. I answered, "Yes." I would like to ask you the same question. Do you not want to be fair?

Mr. FIELDS. I do.

Mr. LUNN. Do you believe the President of the United States, or the Secretary of War, or any member of this minority, or any Member of this House that favors conscription wants to strike a blow at the home?

Mr. FIELDS. I am not speaking of intentions. I am speaking of the plan we have been asked to write into law and what it will do if enacted into law, as requested. I am speaking of the plan of the General Staff to make this army out of boys under 21 years of age, and the gentleman knows that that is their plan, which they say has the approval of the President, which I very much regret. I contend that such a law would strike a painful and unnecessary blow at the homes of America. I am not impugning the motives of the President, but I have a right, and it is my duty as I see it, to differ with him on this vital question. I realize how far superior he is to me, but still he is a human being; and I read in Holy Writ that there is none perfect. No; not one. Then, all who are not perfect are subject to err. What man has ever lived, save the Son of God, who did not at some time or under some circumstances commit errors?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I yield to my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Let me read from the hearings before the committee in reply to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN], who questioned the Secretary of War on that very point. The record reads as follows:

Mr. LUNN. That, it seems to me, is what we are doing now.

Secretary BAKER. We are going to enroll all of the boys between the ages of 19 and 25 years, and then choose by lot, getting some 20 years old, and so on.

Mr. LUNN. Why not make the limit 40 years?

Secretary BAKER. We would then be interfering too much with the industries.

Mr. LUNN. It is not a class of boys 19 years of age, but a class composed of men between the ages of 18 and 25 years.

Secretary BAKER. That would be the effect of the operation of this draft. A man will draw lot No. 1, and that man would go with the first 500,000 troops, while the man who drew lot No. 2 would go with the second 500,000 troops.

Mr. LUNN. Men from 25 years up would be entirely eliminated from any possible conscription?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

That was the testimony of the Secretary of War upon the very question the gentleman asked.

Mr. FIELDS. I thank my colleague, Gov. SHALLENBERGER, for calling attention to the testimony before the committee. And in addition to that, the plan of the General Staff was written up by John Temple Graves, one of the most prominent writers of America, after he had conferred with a member of the General Staff, and was published in the New York American on April 17, and probably in many other papers, as well as referred to repeatedly during the discussion of this bill. And neither the General Staff, nor anyone representing it, has disputed or challenged the statements of Mr. Graves. His article reads as follows:

GENERAL STAFF TO CALL OUT FIRST 500,000 BOYS UNDER 20 YEARS OF AGE.

[By John Temple Graves, staff correspondent of the New York American.]

WASHINGTON, April 16.

Just exactly how conscription or, as the President denominates it, "selective draft" will proceed is, of course, the most interesting of all questions just now connected with the organization of the new American army. I have from the Army and the General Staff standpoint the plan as it presents itself now and as it will prevail until Congress should alter the plan of the General Staff.

The War Department has sent to Congress its own idea and the idea of the Commander in Chief that conscription should be voted first and let the volunteer system come as an incident of it.

The President's wish, which is conscription or "selective draft," will eventually be voted by Congress.

FIRST ARMY OF 500,000.

The first grand army of 500,000 men, according to the staff officers, will be raised under the selective draft from men not over 20 years of age. It will be the "first class." These selective conscripts will not necessarily be kept undistributed. The majority, however, will not be assigned to other divisions than that created by the first general levy.

The process of the original levy of the beardless first army of a half million was explained to-day by a member of the General Staff.

First. The whole country is to be divided into 16 military districts, the limits of which have not yet been defined.

Second. A general officer with a complete staff is to be assigned to certain cities or localities as headquarters. These officers will report primarily to the departmental commanders. The general in command in the territorial division will select and equip camps for the selected conscripts.

REGISTRATION FIRST STEP.

Third. When the bill embodying this plan is passed, the postmasters of the second, third, and fourth classes and the rural free delivery carriers are to make registrations listing all the men in their sections who are from 19 years of age to 25 years. The bill prescribes the age as from 18 to 25, but the Army plan denominates the first men as "the 19-year-old class." They will probably be 19 years old before they are actually assigned to service.

Fourth. When the registration is completed the War Department will officially call out "class 19" first. The selected men will repair to the camps selected. Those who are exempted will be allowed to depart. Those who after physical examination are pronounced sound will be enrolled.

Fifth. The selected men will then go into immediate and vigorous military training. It is proposed by the General Staff to raise 150,000 officers and men under present laws to man the first 500,000 men. But in the meantime the training will proceed with all possible energy and dispatch under the officers now available.

After training the first army will be assigned to companies, battalions, regiments, troops, squadrons, batteries, brigades, and divisions until the military units have all been completed.

WILL BE READY IN YEAR.

It is believed all this can be done, with the virile adaptability of American youth, within less than a year after the arrival of the men in the training camps. The staff officers express full confidence there will be enough men of the "19-year class," as registered in the postal districts, to make the complement of 500,000 and to render unnecessary the immediate calling of the "20-year class."

If, however, the registration of 19-year-old men is not sufficient, the "20-year class" will be called, and out of this second class will be selected by lot a number sufficient to make up the first 500,000.

This latter contingency, is, however, so remote a contingency in the judgment of staff officers that they give it little consideration.

It is reasonably certain that this is the plan under which the first American army will be selected and trained for the battle field.

Mr. FIELDS. Now, aside from the principles of humanity to which I have referred, let us take the testimony from some of the authorities that we have in this and other countries on this subject.

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman yield before he enters upon that?

Mr. FIELDS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] to the gentleman now on the floor, is a conundrum to me. If these boys who are to be conscripted are not to fight the battles, what are they for? What is the purpose of it?

Mr. FIELDS. I can not understand the reasoning of the gentleman from New York. I do not know what he means.

Mr. LUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. No; I can not yield further.

Mr. LUNN. I yielded to you very generously yesterday.

Mr. FIELDS. You did not yield the whole of your time to me, neither did I ask it.

Mr. LUNN. I do not ask you for your whole time.

Mr. FIELDS. Now, Mr. Chairman, aside from the principles of humanity involved in the proposition to place the burdens of fighting this war upon the immature youths of the country, there is another principle of vital concern to society. The youths of this generation will be the men of the next generation, and they have a right to develop mentally and physically under normal conditions to fit them for their future responsibilities. If we force upon them in their tender state the burdens of this war we unfit those of them who may survive the conflict for their future responsibilities and do an injustice to their posterity. We can not afford to do it. We must live after the war as well as during the war, so let us protect and develop the children of to-day, who must meet the responsibilities of the future.

I have said that boys of 19 and 20 are unfit for military service, and I am going to prove it by eminent authority—both by experts on juvenile psychology and warriors who have seen real service, including the greatest of all warriors, Napoleon.

Dr. Sargent, of Harvard University, in testifying before the Senate committee, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, said:

In the medical department of the report of the Secretary of War for 1898 we find the following paragraph in relation to the health of the troops in the Spanish War:

"In my opinion the reduction of the age limit from 21 to 18 years and the haste with which the volunteer regiments were organized and mustered into service were responsible for much of the sickness which was reported in the early days of their camp life. All military experience shows that young men under 21 years break down readily under the strain of war service; and every regiment had many of these youths in its ranks. Medical examiners were appointed to testify to the physical qualifications of each man before acceptance, but, notwithstanding this, which at the time was characterized in the press as a very rigorous procedure, so many men were afterwards found on the sick lists of the camps unfit for service from causes existing prior to enlistment that special arrangements had to be made for their discharge."

Sir William Aitken, Knt., M. D., F. R. S., professor of pathology in the Army Medical School of England, in his book on the Growth of the Recruit and the Young Soldier, sets forth the result of much study and experience on this question. He cites many military authorities to show that soldiers of less than 20 years of age have proved rather an incumbrance than an assistance to an army. For example, M. Coche:

"Recruits at 18 years of age are commonly unfit for the duties of an army. If they do not possess unusual strength they pass two, three, or more years in the hospital, if they are not discharged from the service altogether before that time."

Again, he quotes Dr. Parks:

"There is no doubt that to send young lads of 18 to 20 into the field is not only a lamentable waste of material but is positive cruelty at that age. Such soldiers, as Napoleon said, merely strew the roadsides and fill the hospitals. The most effective armies have been those in which the soldiers have been 22 years of age."

To quote Sir William Aitken himself:

"It will be my duty to show you that the younger the recruit under 22 years of age the less perfect is the growth of his skeleton, and of such important organs as the heart, the lungs, the liver, and the kidneys, the less is his body weight, and bulk, and the less able is he for military work. It is hardly reasonable to expect the same work and exertion out of a lad 18 to 20 as out of a full-grown man of 25 to 30 years of age."

It is interesting to note the following in Sir William Aitken's book:

"In the annual report of the Surgeon General of the United States Army for 1885 it is shown that a greater proportion of invalids was furnished by troops under 31 years of age, while up to the age of 25 the rate proved so much above the mean for the whole Army that the Surgeon General states, 'It may fairly be questioned whether the services rendered by these young men are equal to the cost of their maintenance.'"

I shall not quote the further authorities that I have on this subject which are numerous, but shall put them, or a part of them, in the RECORD.

Now, in conclusion, let me repeat: We must live after the war. In our hysteria that something must be done to-day let us not take the youths of the country who are not physically and mentally developed and subject them to the ravages of this war, which would necessarily affect them and their posterity, thereby affecting the race. The deciding battle in this war will not be fought to-morrow. We must get an army at the quickest moment possible, but when we get that army let it be an army of men and not an army of children. Let it be an army that can discharge its duties as our volunteer fathers discharged their duties in the wars of the past. Let us not repeat the mistakes of the Civil War by conscripting youths into the military service, which made the death rate in that war appalling to the people of this Nation.

This question may come back to the House later on, because in the other body they are standing for the minimum age of 19; and I, for that reason, submit these observations at this time for the consideration of the membership of this body. As I have previously said, my main and absolutely uncompromising difference with the administration is upon this point. I stand by not only my judgment but also my conviction on this question, a conviction that I am unwilling to yield, a conviction that I would not yield, regardless of what effect my refusal to do so might have upon my political fortunes; but that does not concern me when a principle of such magnitude as this one is involved. It requires a spirit of self-sacrifice to take any stand that is not indorsed by the President and the Secretary of War at this time, but I am willing and ready to make any sacrifice that may be required of me for the course I have taken in this matter. Let me add, in conclusion, that if the time ever comes when men in this body, through fear that they may incur the displeasure of the executive authorities or subject themselves to criticism, shall fail to stand by their honest convictions on questions which they believe affect not only the basic principles of our civic institutions but the fundamental principles of humanity as well, then and there the pillars upon which rests the principles of representative government will begin to crumble. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am unwilling to yield on this point, regardless of what it may bring to me in the future, and I trust and pray that the membership of this House will stand for the protection of the children of America against the burdens and ravages of this war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves two minutes of his time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman—Mr. FIELDS, of Kentucky—who has just taken his seat has referred to the personal assault of certain newspapers upon the chairman of this committee and the members of the committee who have signed the majority report. I wish to preface my remarks here this morning by expressing my emphatic dissent from these unjustifiable reflections upon the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the gentlemen who have united with him in signing the majority report. My association with these gentlemen has been so pleasant and so instructive that it gives me pleasure to bear testimony to the diligence, the patience, and the honesty of purpose with which they have discharged their duties in reference to the measure now before this body. Surrounded here by their colleagues, I hardly think it necessary even to pause to pay a passing tribute to the conspicuous ability and the exalted patriotism of the Hon. S. HUBERT DENT, of Alabama, and the other gentlemen to whom I have referred. [Applause.]

It was with the utmost diffidence I ventured to differ with him and the majority of my colleagues on the Military Committee in regard to the important matter now before this body; but overshadowing the committee stands the form and figure of the great President of the American people. He has had the advice of the expert military men of this country. He has followed the bloody drama that has been enacted in Europe and can retrace the progress of our allies through the blunders which they committed. He has now at his elbow the wisest statesmen of the world, the ablest military commanders of this age or any other age, and I take it that we ought to weigh well our own conclusions when we attempt to depart from the advice which he gives to us. Furthermore, he is, under the Constitution, the Commander in Chief of the armies and the navies of the country, as well as the adviser of Congress. Upon him rests the responsibility to wage this war to a successful conclusion. I take it that I can render no greater service to the best interests of my constituents and the interests of my country than by standing firmly and steadfastly behind his leadership. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we all recognize the emergency which confronts us. We are at war with the greatest military power on earth—savage and cruel in its methods—upon whose solemn obligations no reliance can be placed. We must raise an army adequate to our defense. It takes time to raise an army, to equip and train it for action. A raw recruit is not considered fit until he has had 12 months' intensive training. Our trained men are barely sufficient to enforce the law within our own territories against domestic disorder. It is in violation of no state secret to say that many months must elapse before we can be adequately prepared for defense, much less for offensive war. Our contributions to this war for a long time to come must be food, munitions, and credit to our allies. We can not wait to prepare until the Germans thunder at our gates. We would then be too late, and we would deservedly go sounding down the ages as a nation of fatuous fools. All are agreed upon the immediate and pressing exigency of having an army of sufficient proportions to meet all possibilities.

But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to confine my remarks to what is actually before this body. The committee has reported a bill and the minority have filed a dissenting report, bearing exclusively upon one feature of the bill. The only matter before the House at present is the bill of the committee, the majority report and the minority report, and the only point of dissent in the minority report is the method of raising the army whether by the system known as volunteering or by the system known as the selective draft. There is nothing before this body which involves the age of those to be selected. The bill reported by the committee fixes the age limits for the selective draft between the ages of 21 and 40, and the minority report does not dissent therefrom. The age limit therefore is not the question before this body. I stand on the bill as reported in this respect. Therefore, it seems to me that all the matters which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] has debated here are absolutely irrelevant to any question that is now before this body.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. I suppose the gentleman refers to the age limit?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. He does not mean to say what he really stated, that all the matters I debated were irrelevant?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. No. I meant the greater portion of the gentleman's speech.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. The gentleman understands that I stated that the other body was passing the bill, with the minimum age of 19, and I discussed that feature at this time in order to call the attention of the House to that fact, because it will be before us later.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I stand with the committee on that proposition, that we must raise the age limit, and I do not care to be diverted from the few remarks that I will ask this body to hear from me in order to discuss a proposition that is not before the House at the present time. [Applause.] Nor is it a question, Mr. Chairman, of raising an army immediately. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] said yesterday that if you would issue a call for volunteers in 48 hours we would have an army, while under the selective draft it would take from three to five months to get the machinery in operation. What would we do with an army in 48 hours? The Secretary of War has said it would be a disorganized mob here, without the possibility of caring for it, and that the three to five months' delay required for providing the machinery of the selective draft was necessary in order to be able to take care of the recruits when they came.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does the gentleman object to the volunteer system because he is afraid we are going to get an army to fight this war?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I am coming to the volunteer system shortly. I will show you that you have not got a volunteer system in your proposal. I state here that you are saying you can get an army in 48 hours under the volunteer system, when the Secretary of War has said that he could not handle an army of 500,000 men in any less time than it is necessary to take to put into effect this draft system.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will my colleague permit a question there?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. My colleague from Virginia is a very accomplished Shakesperean scholar, as I have occasion to know.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I had to yield to his superior knowledge on a former occasion.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does my colleague remember that Sir John Falstaff describes exactly the kind of an army that would be raised under this system?—

> But look you, pray, all you that kiss my lady Peace at home, that our armies join not in a hot day; for, by the Lord, I take but two shirts out with me.

[Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I think the illustration of the gentleman from Vermont is very apt.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. Is Sir John Falstaff one of the high military expert authorities to whom the gentleman refers?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I have not referred to him. I stand on the report of the Secretary of War. You are standing on Sir John Falstaff.

Mr. HARDY. No; I am not. It is the gentleman from Vermont who cites him.

Mr. GORDON. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question right there?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GORDON. Is it your understanding that it is not the purpose of the majority to train these volunteers at all?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. No; I understand they will be trained.

Mr. GORDON. Why do you describe them as a mob, then?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. In due and proper time, under the selective draft system, we expect to call the recruits to come and we will then be able to train them.

Mr. GORDON. You are afraid they will come too quick.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes; that is exactly what we are. We do not want them here until we are ready for them.

Mr. GORDON. You do not need to have them until you are ready for them.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. What do you suppose we are going to do with a mob without arms, without equipment, without any housing for them, the men without training and without officers to train them?

Mr. GORDON. We are not going to bring them here. We are going to leave them at home until we are ready for them.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. That is where they will be pretty apt to stay. [Applause.] Now, I will ask not to be interrupted unless some information is really desired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to be interrupted.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Now, as I have said, the question of these details is not before this body at present. Neither the question of the age limit, nor the question of bringing an army here immediately, nor the machinery of operating the selective draft is before this body; but the sole and only question is whether we shall have this army raised by the volunteer system or by a selective draft. Mr. Chairman, let us understand terms. Is that a volunteer system where the men are driven into the ranks by the scorn and contempt of their neighbors? Yet the testimony of the British officer before our committee was to the effect——

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes; if it is for information.

Mr. WISE. A question for information. The gentleman speaks of men being driven into the Army by the scorn of their neighbors. Do you suppose that some of these men over 25 years of age are afraid they will be forced to go?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I have just this moment said that the question of the age limit was not a matter that was before this body at this time. I have stated that I indorsed the plan of the committee in making the age limit between 21 and 40 and that I did not consider that the age limit proposed by the Secretary of War between 19 and 25 was at all essential or a vital feature of the draft system. I think that everyone of military age, not under 21, should be the subject of the selective draft. Now, I hope I may be permitted to continue my discussion of the subject which is actually before this House for its present consideration. It has been claimed here that the volunteer system has been tried out in England and its dependencies and that it has proved a success. I was about to quote the testimony of the British officer of the methods that were resorted to to obtain the so-called volunteers. He testified that the most extraordinary methods were brought to bear upon the men liable to military service in order to force them into the army. Everything that intense public scorn could suggest was resorted to. I need not enter into details. They are perfectly well known to those who have cared to investigate the matter. Such men were no more volunteers in the true sense than the man who is dragged there by the strong arm of the law.

Now, I ask for the correction of another term which is frequently used here. In the late Civil War both North and South, after every man had been enlisted who could be induced to do so voluntarily, by conscription acts sought to bring in the refuse. Of course, conscription at the end, after all had volunteered who would do so, instead of conscription at the beginning, which would have been fair to all alike, brought a stigma upon every man who was thus finally conscripted in the Army; but I deny that the system recommended here by the Secretary of War has anything in common with conscription of that character.

Under the selective-draft system every man liable to military service is called upon to come forward and register. He then waits and bides his time until his country calls for him in the manner and according to the procedure prescribed. When he comes forward in response to this call and puts his name upon the registration list, he is as much a volunteer as the man who goes to the recruiting office and has his name put upon the recruiting books. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is it not a fact that the bill provides that a man may be imprisoned for six months or a year upon a day's notice by the Federal court if he does not go?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. That is your bill, too, exactly.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is that man a volunteer when he has the penitentiary behind him?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Your provision for volunteers has a conscription act in fact behind it, coupled with its provisions for imprisonment by a Federal court. I propose to come to that later. I will not be diverted at this time from the line of my argument. I say that the man who goes under this selective draft and registers his name to wait his turn for the call of his country is far more a volunteer than the man who goes under the lash of public scorn and ostracism and is recruited. [Applause.] It is not the hullaballoo boy who is always the fighter. The man who quietly and in the fear of God discharges his whole duty in response to the laws of his country is just as apt to be the reliable soldier as the man whose valor is always on dress parade. Now, let us look a little at the basic principles of these systems. Why should one man volunteer and another man stay at home? Why should one man go to the front and another man get his job at home? Why should one man make every sacrifice, even unto the sacrificing of his life at the front, while another man stays at home and gets the benefit of army contracts? Where is the first semblance of equal rights and corresponding duties in such a system as this? The selective draft is based upon the right as well as the duty of every man to serve his State in time of war. It applies to the rich and the poor alike, to the high and low alike. No distinction is based here upon the willing or the unwilling, upon the aristocracy of birth or of wealth. All must respond to do his share in carrying a common burden. The volunteer system feeds upon the patriotism and the zealousness of the real useful citizen and fosters the selfishness and greed of the slacker. On the other hand, the selective draft has its foundation in the Jeffersonian principles of equal rights for all and special privileges for none.

As an illustration, I desire to read here the letter from a valued friend, Hon. George W. Settle, of Flint Hill, Va., which I ask to have read as a part of my remarks:

FLINT HILL, VA., April 22, 1917.

Judge T. W. HARRISON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE HARRISON: I want to convey to you my approval and appreciation of the high stand you are taking on the "selective draft" measure now pending before your Military Committee.

I can but feel that if the sensible citizens of this Nation understood just what this measure means that there would be universal demand for its passage.

With the urgent call for producers and the lack of true patriotism on the part of those who are not producers, it seems to me the only way we can hope to meet the crying needs of the day.

I have three boys, all of whom are producers and badly needed on my farm, yet, when the President called, with my hearty consent they made application for enlistment in the Second Regiment of Virginia and are now awaiting for orders; at the same time they were the only volunteers from this district, which evidences just what the result would be, comparatively speaking, under the volunteer system. The very ones who amount to something in the way of producing would volunteer and the ones who could very well be spared would not volunteer, which would prove a calamity at this trying period of our national history.

Your constituents, if not now, will after they understand applaud you for your gallant and splendid fight for this the only fair and just way by which to raise an army such as we must have to prove ourselves worthy the past record of Americans.

With my best wishes and kind regards, I am,

Very truly, yours, GEO. W. SETTLE.

I say that the volunteer system is undemocratic, and I say that the system of the selective draft is the only democratic method. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it is pleasant for me to reflect that I represent the old county of Albemarle, in which Thomas Jefferson lived and spent the declining years of his life. [Applause.]

In the latter part of his life he lived at Monticello, where he expounded for the benefit of all generations the grand principles of democracy. Here he supervised the foundation of the great University of Virginia, of which he was the father. I hold in my hand a telegram from Hon. Edwin A. Alderman, president of the University of Virginia, and the faculty, indorsing the selective-draft plan. I hold in my hand a petition signed by every member of the faculty of the university and all its administrative officers, indorsing the selective-draft plan. I have received resolutions adopted by a large mass meeting held at Charlottesville under the very shadows of Monticello, indorsing the selective-draft plan. I have received resolutions from the chamber of commerce of the same city, indorsing the selective-draft plan. [Applause.] And now, representing the old county where he claimed his citizenship, I ask permission to read what Thomas Jefferson himself has said.

In a letter to James Monroe, he wrote the following:

But it proves more forcibly the necessity of obliging every citizen to be a soldier; this was the case with the Greeks and Romans and must be that of every free State. Where there is no oppression there will be no pauper hirelings. We must train and classify the whole of our male citizens, and make military instruction part of collegiate education. We can never be safe till this is done.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Does the gentleman contend that Jefferson favored conscription in that passage? It was universal military training.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I will read you something a little more pertinent.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I would like to hear it.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Here it is. In a letter to J. W. Eppes, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

I think the truth must now be obvious, that our people are too happy at home to enter into regular service and that we can not be defended but by making every citizen a soldier, as the Greeks and Romans, who had no standing army; and that in doing this, all must be marshaled, classed by their ages, and every service ascribed to its competent class.

[Applause.]

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.
Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Is that all?
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. That is all, and I thought that was enough. [Applause.]
Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Is it not possible that the entire manhood of the Nation might be drilled and disciplined from a military viewpoint, and at the beginning of any war volunteers be called for?
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. What would be the sense of drilling them if you did not want them to fight? [Laughter.]
Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman permit me to answer what the sense is?
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.
Mr. CHANDLER of New York. In this emergency with which we are confronted now, whether we applied the volunteer method or conscriptive method, we want disciplined men in the first place.
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I have tried to explain my conception of the difference.
Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.
Mr. OSBORNE. Is it not a fact that by reason of the neglect of this advice of Thomas Jefferson in 1813, in the following year of 1814 this city of Washington was captured by the British and this Capitol was burned? [Applause.]
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. The point is well taken. From the earliest colonial days until some years after the Civil War, in Virginia, our statutes required and insisted upon the enrollment of every man of military age into companies, battalions, and regiments, and the duty was imposed, under the penalty of a fine, on every man to report at stated and frequent intervals for drill and instruction. These statutes, some time after the Civil War, were superseded by statutes organizing volunteer companies, and these in turn became, under later statutes, a part of the National Guard. So that the principle announced by President Wilson of universal liability for military service is no new doctrine in Virginia. I have been discussing these two systems from the viewpoint of the individual. Let us consider them now, briefly, from the standpoint of the Government exclusively.
In modern warfare it is just as essential to mobilize the industrial resources of a country as it is to mobilize its armed forces. This is well illustrated by the situation of Germany in the present war. The strangle hold of England on Germany is starvation, and the attempt of Germany by its U-boat warfare has the same intent against England. An army must be fed, as well as the people of a country. The necessary equipment for the army must be provided. The demoralization, therefore, of the industrial conditions of a country would lead as certainly to defeat as the failure to raise an army. The volunteer system ignores all these conditions. Fiery appeals are made to the patriotic to join the Army without regard to the demoralization produced in the agricultural interests or in the manufacturing interests or in the mining interests. The high cost of living bears testimony to the great strain under which the agricultural interests are now laboring. Ought this great industry at this time, so essential to success in war, be subjected to a further strain by the appeals of the Government to patriotic citizens to leave the fields and join the ranks of the Army?
The selective-draft method presents these advantages: First, it raises the Army without question and without doubt. It raises it according to a definite program. The military commander knows exactly what he may count upon. Under the volunteer system the recruiting increases or decreases according to the wave of enthusiasm which may at the time be pervading the country. Second, it raises the Army on a fair and just principle, that every man is liable to service in one capacity or another; and, finally, it raises the Army without disturbing the business interests of the country.
Under the selective draft a man is taken to serve in the ranks who can serve there without disturbing the industrial interests of the country. The man who is needed on the farm to provide the food of the Nation is kept there and not permitted to join the Army.
I know that the majority report of the committee recognizes some sort of an exemption in regard to their volunteer provision as is provided for here in the selective draft.
Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.
Mr. GORDON. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that provision is identical with the provision in the drafting system.
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I am going to call your attention to the fact that it is not worth a button. You call for volunteers and then tell them you will not take them. You are playing at cross purposes.
Mr. CLAYPOOL. The gentleman says they will not take them?
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes; you call for volunteers, and when one offers you say, "Oh, no; you are not the one we want."
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is not that what you propose to do by your enrollment plan, and when he comes you say you do not want him?
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Our plan is an exemption plan. If a man is called, he has to be exempted, and we exempt him, but you in your bill you first appeal red hot for people everywhere, and then you say, "Oh, we do not want you."
Mr. CLAYPOOL. How are you going to exempt them?
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. The machinery is going to exempt them, a civil tribunal provided for in this bill. It is intended to be a local court, and Secretary Baker suggested the local probate court.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. How many local tribunals made up of politicians are going to pass on the life and liberty of American citizens?
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Your bill calls for the very same thing. [Applause.]
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We also have a plan by which we may not have to resort to it.
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. And how many political colonels and other officers are you going to have under your plan? [Laughter.]
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We do not provide for them in the bill; they are appointed, every one of them.
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. The bill provides for volunteering in regiments or other military units, with their own officers.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The President of the United States has authority to appoint them under the volunteer plan when they are called.
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, yesterday on the floor, I understood some gentleman, I think from Kentucky, to say that he had three or four captains or colonels down in his country ready to enlist and recruit.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; but the gentleman will admit that if the President of the United States sees fit to appoint them, they should be appointed.
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. The law provides the open door of opportunity for every one who is desirous of obtaining a commission and who is worthy to have one, and that is through the Officers Reserve Training Corps. [Applause.] Let the officer come in the regular prescribed method which trains him and prepares him for his duties so that he may not be a menace to himself and to those whom he has in his charge.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is by the law which we are going to call these volunteers in. That is what the gentleman is referring to and there can be no other way.
Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we have heard most of these gentlemen who insist upon interrupting the gentleman from Virginia, and we would like to hear the views of the gentleman from Virginia. [Applause.] I suggest that he maintain his right to speak.
The CHAIRMAN. This is a matter entirely within the control of the gentleman from Virginia. If the gentleman desires the Chair not to permit interruptions, the Chair will not permit them; but as long as the gentleman yields, he has control of his own rights.
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Of course, I am always glad to yield if I have the time. Mr. Chairman, I have tried to impress here the importance of the basic difference between the volunteer system which has proved a failure in its true sense in every war and the selective draft——
Mr. CLAYPOOL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. HARRISON of Virgina. No; my time is speeding.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.
Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I wish to get something in a collective way before this body, and I can not do it if I have to reply to questions, the answers to which the gentlemen can find out in some better way than through me. I have been endeavoring to point out to this body the basic differences between the volunteer system and the selective draft. I have not as yet pointed out any of the features which the bill of the committee proposes. In my judgment the proposition of the majority of the committee contains all the evils of the volunteer system without any of its redeeming features and then provides a conscript provision in its most odious form. If you are calling for volunteers and want your volunteer patriot, why do you hold over his head the threat of conscription and say, "If you do not come, you patriot, we will drag you"? [Laughter.] This is not the volunteer system of traditional historic romance. You then provide a form of conscription before you give a fair opportunity to the recruit to volunteer. You stigmatize a man with conscription without any just excuse for so doing. Before any real conscription law is put into force, which is intended to be aimed at slackers only, every one should be given a just and fair opportunity to enlist. [Applause.] In other words, the proposed bill of the majority of the committee provides for a volunteer system to which is attached an odious conscript provision, and then throws upon the President the responsibility of putting the odius conscription into force.

No one can be enrolled under this provision for the selective draft without being stigmatized as a slacker, and no one can volunteer under the volunteer provision free from the threat of conscription. Congress then evades its responsibility by placing upon the President the odium of putting the conscript provision into effect. This is not what the President asked for. Under the plan submitted by the Secretary of War, the Regular Army and the National Guard are to be recruited to their full war strength by volunteering. This makes a provision for volunteers to the number of about 700,000 men. This provision for receiving volunteers is amply sufficient to take care of all those adventurous spirits who wish to join the Army and who might not be called under the selective draft. In the opinion of the President, this is as far as volunteering can be safely permitted. The selective draft then goes into operation without any of the stigma being attached to any of those brought in under it as a slacker.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I would like to have three minutes in which to close.

Mr. KAHN. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I represent upon the floor of this House a people who have fulfilled every obligation in time of war and in time of peace. The people whom I have the honor to represent are no race of slackers. In every war of this country they have done their full duty. It was in Woodstock, Va., that Muhlenburg doffed his priestly robes to don the uniform of a soldier in the time of our Revolutionary War. Morgan led his brave Virginians through many of the storm centers of that war. I have the honor to represent here the survivors of that gallant band who gave to Jackson his sobriquet of "Stonewall" in the first battle of Manassas. I represent here survivors of that gallant band that climbed the bloody slope of Cemetery Hill at Gettysburg. I represent here the survivors of that band at Appomattox who, after the flag of the South had gone down in blood and tears, returned to ruined homes and devastated fields to face the problems of peace with the same fortitude and courage which they had displayed on a hundred battle fields. Anyone traveling now through the beautiful valley of the Shenandoah, or along the slopes of the Blue Ridge in Piedmont Virginia, will see how faithful and true these men have been since the war in restoring by the labors of peace the land for which they fought and bled to all its pristine beauty. Nor has the present generation been slow in its response to the call of their country in defense of her honor and her liberty. Already companies have been organized in my district and are now in the field ready for any duty which may be given into their charge. So far as I have been able to hear from them, old soldiers and young soldiers prefer that system which the President proposes and which is intended to fairly and equitably distribute the burdens of war. They are not afraid to do their part.

Standing here and speaking for those gallant young soldiers, I believe in the trying times coming that they will ever prove true to the teachings of their fathers and the traditions of their State, and they will call upon the soldiers from all sections to follow them as they carry the Star-Spangled Banner deep into the ranks of their enemy. I believe that they and the people of my district trust in the leadership of the President.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON]. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, these companies of patriotic citizens who have already organized themselves down in the home district of Thomas Jefferson will not have a chance to get into this war unless the majority of your committee is sustained. [Applause.] I call your attention to the fact that these gentlemen who have been eulogizing in such glowing words, as has the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], these companies which have been organized of patriotic young men, can not get into the service under his draft system unless you adopt our amendment and give them a chance to enlist. [Applause.] If I am mistaken about that, I will ask any man to correct me.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. You are right.

Mr. GORDON. But he says, Why do you pass this up to the President? Why, the gentleman opened his speech here by saying what a patriotic duty it was for every citizen to stand by the President. We have been assailed in the newspapers in the United States as traitors to this Nation because we have exercised our own judgment in framing this legislation. We will meet you at Philippi on that proposition. We will not delay by the adoption of the majority proposition the enlistment and raising of an army one minute, and I challenge any man here to deny it. [Applause.] Not a minute. I understand my obligation to support the President. We are giving him all the men that he asks for, and we are trying to give to him a great deal better men than he asks for, if you want to know it. [Applause.] Why, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] says why do you hang up over people's heads the threat of conscription? Why does the General Staff bill hang up the threat of conscription over the Regular Army and the National Guard? It is there.

The great change in the law is as to these extra additional men to be recruited for this emergency, and we adopt the identical language of the War Department bill as to the Regular Army and National Guard. Oh, but he says, the volunteers are mobs, the volunteers are mobs. You heard something some time ago when this war commenced about "Kitchener's mob," but "Kitchener's mob" is winning this war to-day. [Applause.] There is not a conscript Englishman, Scotchman, or Irishman upon the Continent of Europe, not one. They have not the conscripts ready yet. They have got to drill them longer. [Applause.] Now, there has been a good deal of talk and not much light furnished upon the differences in our committee in reference to this legislation. Nobody has told you, and nobody will tell you, why you can not detail a man for private service in a munitions factory as well when he volunteers as if he is conscripted. No; they just try to befuddle you. [Applause.] Capt. Benson testified before our committee, as you have been informed, but you have not been advised of all he testified to. A captain of the English Army, an officer in the regular service, testified that 5,000,000 men volunteered in England. All the men on the Continent fighting to-day are volunteers. They stopped volunteering early in the war because they could not take care of them, they came so fast. The gentleman wants a democratic Army. Do you want to impose upon the boys of this country under 20 years old the burden and obligations of fighting this war?

Mr. FIELDS. Will my colleague yield right there? Did not he state that the troubles in reference to recruiting in the British Army were based upon the fact they did not throw any safeguards around enlistments but took men in the army who had been in the munitions factories perhaps——

Mr. GORDON. Of course, that is true; the men sent back to munitions factories are volunteers, too.

Mr. FIELDS. Now, in connection with that we have provided these safeguards in our bill for the American volunteer.

Mr. GORDON. Yes; exactly the same as if we conscripted them. Now the gentleman says military experts advise the Commander in Chief. Yes; the military experts rejected territorial recruitment and the committee put it back in the bill. Do you know what territorial recruitment is? It is the proposition that those living in the same community may enlist together and go to the war together. A man wants to enlist and his younger brother also, and he can go to the front with him in the same company and take care of him. That originated in the Revolutionary War in 1776. That is the distinctive feature of the volunteer as against the conscript and standing army. It has since been adopted by every single nation in Europe and is in force to-day—the territorial recruitment proposition. That was rejected by the military advisers of the President and the committee had to put it back in the bill. There is no minority report on that proposition, however. The General Staff experts recommended that every bureau chief's salary be increased during the progress of this war and that they receive the pay and allowances of a major general—$9,300 a year. We took that out also. [Laughter and applause.] Thomas Jefferson wrote a letter during the War of 1812, when this Nation was engaged in war with the greatest military and naval power on the face of the earth, in which he said that at some time in the future we ought to adopt the policy of military training for our youths.

You have not heard any utterance from Thomas Jefferson in favor of the minority proposition, however, and you will not.

Mr. Chairman, one of the changes in the bill submitted by the War Department was to strike out the provision authorizing the President to conscript by lot and selective draft into the military service of the United States 500,000 men, and later the same number, if he found it necessary, from those of our citizens between the ages of 19 and 25, and to substitute therefor a provision authorizing a call forthwith by the President for 500,000 volunteers, and later a call for the same number, if necessary, from those of our citizens of military age.

The President is also authorized to provide for the registration of all our citizens between the ages of 21 and 40, inclusive. Upon completion of the registration, if the men authorized and called have not been raised by voluntary enlistment, the President is then authorized to conscript them by lot and selective draft from those citizens so registered.

Every citizen of common sense is able to decide for himself which of the two foregoing plans more nearly complies with the principle of universal liability to service; no one who has read it claims that the War Department bill contained any provision for "universal training." The nearest approach to this title was the provision stricken out, authorizing the conscription from those between 19 and 25 of the men required, for the period of the war, not to train, but to fight, and we concluded that men between 21 and 40 would be better for that purpose; and if the volunteers could be obtained they would, with the same preparation, make much better soldiers.

On March 26, 1917, The Adjutant General instructed the chiefs of the bureaus in the War Department to furnish emergency supplemental estimates of the amounts required for the organization of a volunteer army of 500,000 men, in addition to the Regular Army and National Guard, which organizations were to be recruited to a little over 500,000 more, and Congress has been asked to appropriate for this number for the coming year, and no more.

Just when it was decided by the War Department to abandon this intention to call for 500,000 volunteers does not appear in the testimony before our committee, or elsewhere that I know of, but it was sometime since these estimates were called for, as the men outside of the existing organizations are referred to in the hearings before our committee from April 7 to 17 as "additional troops."

The American volunteer, properly trained and disciplined, is the most effective soldier the world has ever seen, because he is the most intelligent and courageous, and because he always has fought for what he believed to be the cause of liberty; he has fought and won every war in which this Nation has engaged; and it was only in the Civil War that conscription was resorted to by Congress, and it then proved a ghastly failure; only 62,000 men out of over 2,200,000 were raised in the North by draft, and most of these deserted or ran away at the first shot.

We are at war with the greatest military power on earth. We can not afford to send conscripts against the trained legions of the Kaiser. If we had tnree or four years in which to train them, you might make an effective force with unwilling men in it, but the time is too short and we ought to have all volunteers, because they can be trained and conditioned more quickly and they are the most effective and dependable soldiers in the world.

We are advised by the Department of War that the registration and training of officers will take three to five months; why should not the President at once call for volunteers and accept them when he is ready to equip and train them, while the process of registration and training of officers is in progress?

It has been said in this debate that the minority desire to avoid having an army made up of part volunteers and part conscripts, and therefore they propose to permit men to volunteer in the Regular Army and National Guard, until the President orders a draft into these branches of the service, but that no one shall be permitted to volunteer for service in the new force created for the present emergency.

Will not this create and emphasize the very distinction and comparison which it is sought to avoid? The majority report places all three branches of the service on an exact equality and authorizes the President to resort to the draft to fill up each of them on the same terms and conditions.

In their efforts to discredit the volunteer principle it has been necessary to ignore and repudiate the rules and regulations which have always obtained in the Army and Navy of the United States. Men are not detailed to-day in the Regular service to the Aviation Corps, because it is too hazardous; they are required to volunteer. In all our wars where men have been asked to perform a specially dangerous duty, volunteers have been called for from men already in the service. When Hobson sunk the Merrimac in the harbor of Santiago in the Spanish War he and the men who went with him volunteered for that service. [Applause.]

The President can not lawfully send beyond the confines of the United States the National Guard until the members volunteer or are drafted for that special service. Both the President and Congress recognized that fact last summer, when Congress, at the request of the War Department, authorized the President to draft the National Guard, then on the border, for service in Mexico, in anticipation of an attack upon our Regular forces which were then beyond the border in pursit of Villa. The authority conferred was not exercised by the President, because it did not become necessary, but both the President and Congress thereby recognized the legal status of the National Guard, which may only be lawfully called out by the President or Congress to suppress insurrection, repel invasion, or execute the laws of the United States.

The militia of the States, out of which is formed the Organized Militia, or National Guard, includes all citizens of military age.

When called by the President into the service of the United States during the War of 1812 some of the militia refused to cross the border for the conquest of Canada, and their right to so refuse was conceded. To what extent the United States Government can enlarge its powers over the militia, if at all, by "drafting" instead of "calling" them into the Federal service is doubtful.

So distinguished and able a constitutional lawyer as Daniel Webster contended on the floor of this House on December 9, 1814, that citizens of the States could not be drafted for an invasion of Canada or any other foreign country, and a conscription bill was defeated in the House at that time and for that reason, although we were then at war with England and had been for 2½ years.

The Judge Advocate General of the Army is reported to have ruled that Congress may draft into the military service the red-headed citizens only of the United States; this may possibly be true as a legal proposition, but no one would seriously consider doing such a thing.

Many have been misled into error as to the duty of Congress in this emergency by observing the operation of the military systems in Europe since the beginning of this war. For many years prior to the outbreak of the European war every country in Europe, except Great Britain, had compulsory military service; on their becoming of military age citizens and subjects of these countries automatically passed into military service for their terms provided by law, and on the expiration of these periods into the military reserve forces of their respective countries.

Upon the breaking out of the war, of course the young men then in active service were the ones first called to the front, and following these the men most recently in the service were called, reversing the order in which they had passed into the reserve. This was all done in accordance with previously existing law whereby these nations availed themselves of the services first of the citizens in active military service and called first those of the most recent and therefore the most effective military service and training.

But Congress can not properly apply this European system to the people of the United States in this crisis by drafting into the military service boys and young men between 19 and 25, and omitting those between 25 and 40. All in this country have had the same military training and experience between the ages of 19 and 40; there are no public reasons for discriminating against any class of our citizens of military age, or in favor of any, except that if the draft is to be applied it should not be exercised against minors who can not enter into a lawful contract except with the consent of their parents or guardians or by order of court.

I do not believe that any American citizen should be conscripted into the military service until he has first been afforded an opportunity to enlist. [Applause.] The English law, passed nearly two years after the war commenced, which puts men between 20 and 40 into the reserve, did not become operative against any Englishman until 30 days after the approval of the law and 30 days after young men to whom it applies arrive at military age. [Applause.]

Now, we have heard a good deal in this debate about slackers, and sulkers, and cowards, as well as in the newspapers. They are the men of which we want to make an army, we are told. If men would use just a little common sense they would know enough to know that cowards, and sulkers, and slackers do not make good soldiers. Take the experience of men in the Civil War, and they will tell you that most of those who were drafted deserted. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is it not also true that when the tribunal sits in judgment on these boys from 19 to 25, some of whom are registered as slackers and some of whom are brave boys, that the boy that volunteers will be found to have to take "his medicine" and is more likely to go than the slacker?

Mr. GORDON. That is true.

Mr. COX. I was interested in the gentleman's statement about the 62,000 men being conscripted in the Civil War. Will the gentleman tell where he got those figures?

Mr. GORDON. I obtained them from the best available authority. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] made a statement here on the floor of the House as to the number of them, and he gave it at 62,000. I obtained that from somebody, and I considered it entirely reliable.

Mr. LANGLEY. The report of the Commissioner of Pensions shows that.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It was shown before the hearings on this very bill.

Mr. COX. The reason I ask is this, that I addressed a letter the other day to the Adjutant General of the Army, and while I have not got his letter here I think he said it was seven hundred and sixty thousand and odd that were conscripted during the Civil War. That is my recollection.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, no.

I quote from the annual report of the Secretary of War for 1865:

> At the beginning of 1862, when recruiting was discontinued by the Secretary of War, there were 637,000 volunteers under arms, the surplus being turned away without record or pledge. The number of men raised in the North under act of March, 1863, was 1,369,343, but of these there were 1,076,558 volunteers under this enrollment act. The number of voluntary substitutes was 144,012, the number who escaped service by paying a fee was 86,724, and the number who were compelled personally to serve was 61,947. But 2.3 per cent of the total number of troops raised in the North from the beginning to the end of the war was raised by draft or conscription.

Mr. MEEKER. Where did he get his authority that most of them ran away at the first shot?

Mr. GORDON. Gen. SHERWOOD told me yesterday they sent him 72 conscripted men in the Atlanta campaign and that only 2 rendered any service at the front. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I would like to ask the gentleman what he thinks would have been the result of that war if the northern Army had been composed of that character of men?

Mr. GORDON. The North never would have won the war.

Mr. CRAGO. Would the majority of those conscripts ever have tried to be volunteers in any case?

Mr. GORDON. I do not know. Capt. Benson says that there is not a particle of difference in England to-day between the men who came in under compulsion and those that volunteer.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman thinks, then, that the English conscript is more constant in his service than the American?

Mr. GORDON. I will tell you what I think about that. The English conscription act is a very much more sensible proposition than the one proposed by the General Staff. [Laughter.] It gives every man an opportunity to volunteer, but 30 days after he becomes of age he becomes amenable to the law and passes into the reserve. So he is afforded an opportunity to volunteer. I think a provision like that would help some in this bill. Now, I want to know if this Congress of the United States can go out and look in the faces of these boys between 19 and 25 after it has voted to conscript them into the Army to the exclusion of everybody above 25 years of age? This Congress will cover itself all over with infamy as with a garment if it ever dares to enact such a law as that. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. GORDON. Now, a great deal of mystery has been thrown into this discussion by the gentlemen here, though I do not say intentionally. But they have ascribed to the volunteer system things that are not peculiar to that system at all. The Secretary of War, who has a letter embodied in the minority report of our committee, is an artist in the use of words, and I want you to just go and read the reasons that he gives there against permitting men to volunteer. He points out objections that are not peculiar to the volunteer system. Tell me why you can not assign a man to a munition factory who has volunteered just as well as one who is conscripted? There is not a thing in that argument at all. They have undertaken to discredit the volunteer soldier, and why men would seek to do that in the light of history is something that passes my comprehension. Why, they talk about the volunteers in the War of 1812, when this Capital was captured, but they never tell you that in the War of 1812 four States in New England refused to furnish a man or a dollar to prosecute that war. [Applause.] They do not tell you that the State of Massachusetts and the State of Connecticut refused to allow their troops to fight in that war. [Applause.] They ascribe it all to the volunteers. The trouble with that war was that the New England States did not volunteer. That was the trouble.

Mr. CRAGO. Under the plan proposed here these States could not refuse to furnish their proper number, could they?

Mr. GORDON. No. You could conscript them, but what good would they be after you conscripted them?

I want you to look at this thing as a common-sense proposition. We are in to win this war. The adoption of this draft at the outset looks like an indictment of every man that voted for this declaration of war. I voted for it and I did it conscientiously. I believe every word that was stated in that declaration of war, and I believe the American people will sustain the Congress and the President in the prosecution of this war.

If it is necessary I am ready to go back to my district and tell them why I voted for this resolution, and why the war ought to be vigorously prosecuted, but I do not want to clap the draft onto them the very first thing before I go home. [Laughter.] We want an efficient Army. I do not see how men can reason it out that you can take reluctant soldiers, when you may not have more than eight or nine months to train them, and assemble them into an effective army. I do not know how that could be done. We might be attacked. We have been told here by the General Staff and by military experts how many soldiers Germany could land here within a certain time. Of course, I never believed any such stuff as that. [Laughter.] But still if they believed everything they said, we ought to get ready for an invasion in case they settled the war over in Europe. We need these men. We are at war with the greatest military power on earth, but we are made to understand that we have nothing here to fight with but slackers. The German soldiers have taken compulsory military service with their mother's milk. They are accustomed to it. It does not work the harm and demoralization in those European countries that it would work here. But the American citizen is not accustomed to that sort of thing. He is used to fighting when he wants to fight. [Applause.] I think that as a matter of policy it is a very unwise thing to adopt this thing at the start, and I think it comes with very poor grace, if I may be allowed to say so, from the minority of the committee to criticize us for trying, as we did, to stand by the President, when we put in their own draft proposition as an alternative after having provided in the bill an opportunity for voluntary enlistment.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And in line with that, the gentleman will recall that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] criticized us for putting the draft system in there as a means of driving men to volunteer. Is it not a fact that the general law now holds open the same system for a part of the Regular Army?

Mr. GORDON. I believe that is the fact, so that there is nothing in that argument. Oh, so many things are said to be known in this debate that are not so that it is really amusing. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman believe it will be possible to recruit this Army without resorting to conscription?

Mr. GORDON. Yes; I do.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then, why put the conscription measure in your bill?

Mr. GORDON. Because you say we can not get the army without conscription, and the military experts say we can not; and we say we do not want to delay the President in the prosecution of the war a minute, and therefore, out of deference to the views of the War Department and the General Staff, we give you that machinery, and while building the machinery we give the American citizen a chance to volunteer. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it because the majority of the committee does not want to assume the responsibility, and you are putting that feature in your bill so as to have something to stand behind? [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. Oh, not at all. I will say to the gentleman that it was my preference to put up a straight volunteer proposition first.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That was the thing to do.

Mr. GORDON. But some of my colleagues in whom I have great confidence decided otherwise, and I decided to go with them. Now, you may criticize us for following the President too far. But it does not rest in your mouth to say that we ought to pass this bill in accordance with the War Department's recommendations while closing our eyes and ears and without having read it. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have touched upon most of the points I desired to make, and I thank the House for its courtesy. [Prolonged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman returns four minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it has been stated in the public press, and perhaps to a certain extent justly, that I have been on all sides of this question. In the Sixty-fourth Congress I was known as the big-army Democrat. I offered an amendment providing for universal training for American youth to the military appropriation bill that year, and in this Congress I introduced the Chamberlain bill in the House—H. R. 19.

In committee I have insisted that provision should be made in this bill to take in all the men of military age above 26 who have had military training in this or some other country who can be spared from their civil pursuits, and who would be glad to volunteer for this emergency if they could do so without joining the Regulars or the National Guard.

If I have committed a breech of my duty in thinking out loud, then, of course, I must suffer the consequences. But I hope that I never reach the point where I become stubborn. As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs I have felt that it was my duty to thrash out any line of argument which my point of view yesterday, to-day, or to-morrow might suggest to my mind. If you will read the hearings you will find that I have earnestly and conscientiously endeavored to do that duty.

That work has been done I hope satisfactorily. We are now before this House with a bill, asking the Members of this House to make up their minds how much of that bill they will pass. We should not resort to any flights of oratory. We should not appeal to sympathy. We should not be too closely bound to tradition. We are living in the present, and this question must be discussed in the cold light of existing facts. We must be governed not by any criticism in the press, not by propaganda pro-English nor pro-German, not by the demands of those who pose as leaders of patriotic movements, but who fear that public sentiment may demand that they enlist, but by calm, sober judgment.

The statement has been made here that we need a willing army to begin the war, and that the only way to get a willing army is to call for willing men, but the answer comes back that when you draft American men you are going to have an army willing to fight anywhere to defend this Nation. [Applause.]

One of the most serious objections that I found to this proposition when it came before the committee was this: There are over 100,000 men in the United States of military age, who to a large extent would not go into the Regular Establishment nor the National Guard, and who would be glad to join the new army, but who would not be given an opportunity under the draft provision for the increased forces, because they were over the age to be called. It seemed to me that here, when we were about to organize an army we ought to place in the hands of the President the power to receive the services of all of these willing men who had been trained in Italy, Switzerland, Australia, or this or in any other country, where they have a military establishment, and who have made their home under the protection of the Stars and Stripes. I have felt that those men should have the opportunity to go in and fight for the country that they have made their home, and love for the liberty and happiness it insures. [Applause.] I felt that so long as it was possible to open that door, it was my duty as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs to demand that the door be opened, because I recognized that these men who had seen that kind of service might refuse to go into the Regular Army or the National Guard, and I wanted them to be among the first trained, for we will need trained men as noncoms in this war. I insisted upon it with all the power that is in me, and I insisted on it in the face of criticism from nearly every daily paper in the United States, aided and abetted by those who do not understand the issue here, those who have a selfish purpose, and those that seek to injure me. I would insist on it now, if it were not for the fact that I feel that I can trust the wisdom of the President and realize that a greater injury may be done the country through disagreement, dissension, or delay, and I thank those friends that have given me their counsel.

I hope that I now demonstrate that I have not confused stubbornness with firmness, and I pray that I never shall be so small as to adopt a policy that I alone can be right.

This is the day to get ready to fight the battles of that great war that we have declared against the despotisms of the world, and we can not delay. You ask, "If this is the condition"—and it is a fact admitted by the Secretary of War in his testimony before this committee—"why is it that the President refuses to open that door and receive the services of these men who can be spared from the industrial life of the country, men who are not married, men who have no dependents, men who perhaps have enough of this world's goods so that they can go away and come back again, or perhaps never come back again, without leaving anyone destitute? Why does the President of the United States refuse to accept the services of these men?"

I have tried to find the answer, and I believe I have found it, not in the record, not in anything that anyone has testified to before that committee, but in the facts that are known to us all.

In the national-defense act it is provided that the Regular Army may be raised to 287,000 men, and the Secretary has admitted that the War Department is going to raise it to that number. It is provided that in the event they do not get those men by voluntary enlistments they can draft them, and the Secretary intimates that they are going to do that. In that same act it provides that the National Guard may be raised to 641,000 men as a minimum, and the Secretary has admitted that he is going to call them. It is provided that when those men are carried away under the drafting provision of section 111 new battalions may be formed under section 79, and if those battalions are not created as fast as required, they, too, can be drafted from the unorganized militia, and the Secretary has admitted that they are going to get them. When you add them all together you find you have practically a million men. Follow me. Already in the law of this land, without the passing of a single statute, we have now the means of raising an army in time of war of a million men, and we are in war. The President wants an army, and how many does he want? Do not look at the words in the bill authorizing the number. Look to see what money he asks for. He has asked for three thousand million dollars, $3,000,000,000. The department has brought to this committee a detailed statement showing how it is going to be spent. They say it will provide for only 1,000,000 men; no more. Then why this provision for the other million men by conscription? The national-defense act in section 111 fixes the National Guard at 641,000 men in time of war as a minimum, not as a maximum. By the use of that statute they can pump into the American Army every able-bodied man in America between the ages of 18 and 45. Why does he want this power of conscription separate and apart? The answer is plain, when you once think of it. We have entered into a war to the like of which the history of the world has never shown a parallel.

When is it going to stop? Will 1,000,000 men do it, or 2,000,000, or 5,000,000, or 7,000,000? What Member of this House has heard any news from the battle line on the Russian frontier since war was declared by us? We have military observers in Russia, and their reports are coming by wireless through a censorship, and which of you has been able to find a single word as to what is going on there? Why does the President ask for this unreasonable thing? Why does he demand the power to draft a million men when he is not going to use them? Because undoubtedly there are indications that this war is not going to be disposed of in a little while; because, my friends, it probably appears to the President that there is a possibility that the manhood of America has got to take the place of the Russian soldier and carry our flag to Berlin and put down the Kaiser and his barbarism. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman mean to state that the President has any such information, or is the gentleman just guessing at it?

Mr. CALDWELL. Guessing.

Mr. DENISON. Just guessing?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes. If you can show any other reasonable ground on which the President of the United States, in this great crisis in America, would take issue with this representative body of the people and demand that this shall be written thus far and no farther, that he can not fight this war that we have agreed with him is just unless he has that kind of machinery, I shall be glad to hear any other reason. Gentlemen, I have followed the President in the past when I thought he was wrong, because I saw the possibility that he was right. To-day I see the possibility that this far-sighted, calm, peaceful man sees this thing, and for myself, I propose to vote with him on this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Just for a question.

Mr. SANFORD. I want to understand the gentleman. Do I understand that the gentleman from New York is supporting the majority report or the minority report?

Mr. CALDWELL. My report. It is as follows:

[House of Representatives, Rept. 17, pt. 3, 65th Cong., 1st sess.]

INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Minority views by Mr. CALDWELL, to accompany H. R. 3545:

I am in favor of the draft feature of this bill, and feel that it should be put in operation at the earliest possible moment. The words "draft" and "conscription" have come to have an odium given to them by the unfortunate use of the draft method only after a sufficient force could not be obtained to meet the requirements by volunteer enlistment. No such odium will attach if the draft is put into operation while the volunteers are coming in large numbers.

The bill makes it necessary to try out the volunteer system or declare it a failure before the draft can be put into operation. The volunteer provision is permissive only, but it leaves no other course open to raise the army we need now until volunteering has been tried and found unsatisfactory.

There is a large number of men of military age who have had military training in this or some other country who can be spared from their civil pursuits and who would be glad to volunteer for this emergency if they could do so without joining the Regulars or the National Guard. The bill will close the doors to these men if they are above the age of the selection (probably 26) and result in the loss of their services in the military arm, but this will not be as serious a loss as would come through delay, dissension, or division.

I have pressed this view upon the Secretary of War and upon the President, and my only answer has been that they thought that the situation could be best met by confining the volunteers to the Regulars and the National Guard.

There is much force in the argument that it is traditional with the English-speaking race to fight its wars with volunteers; that we should start our wars with a willing army, and that each individual was best able to judge for himself what particular line of endeavor he should best pursue in the defense of his country. But this is no ordinary war and should be approached with the hope that it will not last long, but with the intention of providing for the worst that could happen, namely, a long war, so therefore conscription at the outset is the logical answer.

Under the circumstances and because of the delay that must necessarily occur in the final passage of the bill carrying any kind of a provision recognizing volunteers, I am constrained to believe that the best interests of the country will be subserved by striking from the bill the provision of subdivision third of section 1, authorizing the President to call for volunteers, and the proviso accompanying same.

Respectfully submitted.

CHAS. POPE CALDWELL.

APRIL 21, 1917.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. I want to ask the gentleman a question or two about the National Guard. I understood the gentleman to say that the machinery is now in operation by which the minimum number of National Guardsmen who may be drawn into the service is a million men.

Mr. CALDWELL. No; 641,000.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman know how many men they have now in the National Guard under the volunteer system?

Mr. CALDWELL. I can give it to the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. I would like to get that information.

Mr. KAHN. I can inform the gentleman. About 10 days ago they had 120,000 men.

Mr. HOWARD. One other question. Under the bill proposed by the administration these avenues for volunteer enlistment—that is, in the Regular Army and the National Guard—will be left open, as I understand it, for volunteer enlistments.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. That will cover 650,000 men.

Mr. CALDWELL. When the Regular Establishment is carried up to the limit there will be 287,000 men. There are at present 137,000 men.

Mr. HOWARD. I hold a letter in my hand from the President, in which he uses this language:

Those who feel we are turning away altogether from the voluntary principle seem to forget that some 600,000 men will be needed to fill the ranks of the Regular Army and the National Guard, and that very great field of individual enthusiasm lies there wide open.

Mr. DENT. On page 216 of the hearings the Secretary of War gives the National Guard as 357,000 men. They now have 266,000. There is a deficit between what can volunteer and what we have now in the Regular Army of 623,000 men.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, yesterday a Member on this side of the House asked what wars, or what battles, members of the General Staff had fought in. I have taken the trouble to look up the record, and I find the following:

LIST OF OFFICERS OF THE GENERAL STAFF CORPS ON DUTY IN WASHINGTON, D. C., AND BATTLES OR ENGAGEMENTS IN WHICH THEY PARTICIPATED.

THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, April 24, 1917.

So that the military attainments of men in the Military Establishment of this country is as great as could be expected.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. COX. What is the maximum number of men that can be recruited for the National Guard under the act of last year?

Mr. CALDWELL. Six hundred and forty-one thousand men.

Mr. COX. I understood the gentleman to say a while ago that that was the minimum number.

Mr. CALDWELL. That is the minimum number.

Mr. COX. What is the maximum?

Mr. CALDWELL. As many males as there are in the United States between the ages of 18 and 45.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. The gentleman stated that he had often voted with the President in the past when he though he was wrong, believing that by possibility the President might be right.

Mr. CALDWELL. The probability that he might be right.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Is the gentleman going to support the minority report on the basis of the request of the President or upon his own conviction?

Mr. CALDWELL. My position is this: I can see that the army we now need could be raised without the existence of conscription, but because I see the large probability that an army that we may need or will need can not be so raised, I believe it is desirable at this time to establish conscription before the odium attaches to it. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand that the War Department has convinced the gentleman that the entire burden of this war, so far as new units are concerned, shall be placed on the shoulders of boys from 19 to 25 years of age, as insisted on by the War Department?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; it has not.

Mr. MONDELL. Then the gentleman is only following the President and the War Department a part of the way?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; if the gentleman wants to put it that way, but I will say for his information that the Secretary of War has yielded on that point.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, if the gentleman will be good enough to yield further. The gentleman referred in an answer to a question about the opportunity for enlistment in the Regular Army and the National Guard. The gentleman understands that the Regular Establishment does not invite the ordinary volunteer. Now, as to the National Guard, is it not true that a large proportion of the opportunities there are in new units, and if they should be received at this time 20 States stand ready to furnish new volunteer units to the National Guard which the War Department will not accept but has refused?

Mr. CALDWELL. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. On April 5, 1917, the Secretary of War sent out an order in which he directed the adjutant generals of the various States to cease organizing the new bodies of men in their States as a part of the National Guard. In our committee that order was taken up and discussed. After considerable discussion, and I might say pressure, at my request the Secretary of War asked the Judge Advocate General for an opinion as to whether or not he had the authority to issue that order. A few days after that the Judge Advocate General wrote an opinion in which he said that the Secretary of War did not have that authority, and I understand that since that time the Secretary of War has directed the adjutant generals throughout the United States, in those National Guard organizations, to increase their organizations up to 800 per Representative in Congress, House and Senate.

Mr. DENT. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that; he has directed them just the other way.

Mr. CALDWELL. I was so informed.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me say, for information, that I saw a letter in the hands of a Member of the House from the adjutant general of one of the States of this Union stating specifically that the War Department had not called on them for new units, and they were ready to furnish them.

Mr. CALDWELL. Let me say that I called the Secretary of War's attention to that fact and he told me that he had sent letters to every person who had theretofore made an inquiry about it, but he did not feel that it was necessary to send it to those States where no objection had been raised.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the statement made by the gentleman about the purpose of a large army—that is, the probability of a separate peace with Russia. Does the gentleman think that the President had any such condition in mind at the time he advocated the selective draft system?

Mr. CALDWELL. I have no knowledge on the subject whatever, but I do say this, that as a Member of this House I am not going to stand between him and the care of such situation if it does happen, and I fear that it may happen. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the House, I desire to preface my remarks with a reference to efforts which have been made to put forth a propaganda in this country to improperly influence the votes of Members of this body upon the pending legislation. As a sample of the methods which are being used to artificially stir up sentiment in the country, I desire to read to the House a telegram sent to me by a friend in my district:

The following telegram came in to-night: "New York, N. Y., April 16, 1917. The Secretary Chamber of Commerce (of a town in Kansas):

Representative ANTHONY, of your district, is reported opposed to universal military service and blocking President Wilson in his fight against Germany. We suggest you organize mass meetings in your district to show Representative ANTHONY that Americans who sent him to Congress demand that he support President Wilson and universal military training. Please arouse local interests and enlist strong newspaper support for this campaign. Please advise us at once, by wire, of your willingness to fight. American Defense Society, 303 Fifth Avenue, New York."

Then, as a comment on the telegram which I have just read, are these words:

No attention will be paid to this here. Congressmen may want to know, however, what methods are being used to work up sentiment by this defense society.

Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary for me to say that the statements that are made in this telegram reflecting on the loyalty of Members of this body that have been sent into my district and into yours are contemptible lies, and I want to brand the lying insinuation in reference to myself as a most miserable falsehood, and my district, I believe, knows it to be such. Such charges are beneath contempt, were it not that some people uninformed might be misled. [Applause.] But I believe it would be fitting and proper at some future time for this House to inquire into the motives of some of those New York gentlemen who belong to these bogus defense societies, and who are sending such telegrams abroad in the land to attempt to intimidate Members of Congress and prevent them from voting their honest sentiments. [Applause.]

I believe it would show that many of the members of some of these societies—at least the members of the society that paid $53 for sending nearly 100 telegrams to me from one town—would be found to be stockholders in munition plants or speculators in the bonds of the countries now at war. [Applause.] So much for that.

I desire to speak directly to the pending bill. In my judgment, if this country were really confronted by a situation which menaced us with an immediate invasion by some foreign power, I would say that the bill which has been sent from the War Department to the Military Committee of the House, and which is being supported by the minority of our committee to-day in this body, would represent little short of criminal negligence in not properly and at the earliest moment placing this country in a proper state of defense against a foreign foe. As I saw it, and as a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs see it, to wait six months—and in my opinion it will take six months before the machinery of conscription can be installed and placed in working order and the first conscripts sent into the training camps—to wait that long to organize the additional army of half a million men that the President asks for would be little short of criminal negligence in a critical situation. Therefore we are providing the machinery for immediately raising an additional army of 500,000 volunteers, which, gentlemen, can be placed in the training camps within 30 days, and at the end of the 3 months' time, which the Secretary of War himself admits will be the shortest time in which the machinery of conscription can be placed in operation, we will have this army of half a million men either in process of training or practically trained and ready for any emergency that may confront us.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Did not the Secretary of War also state that he would not be able to equip volunteers inside of six months, to give them the necessary training?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; the Secretary made that statement and I considered that he was not warranted in making it. The Secretary stated that he could not take care of the training and equipment of an army of half a million volunteers in three months' time for the reason that he did not have the equipment. I reminded the Secretary of War that he did have the guns and that he could start the training of an army of half a million men as soon as he could put the guns in their hands, and that this country could within 30 days furnish uniforms and equipment, and I believe I am absolutely correct in my position. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. ANTHONY. For a question.

Mr. BORLAND. In my recollection, we have 800,000 Springfield rifles?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true.

Mr. BORLAND. And about 300,000 Krags?

Mr. ANTHONY. Three hundred and fifty thousand Krags.

Mr. BORLAND. A little more than 1,100,000 rifles, and my recollection is that the Regular Army, if recruited up to its full force, would make nearly 300,000 men, and the National Guard 625,000 more, and would not that practically absorb not only all of your volunteers, but all of your guns?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will state to the gentleman, that while I do not say it with absolute certainty, yet I believe it to be a fact, that the War Department has placed a contract for 1,000,000 Enfield rifles, the rifles used by the English Government—chambered for American ammunition which will be delivered perhaps within 60 days.

Mr. BORLAND. Deliver 1,000,000 rifles in 60 days?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. That is certainly news to this House.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know it to be a fact, but I believe they will be.

Mr. BORLAND. That is certainly news to this House.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will state to the gentleman that the great plant at Eddystone, Del., owned by the Baldwin Locomotive Works, has completed its contracts for furnishing rifles to the English Government and the Russian Government and we were told over six weeks ago by the president of that company, Mr. Vauclain, that he stood ready immediately to commence turning out rifles for the American Army, and our committee has been informed by officials of the War Department that such a contract has already been placed.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not true our plants, arsenals, and such others as we might use—private plants which we may be able to contract with—in addition to the Eddystone Co., have speeded up in their output?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that is the case, and I will say to the gentleman in reference to private plants for the manufacture of small arms in this country that their capacity is practically unlimited at the present time. There is no question about equipment of small arms for any army no matter how large.

Mr. SLAYDEN. We have heretofore given contracts with the idea to some extent of keeping them alive and in order to have some competition.

Mr. ANTHONY. Quite true.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the gentleman recall that Mr. Vauclain told a number of the members of our committee that the full capacity, if it reached full capacity, for the manufacture of the Enfield rifle was only 6,000 a day?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not remember the exact figures, but the gentleman will agree with me in regard to the small-arms situation in this country that there is no trouble about the acquisition of small arms.

Mr. TILSON. It is the most serious trouble of all we are facing to-day, the trouble of small arms, and they are the most difficult arms to supply.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is an important item here. The gentleman across the aisle [Mr. BUTLER], a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, said that that plant was furnishing 7,500 a day.

Mr. BUTLER. Seven thousand five hundred, and furthermore it will furnish 15,000 rifles a day.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the bill reported by the majority of the Military Committee because, in my judgment, it will give to the country, if its authorizations are faithfully carried out, the most effective Army possible of creation, and that in the shortest time.

The bill gives to the President all that he has asked for in the way of authority to enroll the men of the Nation of proper military age and to draft or conscript them into the armies of the United States should he deem it advisable, predicated, however, upon the failure of sufficient response to the call for volunteers which is the first authorization given to the President in the bill, although under its provisions all the machinery of the proposed draft is immediately put to work and can be utilized if it becomes necessary to do so.

But the measure brought before the Military Committee of this House by the Secretary of War with the approval of the President and which has received the indorsement of only a minority of the committee, if enacted into law in its present shape, would lay this Congress open to the charge of not having done its full duty to the country if the emergency which confronts us and the military menace from a foreign foe is as great as some think it to be.

Mr. Chairman, I make the broad statement that if the President is compelled to rely solely upon the legislation which the minority has indorsed to furnish the men for the proposed additional army of half a million men that it will be six months before the first conscripts will begin to filter into the training camps if we are compelled to wait for the months to elapse and the time to be consumed in setting up the complicated machinery of the conscription and completing the enrollment and exemptions of the men of the Nation eligible for military duty.

The Secretary of War when he appeared before our committee stated in answer to my question that it would take not less than three months to do this work. My own opinion is that it will waste nearer six months of valuable time,

I believe that it will be inexcusable negligence to defer the organization of this new army of one-half million men which the President desires, in addition to the 287,000 men of the Regular Army at war strength, and the 440,000 men of the National Guard at war strength also authorized by this bill, until next summer or next fall, as would be the case if sole reliance was placed on the conscripts to be secured by this measure.

If the country wants immediate military preparedness, and I believe it does; if this Congress wants to put this new army of one-half million men at once into training, and I for one certainly want it created at the earliest possible moment, the one way to get it now, and the one American way, is to give this authorization to the President to make an immediate call for half a million volunteers as we have provided.

If you will do this, there is not the slightest doubt that every State will furnish its full quota, and even before the time the machinery of an obnoxious draft is in working order a splendid army of American volunteers in process of training, if not fully trained, will be ready awaiting the President's command. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. POU. I would like to ask the gentleman if the only difference between the advocates of the respective measures is as to the quickest and best way of raising an army that can win this war?

Mr. ANTHONY. Absolutely. I will say to the gentleman the majority of the committee is going further in putting the country in a state of preparedness than the minority or the bill the War Department provides.

Mr. POU. There is no division of opinion that an army sufficient to do the business ought to be raised?

Mr. ANTHONY. Absolutely not; only I believe the majority is going further toward that end than the minority.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, I challenge the correctness of that statement, and in my own time will show it is incorrect.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will be glad to hear the gentleman prove his statement to be correct, and if he can show that providing this country with half a million volunteers within 30 days and having them in training is not putting this country in a better state of preparedness than to wait six months for half a million conscripts I will acknowledge my mistake. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield further? The gentleman understands that the machinery for getting the conscripts goes into operation, according to the Secretary of War, in not over three months.

Mr. ANTHONY. Goes into operation at once, as is provided by our bill, but it will not be completed.

Mr. KAHN. To complete the registration will take about three months.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is what he says, but I believe it will take six months to have it all in good working order.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, the gentleman is entirely in error. The plans are already drawn by the War Department to put the machine into operation as soon as this bill is signed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will bet the gentleman a new hat there is not a conscript placed in the training camps inside of three months in this country.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BATHRICK. Does not the gentleman understand, or is it correct for me to understand, that we have power now to secure through volunteers over 600,000 men?

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say to the gentleman that this proposition of individuals "volunteering" for service in the Regular Army or National Guard, as the country understands the word "volunteer," is a delusion, a snare, and a fraud. There is no opportunity being offered by the War Department, as the minority say is being offered, for the organization of volunteers by the War Department. An individual has the right to enlist in the Regular Army now as he always had, but American boys do not regard that as serving their country in a volunteer Army by any means. [Applause.]

Mr. BATHRICK. Now, is it not a fact that the War Department has issued an order that those volunteering under the present law can volunteer for service during the war?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is true they will be permitted to enlist for the war.

Mr. BATHRICK. Not for the seven years or four years?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true.

Mr. BATHRICK. Then why are we not this moment placed upon the same plane as we will be after the bill is passed?

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say to the gentleman that a volunteer army, as an American volunteer army is constituted, is raised in units——

Mr. BATHRICK. I understand.

Mr. ANTHONY. In the States by regiments, in localities by company units, with the pride of the State behind the regiment and with the pride of the community behind the company. That is the secret of the success of an American volunteer army, and that is why the American boy will gladly enlist in such an army.

Mr. BATHRICK. Now, I concede that, and I want to ask the gentleman one question more for information. The men who are volunteering now, do they not volunteer in the National Guard?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; they enlist in the Regular Army or the National Guard. There is no question of volunteering about it.

Mr. BATHRICK. They got their services without conscription?

Mr. ANTHONY. The word "volunteer" in such a case is a misnomer and ought to be so understood by the House.

Mr. BATHRICK. It is a distinction without a difference.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to have the gentleman state to the House whether or not any plans have been formulated for taking this military census that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] refers to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Perhaps the department has formulated such a plan and perhaps it has not.

Mr. TOWNER. Are we to understand the War Department expects to take a census of the country for military purposes?

Mr. ANTHONY. Unquestionably that is the purpose. They will do so under regulations which our bill authorizes them to draw up.

Mr. TOWNER. If that is the case, what machinery has the War Department for doing it?

Mr. ANTHONY. Under this bill the War Department proposes to take advantage of the machinery which exists in the civil departments of the Government and by use of local officials and agencies to take such a census of the men of military age in this country.

Mr. TOWNER. And, in your judgment, it would take six months to do this?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not merely to complete the census or registration; but it probably would to perfect all the machinery of the draft and have it in successful operation.

Mr. AYRES. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. I want to inquire if under the present arrangement in each congressional district 800 men are not permitted to enlist or volunteer in the National Guard or Regular Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the maximum under the law now permitted for the National Guard.

Mr. AYRES. Is it not a fact that in the State of Kansas over 80 per cent have already registered and volunteered?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true, if the gentleman means that Kansas has furnished already that proportion of the number of recruits needed to bring the Regular Army to war strength, according to our population.

Mr. AYRES. While in Illinois only about 18 per cent, in the State of Missouri 12 per cent, and in the Eastern States 10 to 15 per cent?

Mr. ANTHONY. And as a further jewel in the crown of the Sunflower State, let me say to the gentleman that Kansas has already more than furnished her quota of men for the United States Navy to-day [applause], and that the State of Massachusetts, whose Representatives on this floor are unanimous and strongest for conscription, is away short of its quota for both the United States Army and the United States Navy.

Mr. AYRES. Then I would like to ask my colleague if it is not a good argument for conscription in order to get these Eastern States in the service?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that a conscript is not a real soldier; that any soldier whose legs are chained to the wheels of his cannon never can be depended upon to fight a battle.

Mr. LANGLEY. I would like to say to the gentleman that on that question of census taking the civil officers over the country are as a rule not experts in that line of work. The greatest difficulty the Census Office has always had is to get experts to do that work, and they have never been able to get the work done within the time mapped out to do it.

Mr. ANTHONY. In this case it will undoubtedly be made compulsory upon the individual to report his own eligibility as well, so it will not take as long as a regular census.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. In opening your address you made a statement as to certain telegrams from New York organizations, and made certain references, and I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Can he tell this House whether or not the Chamber of Commerce of the great city of New York is a "bogus" organization, whether the cotton exchange or the produce exchange, or if the stock exchange are bogus organizations?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say that such gambling institutions as the gentleman enumerates certainly come under the head of "bogus" outfits. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And how many of the members of those organizations are below 25 years of age?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And does the gentleman know that the State of New York, with its vast population, in proportion to its population, was second in number in sending troops down to the Mexican border?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. GORDON. And I call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that his own State constitution compels them to keep up their militia to not less than 12,000 men.

Mr. MEEKER. I would like to ask the gentleman if we do not give the wrong impression when we imply that when all the men of an eligible age are to be chosen by selection it means that they are not willing to go? I assume that every man in America is willing to go.

Mr. ANTHONY. I, too, do not question the willingness of the men of America to serve their country, and that is the reason we will have no trouble in getting all the volunteers this country will ever have need for.

Mr. MEEKER. That being true, is it not practical sense to let the Government supervise the selection of the men who go?

Mr. ANTHONY. We propose to do that in this bill by applying all the principles of the conscript exemptions to the volunteer, so that we can use the same discriminating judgment in the selection or rather the acceptance of our volunteers as we would with the conscript.

Mr. POU. Can not the Government apply a selection to the volunteers exactly as it may be applied to any other?

Mr. ANTHONY. Exactly. So that any man who is necessary, for instance, to munition-factory service will be left where he will do the country the most good.

Mr. SHERLEY. Am I correct in understanding you to say that men will volunteer if they will come in organizations from various States, but that they will not volunteer to fill up the Regular Army and the National Guard?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not so readily, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. How does the gentleman expect to fill up those organizations, which are the ones that most quickly can be supplied and put in shape for fighting?

Mr. ANTHONY. We propose to fill them up by the draft, if necessary, as proposed in this bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. In other words, the gentleman is to try out his volunteer system, and if he does not get sufficient men for volunteer organizations to be created, he then proposes to draft in order to fill organizations already created?

Mr. ANTHONY. It may be absolutely unnecessary, and we do not propose to resort to the draft until it is necessary from the military standpoint.

Mr. SHERLEY. In other words, the gentleman thinks that you can expedite matters by creating organizations from the bottom up rather than by building up existing organizations?

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, no. My argument in regard to the proposed additional army of one-half million men is that we create a more effective Military Establishment by means of a call for volunteers. We would thus get the very best men in the land to fill its ranks, and they are the men who fight winning battles.

Mr. SHERLEY. But leaving aside the question of the psychology of men, the gentleman is talking about time, and yet, if I understand him aright, those organizations which are now in a position best to be put into service at war strength he proposes to hold back and wait until the volunteer system has either won or lost.

Mr. ANTHONY. No. We propose the same authority as the administration bill proposes, absolutely. We do not change that authority in any respect.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman may want to get those figures right about enlistments. Here is a clipping from a Kansas paper, possibly from the gentleman's own paper.

Mr. ANTHONY. If it is from my paper, it will tell the truth.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman will permit, I will read it. I read:

At the Kansas City station, which includes all of Kansas, 73.7 per cent of the allotment has already been filled. Kansas has done her duty—and the Kansas City station leads all others in the central district. Chicago, which was boasting its superior loyalty and accusing Kansas of being yellow only a few months ago, has enlisted only 18.1 per cent of its allotment. St. Louis is last, with only 11.2 per cent.

Those are evidently the figures that the gentleman from Kansas referred to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. I am glad to have them.

Mr. LITTLE. Did the gentleman say 73 per cent?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; 73 per cent.

Mr. LITTLE. I was informed that the entire enlistment there was filled up to full war strength. I got that from the Bureau of Navigation, not from the newspapers.

Mr. BORLAND. Sometimes the newspapers are right.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Kansas gets away from the question that was asked him by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], I would like him to answer this question: Is there one single thing in the committee bill that prevents any man or discourages any man from exercising the right to enlist who has not enlisted?

Mr. ANTHONY. Absolutely not. It expedites enlistment.

One of the regrettable things in connection with this legislation is the vicious attitude of the metropolitan newspapers toward this bill. Instead of telling the people the truth that we are proposing a step in the practical creation of an army far in advance of the minority plan, they seem to have entered into a conspiracy to misrepresent, by raising a cloud of dust by defamation of the American volunteer. Let the truth be known that we are giving the President everything he has asked for in his bill, the draft, the conscription, and the full power to use it if it becomes necessary, but in addition to it all we provide the call for volunteers, which, in our opinion, will make it unnecessary for the President to stain the pages of any future history of this country with the enforcement of such an un-American military measure. I stand ready to put the power of conscription into the hands of the Government now, but I do not believe its use should be resorted to unless necessity should demand.

Of course, conscription is the easiest even if not the most patriotic way to fill the ranks of an army. Every technical militarist in the United States, every admirer of the great military machines which have been created by the military governments of Europe has longed for the time when such a system could be installed in our own country. When the great war broke forth two years ago and complications set in which threatened to embroil the United States this movement for compulsory service was inaugurated in the shape of a destructive campaign of criticism from military high brows, first directed against the National Guard, which Congress by special legislation was endeavoring to build up as the country's second line of defense. It is my belief that one of the purposes in some minds of keeping the National Guard in the Federal service for the past year in a monotonous, inane, and futile patrol of the Mexican border was in the hope that it would discourage these citizen soldiers and destroy the National Guard, most of whom left good jobs at home and who were ready and willing to serve their country in a real war, but who naturally tired of the hopeless military inactivity which prevailed on the Rio Grande. Nearly every Regular Army officer will privately admit the fine showing made by the guard in spite of the criticisms which filled their official reports, and which have been reechoed by the newspapers of the country. But the National Guard emerged from it all a splendid military force, seasoned by its training in the field, and of which the country is glad to make use of in the present emergency. Failing to destroy the National Guard with their uncalled-for criticism, these same conspirators, with the yelping of the metropolitan newspapers, are now denouncing the American volunteer for the same purpose of paving the way for the installation of a military system which is totally foreign to American ideals and American history. There is no question but that some people would like to set up in this country exactly the same form of a military autocracy which we are telling the military monarchists of Europe can no longer be tolerated under our present-day ideals of world democracy.

Of course, this country, having embarked in the world war, must prepare itself to do its part, and no one will go further than I to do so effectively; but I believe that the Representatives of the people of the United States will carefully deliberate before adopting military measures which are not to be approved by the American people themselves.

Every time this country becomes embroiled in war it is perhaps natural, but hardly creditable, that the people along the eastern and western seacoasts—which, if we did not have the adequate Navy the United States unquestionably possesses, would be more or less exposed—allow themselves to be thrown into a panic, which is voiced by the newspapers of the big cities along the seacoasts and the clamor of their Representatives in Congress for the most extreme measures of protection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. ANTHONY. In these great cities along the coast is centered the greater part of the financial wealth of the country and it was the moneyed interests of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and San Francisco which, in the Spanish War, lost their heads and saw a Spanish fleet approaching every night in their dreams to bombard them, and these same people to-day, instead of using calm judgment and common sense in our military preparation, evidence that they would stop at nothing in the effort to have extreme measures adopted, which, while satisfying to their own sense of security and financial profit, would prove abhorent to the common people throughout this great land.

One of the arguments made in the minority report is that an opportunity is offered for volunteers in the provision which has already been made for the voluntary enlistment in the Regular Army of individuals who desire to offer their services. It is wrong in the War Department to advance such an argument to the country at this time, and it is equally wrong in the minority to claim that they are making provision for volunteers by a willingness to accept individual enlistments. This House must remember that there is no such thing as a volunteer army unless it is recruited as such in local units, by organizations in the various States with the pride of those States from which the regiments come and with the pride of those communities from which the companies of volunteers spring behind them.

It is also idle for the opponents of a volunteer army at this time to cite the mistakes which may have been made in past wars in the organization of volunteers as applicable now because these same criticisms can not justly be made to-day.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. AYRES. Is it not a fact that the National Guard organizations are recruited from particular localities?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true so far as it is possible to so recruit them. But it is also true that from now on that practice will be discontinued.

Mr. AYRES. Why so?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it is the purpose of the War Department, if this legislation is enacted, to wipe out the National Guard, and the country will never hear of it again.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to that part of the Senate bill which answers the question propounded by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] as to interference by our volunteer plan with filling up the National Guard. I read from the Senate bill. It provides that—

All voluntary enlistments shall be in the Army of the United States and those enlisted may be assigned upon enlistment to any force of said Army not required to be raised exclusively by selective draft.

In other words, I want to ask the opinion of the gentleman as to what he thinks of the proposition of making an army of 500,000 conscripts only, and the proposition that nobody but conscripts can go into this army. What does the gentleman think of that?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it is absolutely un-American to pass such a proposition.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman believe that there lurks behind this bill, if there is not indicated on its face, the purpose of fixing conscription as the permanent military policy of the country?

Mr. ANTHONY. Undoubtedly it will be the permanent military policy of the country if it is enacted in the legislation now before the House.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I want to know in principle what difference there would be between requiring men to remain in the service and requiring men to enter the service? Is it not a fact that an officer in the United States Army can resign to-day and quit the service voluntarily if he desires to do so?

Mr. ANTHONY. He can.

Mr. SIMS. Then does the minority propose to amend their bill so as to require the compulsory continuance in the service of officers and enlisted men?

Mr. ANTHONY. No. The officers are better paid than the privates, and they seldom resign. They are like Members of Congress in that respect. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. In other words, they can keep the officers of the Regular Army in without resort to compulsion?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. Now I would like to make this one point, if I may be permitted. It has been suggested on the floor of this House that it is our duty from the military standpoint to pass this bill, because it has the approval of the General Staff of the Army. It is true that the General Staff of the Army was organized some years ago for the purpose of formulating the military policies of the country, but, Mr. Chairman, I deny that the bill which came from the War Department or the measure of the minority has ever had the approval of the General Staff, as a whole. It has not. When the Secretary of War came before us he admitted that the bill which is supported by the minority was drawn up by himself; that he had consulted individual members of the General Staff in its preparation, but that he had not consulted the General Staff as a body, even in this great emergency with which the country is confronted. So that it is absolutely incorrect to speak of this bill as having the formal indorsement of the General Staff.

And now one more word, directed to the criticisms of Members here on the floor against the volunteer army. All the every officer. It is unquestionably the purpose to officer this proposed army, whether they are to be conscripts or volunteers, mistakes ever made by our volunteer armies in the past have come from the fact that they have been, in some cases, officered by inexperienced men. Under the provisions of this bill the President of the United States has the absolute power to appoint with skilled officers, first from the Regular Army, then from the National Guard, from former officers of volunteers, from all the military sources that remain in the country, so that this whole charge of improperly officering the volunteer forces to be raised will lie only in case the War Department fails to do its duty. This bill is properly safeguarded under the volunteer law of 1914, passed by this body, which law did have the approval of the General Staff at the time it was recommended to this House.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Would not the President have the same sources for officers of the volunteers that he would have for officers for the conscripts?

Mr. ANTHONY. We give the President exactly the same sources for officers for the volunteers as the bill would give him for an army of conscripts. [Applause.]

There is no question but that the American volunteer is the most effective fighting man that the world has ever seen. The only criticism that can be laid at the door of American volunteer armies heretofore organized was due to the fact that in some instances there were not trained officers to command them. Such criticism can not justly be made to-day, because under the act of 1914, under which the volunteers provided for in this bill will be organized, the President has the sole power to appoint efficient officers to command them. We can apply, and this bill authorizes, the same judicious foresight to the selection of our volunteer army that we would give to the selection of a conscript army. An example of the confused reasoning on this question which is advanced in the arguments of the advocates of the minority report is typical:

The kind of thinking that is done in denunciation of the American volunteer plan appears in this extract which the Indianapolis News quotes from the New York World as final proof of "the failure of the volunteer system":

"When the British volunteer army was recruited men whose services were invaluable to the military industries of the country freely enlisted, and the damage was incalculable. In one battalion there were 200 expert munition workers, who were worth their weight in gold to their country in the industry that they deserted."

And much more to the same purpose.

But why should America three years afterwards stupidly copy English blunders? The recruiting of the English munitions workers was not due to a defect in the volunteer principle, for conscription would have worked precisely the same.

The fault was with English foresight in not rejecting the volunteer munitions workers, because England did not foresee how valuable they would be at home. The volunteer plan does not imply that every volunteer must be accepted any more than the draft plan implies that everybody must be drafted into actual ranks. There will be in any case judicious selection.

Mr. FIELDS. Will my colleague yield to me to make a little statement?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. FIELDS. I just want to state to the membership of the House that I shall print in the RECORD, as bearing upon the point of the colloquy between the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] and myself this morning, an article in the New York American of April 17, by John Temple Graves, which is headed as follows:

Army in a year by draft plan. General Staff to call out first 500,000 boys under 21 years of age.

I wish to print this article and let it go to the public for what it is worth.

Mr. ANTHONY. In conclusion I want to express the hope that the membership of this House will be able to withstand the clamor of the metropolitan press, will be able to withstand the pressure that is being brought to bear upon it by artificial means through the machinations of these so-called "defense" societies. I hope that the membership of this body will be able to resist all official pressure, that it will be able when this bill comes to a vote to be governed by its own conscience and its own honest convictions, that it will be able to say that it is a body of real representatives of the people, and not largely composed of official rubber stamps and rabbits, as its critics have charged it with being. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, it is natural that every man who is willing to serve his country in time of war should wish to feel that he is impelled by patriotism and a sense of duty to his country to volunteer, rather than compelled by its laws to serve. It is impossible not to sympathize with this sentiment, but wars are not won by sentiment or paid for with sympathy. If one opposes the position of those who advocate the volunteer system it is impossible to avoid reckoning with a prejudice against compulsory service of any character, but the necessities of war can not be controlled by prejudice, however deep seated or well grounded. In war there is but one question to be answered. That question is, "How can the war be won in the shortest time with the smallest sacrifice?" No one dares to say that the volunteer system is the answer to that question. It is not suggested for its intrinsic merit, for it has none, but as a concession to sentiment and a compromise with prejudice.

Universal obligatory service has always been recognized as an essential principle of our Government, but the enforcement of the obligation by draft has never been adopted as the policy of the country at the beginning of a war. The draft has always been a last resort, when all those who were willing to serve and all who could be persuaded to serve or ridiculed or threatened into serving had joined the colors. It was odious, therefore, because it differentiated the patriot from the slacker and branded the drafted man with the stigma of the coward and the poltroon. It is this differentiation, this stigma, which the method of applying the draft as a last resort attached to the drafted man which makes it offensive. The point I am trying to make is that it is not the principle of universal obligatory service but the application of the draft as a last resort which is repugnant.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. ANDERSON. I have only 20 minutes. I can not yield. The bill reported by the committee does not remove the objection; it preserves it. No such differentiation or stigma attaches or can attach to the selective draft adopted as a policy in the first instance, for such a policy is based upon universal liability to service and assumes the willingness of every man to serve when he is called. [Applause.]

The so-called volunteer system is always advocated in the name and for the sake of the volunteer, but it is not the man who is willing to serve, but the man who is unwilling to serve who profits by its adoption.

Even those who advocate it do not dare to rest the safety of the Nation upon it alone. They assert that we have but to call for volunteers to get an immediate, spontaneous, and adequate response, but they have not the courage of this conviction. If they had, this bill would authorize a call for volunteers, and stop there. Instead, the bill provides for volunteering, but "passing the buck" to the President, authorizes him to draft if a sufficient number do not offer themselves. They exhibit the sort of spirit which the volunteer system always inculcates. It is the spirit of "let George do it." Thus the men with the highest sense of public duty and of greatest usefulness and spirit are sacrificed at the very first. Men who would be more useful in industry go to the front, while those whom industry could spare stay at home.

There are two fundamental objections to the volunteer system. First, it takes those who ought not to go; and second, it exempts those who ought to go.

If the plan proposed by the committee could be understood in all its cowardly surrender to expediency, in all its weak yielding to prejudice and naked subversion of principle, it could not stand a moment. But this compromise is veneered with reasonableness and varnished over with a false appeal to patriotism. It pretends to appeal to the patriotic impulse of men to volunteer, while threatening them with the draft. It pretends to invite men to serve, while really affording a way to avoid service.

The whole philosophy of those who advocate the volunteer system is boiled down and condensed into this question: "Why should not the man who is willing to fight for his country be permitted to volunteer?" The answer to that question is this: "The right to enlist or not to enlist, to serve or not to serve, is not a privilege granted to the individual, but an obligation imposed by the Government. [Applause.]

The people of the United States are neither cowards nor slackers. Patriotism is a latent virtue, but its spark is found in every human breast. Every man can not serve his country on the field of battle, nor can every man serve with equal sacrifice to himself, his associates, his family, or his country, and it is not fair nor is it efficient to impose upon each individual the burden of determining whether he will undertake a service which is obligatory upon all alike.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to pause here to tell a story. I think I have never told it to any man here. It is a personal story, and I tell it only because it seems to have a bearing upon the questions which we are now considering.

When the Spanish-American War began I was 15 years old, the youngest of six boys, and going to high school. We all felt that at least one out of the six ought to respond to the call of the President. The others had ties which it was difficult to break and obligations from which they could not easily be relieved, while I was already a member of the militia and was bound by no obligations whatever. So we agreed that I should enlist, but, as I was under age, I had to have the consent of my father and mother. I went to my father to get his consent. A year ago he would have been called a "hyphenated American," for he was born in a foreign land, but he thought that he could give one son out of six to sustain the policies of the country which had given him opportunity and the benefit of free institutions. [Applause.] Together we went to my mother to get her consent. She, too, was a "hyphenated American." I never knew one who loved her native country better or was more loyal to the country of her adoption. For years an invalid, she was in bed with a sickness from which she never recovered. I told her what we boys had decided, and she asked me one question: "Do you think the country needs you?" I said, "Yes, mother." She signed the paper that permitted me to enlist with a hand that never faltered, while the tears rolled down her face. I know there are millions like her in the United States; but, gentlemen, it is not fair that the mothers of the country should bear the burden of the decision to send their sons to the front. That burden belongs to the Congress of the United States and the Government, whose policy and national life are at stake in this struggle. [Applause.]

It is charged in opposition to the principle of selective draft that the spirit of democracy and of liberty is opposed to any form of compulsion. Yet we pass laws every day, the wisdom and justice of which is denied by thousands, many of whom willingly accept them and all of whom are compelled to obey them. We pass tax laws, the injustice and inequality of which are often asserted by those who pay, and not infrequently admitted by those who impose and administer them, but all alike are obliged to bear the burdens which they impose, although the burden may be heavier upon some than upon others. We might as well say that only those who admit the wisdom and justice of the law should be required to obey it as to say that only those who are willing to serve should be required to serve; that only those who volunteer to pay taxes should be required to pay them as that only those who volunteer to serve should be required to serve. Such a doctrine is not democracy—it is anarchy. [Applause.]

The obligation to serve is a universal obligation, and the Government, which represents the democracy of the people, is in better position to say who shall serve, and when and how service shall be rendered, than the individual.

However repugnant the idea of compulsion may be, the fact is that force is indispensable to sovereignty. Without it, no nation can be secure against internal dissension or foreign aggression; without it, the universality and coincidence of benefit and duty, of privilege and obligation, of citizenship and service, are denied with impunity; without it, nations are mere associations of individuals, without power to secure individual liberty or enforce national policy. However we may try to delude ourselves into the belief that democracy and freedom have been won by the law of love, history forces us to the conclusion that liberty has been won and democracy sustained by the law of force. [Applause.]

By force we won independence; by force we won the freedom of the seas; by force we won our right to be called a Nation; by force we won a place among the Nations of the world.

Almost without exception, every war in which we have been engaged has been unnecessarily prolonged by the failure to adopt sound and vigorous policies at the outset, by the volunteer system, by short enlistments, by yielding to mild preachments. We can not now afford the unnecessary waste of life and treasure which the repetition of those mistakes will entail. We do not know whether this war will last three months or three years; whether we will need 500,000 men or 5,000,000. Wisdom requires that we base our calculations upon the longer period and the greater number. These considerations lead inevitably to the adoption of the selective draft at once. We dare not risk the failure of the volunteer system. We can not afford to venture victory on a compromise.

We are engaged in the greatest task that any nation has ever undertaken or can undertake. To this task we must bring every resource of the Nation. We are at war. Our first and only business is to win the war. War is the hardest and most practical of all undertakings. To its success every effort must be bent, every needful sacrifice made. There can be no surrender to compromise, no yielding to sentiment, no catering to prejudice. War is a hard-fisted, hard-headed, hard-hitting business. In it to yield to soft measures is to yield success. I have no thought that we shall be other than victors, but I will take no chances on having to accept loser's terms by adopting "rabbit" policies. I am eye-single about this business; to me there is but one ray of hope in all its terrible necessities. It is that by putting forth every effort now, by adopting sound and vigorous policies at the outset, we may end the war speedily without great sacrifice of lives or treasure.

The other day I heard a man make the statement that he was willing to fight for the country against invasion, but was unwilling to fight in the trenches in Europe. Such a statement must proceed from a misapprehension of the duties of citizenship and the rules and purposes which should govern the conduct of individuals and the relations of the nations to each other. To fight in self-defense, to fight against invasion, is not patriotism; it is self-interest. It is obedience to the first law of nature—self-preservation, which even the brutes obey. To fight for a principle, to fight for the rights of others and of your country, which you yourself may never have occasion to exercise; to fight for the freedom of the seas; to fight for the policies of your country and its place among the nations of the world wherever and whenever they are assailed—that is patriotism. [Applause.]

I have no sympathy or patience with the idea that we are making war to democratize Germany. We have no more business to make war to democratize Germany than we would have to make war to Christianize the Turks. I have even less sympathy with the view that we are fighting alone to enable a few men to risk their lives and the peace of the country on ships, belligerent or otherwise. We are fighting for the freedom of the seas for every man and every nation [applause], for the international policy of the United States and its place among the nations of the world, for a voice in the terms of peace and in making the rules which will govern the conduct of nations and mold the designs and purposes of civilization when peace has been once more established. [Applause.] To such a purpose a man may well yield the full measure of his obligation to his country.

The issue in this matter is the privilege of the individual to enlist or not to enlist, on the one hand, and the right of the Government whose policies and national life are at stake to adopt those measures which most certainly make for success, on the other. On such an issue I prefer to stand with my country. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I accord to every man only that which I ask of them, that in this hour of stress I am moved only by patriotic motives in that which I now advocate. I regret exceedingly that it has been necessary for me to part company with the distinguished minority leader, my good friend the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. But, looking at things as I do, I can not help but part company with him and his associates, for I believe that they are wrong in what they advocate.

I wish to state at the outset that I feel it is deeply to be regretted that the grave question we are about to decide has been surrounded by such a campaign of misrepresentation and the Members of this House have been subjected to such a tirade of vilification as has occurred during the last few weeks. Never has there been such a misrepresentation of facts and never has the moneyed power resorted to such contemptible tactics to coerce a legislative body into bending to its will. Selfish greed, not patriotic motives, has inspired most of this abuse, and the men who instigated it are those who are preparing to profit most by the war, to gather in the blood-stained sheckels, and wax rich off the misfortunes of others. It has been my observation that most of these so-called American-rights leagues, defense leagues, and so forth, are personneled by men who have big financial interests at stake, and who will reap the golden harvest from the great calamity that has overtaken this Nation. They are interested in the manner in which this law is framed and who shall give their lives on the firing line, if need be, not so much from a sense of duty to their country but from a sense of apprehension as to how they are going to fare between now and the time the final gong is rung on the tragedy. That is the reason so many of them are anxious that the youths of our country be sent to the front and the able-bodied men denied that opportunity, even though it may be their wish to go.

If the call for volunteers should come these men know that many, probably thousands and hundreds of thousands of the men now working in their factories would feel it their duty to respond to the call and thus the men who are figuring on reaping the harvest from the inflated prices would have their output limited and their source of revenue reduced.

Wisely have they planned to have the boys who are of no use to them in a manufacturing way face the brunt of battle and stand the onslaughts that may be made against this country. The bill for selective conscription limits the age of those who may be drafted at a minimum of 19 and a maximum of 25 years. It can not be contended that any man has reached the zenith of his ability either mental or physical at the age of 25. Why, then, should this Government assume the right to say that because you are under 25 years of age you must go to war, and because another man is over that age he must not go whether he wants to or not? Why has this country the arbitrary right to say to the youth, you shall go but to the young man you shall stay. Is it fitting or right that this country in time of war shall pick out the vocation of its male citizens? The jingo press has tried to call down maledictions on the heads of those Members of this House who are supporting the majority report on this bill on the ground that they are unpatriotic and un-American. It is a clever form of abuse designed to arouse the people to a frenzy, but it is as false as it is contemptible. In fact conscription in itself is autocratic, not democratic; it savors of the monarchies of Europe and not the Americanism of the United States. Right here I want to state that if we must resort to conscription I propose that we shall raise the age limit so that every able-bodied man in the United States who is yet in the prime of life shall be subject to the call. At least this will place no unjust discrimination against the youths of our land, will not penalize them because they happen to be younger in years than you and I; will not cast a shadow over their young lives or blot them out because the world is young to them. And it will also place no unjust discrimination against the man of mature years who feels that it is his duty to respond to the call but who will be barred because perchance he was born in the eighties and not the nineties has reached the age of discretion and is not the unformed youth.

It is exceedingly unfortunate that the campaign of villification has been going on over the country. I do not know where it originates, but I do know that this morning's Post in the city of Washington, carried a three-page advertisement, and in the columns of that paper, paid for by some one, were three editorials taken from papers edited in my district. I am very sure that the gentleman who wrote the editorials did not understand what we are advocating here to-day. [Applause.]

The whole trouble about this proposition is that it is not understood. It has been a campaign of misrepresentation from the very start. Terms are used and mixed up, and the people that use them do not know to what they refer. For instance, "universal training" is brought into the argument and into this debate time after time, and there is no universal training in either bill—either of the majority or that which the minority advocates. Universal training is another proposition, and so is universal service.

Universal military training and conscription are two entirely different subjects. I call attention to this matter because of the fact that in the campaign of abuse that has been going on any man who dared to state that he was in favor of trying out the volunteer service before resorting to conscription has immediately been accused of being opposed to universal military training. This doubtless has been done with a design, for there are millions of people in the United States who are in favor of universal military training but are radically opposed to the other. I believe a large majority of the people believe that the young men of this country should be properly trained in military tactics so they could act promptly and efficiently in time of need. Universal military training should be a part of our general system of education. Knowledge along military lines should be inculcated in the mind of the young man the same as knowledge along industrial lines or any other business pursuits. He should be prepared to support and defend his country as he prepares himself to defend his home, his business, or his profession; but universal military training does not mean that he shall spend years in the idle routine of a military camp when he could be spending his time and energies far better in industrial pursuits. Give him the knowledge, inculcate in him the patriotism, and we will have an Army that will defend any nation, any country, without resorting to draft or conscription.

The accusation that has been spread by the propaganda that is trying to force a conscription bill through this House that the supporters of this majority report are hampering the President in the conduct of this war is false and has no foundation in fact. On the contrary, the passage of this bill would facilitate his actions, and would result in providing an army quicker than if we waited for selective draft. The Secretary of War has himself declared that it would take several months before a census could be taken and arrangements made whereby conscription could be put into effect. It has been estimated that it would take until September or October before the draft system could be placed in operation, and would probably be November before the men who were drafted could be placed in training.

Col. Roosevelt has stated that he could raise an army of 25,000 in two months and have them in the trenches in four. A prominent National Guard man in my State informs me that he can raise a brigade in Iowa in 30 days. From other sources comes the information that brigades, divisions, and companies can be raised in from 2 weeks to 30 days.

It is safe to say that if a call for volunteers was made we could have, beside the National Guard, 500,000 men under arms inside of four months. If we resort to conscription, the system will not be ready to be put into effect until long after we could have an army ready for the field under the volunteer system. Is it hampering the President to provide him with an army to defend this country? Is it un-American to resort to the quickest way to put this country in a state of preparedness? This bill provides that should sufficient volunteers not be forthcoming the President can resort to selective draft. It also provides that he can secure the census to make the draft as soon as he desires, and that he can be making all his arrangements while the call for volunteers is being answered. In plain words this bill provides for the quickest possible way of securing an army; a call for volunteers while a selective-draft system is being prepared and conscription as soon as it is ready to be applied if the volunteer system does not bring sufficient men.

The war councils have said that raw recruits would stand no chance if they were sent against the trained armies of Europe, and this argument is being used in favor of an immediate conscription plan, but I respectfully submit that trained armies are only secured by training soldiers, and the quicker these men are enlisted and put in training the sooner will we have the trained army that is necessary.

The only question before you now is the question whether the volunteer system is better to raise an army than the conscript system, and I want to call the attention of this House to the fact, and I want to congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the committee, upon the fight that he has made, a part of which he has already won for those who stand behind the President in this fight. There is no one standing out for the President's plan. One of the main things was the conscripting of boys under 21, and that they have abandoned. They have raised the minimum age to 21, as we raised it, and they raised the maximum age to 40, as the majority of the committee raised it.

I call the attention of this House to the fact that if it had not been for the 12 gentlemen on that committee that made the fight you would not have had these ages raised, as they admit now that they should have been raised. [Applause.]

I want to call attention to one or two other things briefly. You hear a great deal said about the volunteer enlistments in the National Guard and the Regular Army. It is true that that opportunity is afforded to everybody, but I call your attention to the fact that in the National Guard all over this country, especially in my district, there is no opportunity to enlist in the National Guard as a unit, only in about 7 towns out of 100.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. Why is it impossible for them to enlist as units in the National Guard?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Because the State has to furnish an armory, and armories are not there in the communities. There is a limit to the State furnishing armories.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. If the gentleman will allow me, one of the provisions of the Army bill is that the recruiting officer has a right to put a man in the Regular Army or the National Guard.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is true. The volunteer system, as we are advocating it in this bill, is founded on this fact, that it is better and you make your war more popular if you allow the units to come from small towns in the different States. There are any number of towns in my district that want to furnish 10, 15, or 20 boys—perhaps not a full company—but they want the boys to go out and fight as a unit; they want them to be associated in the field and in the battle and in the training together. I think it is a very good plan, and it tends to get enlistments. There is not any question about that. The plan of the War Department is not to take men as units but to take them from families and distribute them here and there and everywhere—put the man from Texas in a regiment from New York, composed of men that he never saw before. Just think of taking a boy 19 years old away from his father and mother, unwilling to go into the service, and putting him in a regiment where he never saw one of the men before, and putting him there not only for one year but for three or four years, and perhaps to go out and die. That is the plan of the War Department.

A Member has put in the RECORD an article that is supposed to have the authority of the War Department, saying that they did not intend to take the boys from 21 to 25, but the General Staff proposition is to take the first class from boys 19 to 21. Was there ever a more cold-blooded proposition proposed in a free Government than that? [Applause.] Talk about the Germans' ruthlessness, taking a man, their enemy, and compelling him to work for them, and yet in this Congress you propose to take your own boys and put them on the firing line; take them unwilling and put them up to be shot at. Gentlemen, although that proposition is already conceded in this House to be wrong, it is not dead. In the body at the other end of the Capitol they are now debating it, and if you by your votes defeat the majority's bill in this House you stand in danger of having to vote for that tomorrow or the next day. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not a fact that even Germany, a military autocracy, has never attempted to break up the territorial organization of the German Army; that Bavarian fights with Bavarian, Wurttemberger with Wurttemberger, and Saxon with Saxon; and yet the War Department has been as insistent as it has on any part of its program on the proposition that our men shall not be territorially organized, and that Maine shall fight with California and Texas with Minnesota?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is absolutely right; and as I understand it they go further than that——

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am sure my colleague from Iowa desires to be fair at least to the War Department. I would like to ask him if there was any such argument made by the Secretary of War or any representative of the War Department before the Committee on Military Affairs that it was the desire of the War Department to do any such thing as the gentleman from Iowa has said?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. To what does the gentleman refer?

Mr. McKENZIE. Taking the men from Texas and putting them with men from New York and breaking up the entire territorial organization of the troops. Was there any argument made for any such proposition?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I understand there was.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to have the gentleman cite me to it in the hearings.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Unquestionably there was in the original draft of the bill by the War Department, as sent to the committee, a provision to the effect that all volunteer enlistments should hereafter be made in the Army of the United States. I asked the Secretary of War what that meant, and he said that it meant that the present organization of the Regular Army and of the National Guard would be destroyed during the period of this emergency and there would be substituted for them the Army of the United States, and that under this the President would have the power to send any enlisted man to any organization anywhere that he saw fit. But let me go further and state that the committee turned that proposition down, but before the committee reported the bill I received a letter from the Secretary of War receding from that position.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman will permit me——

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. The statement that I challenge is the statement that the Secretary of War or any man representing the Secretary of War or the War Department advocated a military organization that would take men from one State arbitrarily and put them with men from other States, instead of permitting them to go as State units, and, furthermore, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] as to why they were going to enlist them in the Army of the United States, the Secretary said that it was in the interest of economy, in order that they would not have to have two recruiting stations, one for the National Guard and one for the Regular Army, in the same community.

Mr. DENT. That is the provision in the bill now.

Mr. McKENZIE. I challenge the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] that the Secretary of War or anyone from the War Department advocated this inhuman and brutal proposition that he has set forth.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Who drew the original bill, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. McKENZIE. Search me! [Laughter.]

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Did not the War Department draw it?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. In order that the facts may be kept as near correct as possible, on page 10, line 5, of the original draft of the bill that was submitted to the Military Committee by the Secretary of War there was this provision:

> All volunteer enlistments shall be in the Army of the United States, and those enlisted may be assigned upon enlistment to any force of said Army not required to be raised exclusively by the selective draft.

That was stricken out by the committee, and the Secretary of War finally yielded upon it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. And, Mr. Chairman, that identical bill is now being considered in the Senate bill?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. And that is the bill that we will have to act on here finally?

Mr. DENT. Yes; probably.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is the bill that you are voting against to-day. [Applause.] I realize that it is very hard sometimes to keep track of the War Department, and I do not want to be understood as criticizing the General Staff. I have been here in Washington now for two years, and my admiration for the gentlemen of the General Staff is much greater than it was when I came here; but they make mistakes, just like everyone else, and I call the attention of this House to the fact, and every gentleman upon our committee knows it, that the General Staff of the War Department made a rule that they were not going to allow the National Guard to be enlisted with any more units, and when the Secretary of War came before our committee some of the gentlemen of the committee called his attention to the fact that they had not utilized the national-defense act and had not allowed it to become operative; that there was a place there for more units, and they did not seem to realize it, and in two days after that the General Staff came out with the statement, and you read it in your morning newspaper, that the War Department had discovered that we had a national-defense act [laughter], and that there was a place for more enlistments in the National Guard.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman has stated that the War Department changed its mind on one or two things. Did the gentleman change his mind, and did the majority of the committee change their minds, when they changed the language of their amendment to the bill so that it did not "pass the buck" up to the President quite so hard as the language of the bill now reads?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Why, certainly. The gentlemen of the committee only had a few minutes in which to formulate their minds, and they did change their minds, and when they find they are wrong they are willing to change their minds and they are willing to admit it.

Mr. KAHN. And so is the War Department.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. And the committee do not say that they have just discovered there was something in the law that they did not see there before when they had a chance to see it.

Mr. KAHN. But the gentleman does not give the War Department the right to change its mind, although he reserves to himself the right to change his.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We did give them the right. I am not criticizing; I am simply calling attention to it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not true that while the War Department reluctantly admitted that the national-defense act authorized the organization of new increments of the National Guard, the War Department is now declining to accept any of these new increments in the service though 20 States are ready to offer them? [Applause.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is absolutely correct, and I want to call the attention of the committee to another thing in the national-defense act that I do not believe every Member of the House understands. That act provided for this very emergency. There is no limitation to the National Guard. It is not 800 to a congressional district, but it must be 800, and they can take as many more as they have offered to it, and they are not taking what is offered to it, and yet they want to go out in my district and conscript young people there to go to war. Now, my friends——

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly, if I can get more time.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman can get more time. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. At the close of the Spanish-American War there was made an index list of those who had served as officers in that war, probably some 1,000, I think. They signed that for service when called upon. I notice in the bill which the committee brought in that there is no consideration whatever given to those men. Does the gentleman know why that was done?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, it was not thought best—I had the matter up—it was not thought best by the committee, and I am not saying but what it was right, and I think we all practically agreed to it, that on this bill, which is designed to cover an emergency, it was best to keep those features of general legislation off from the bill. The committee was wise in that. We probably will take that up in another bill.

Mr. DYER. Does not the gentleman think that it belongs in this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. DYER. Does not the gentleman think that belongs in this bill, because it is necessary to provide officers, many more than are available? West Point is not sufficient to furnish them, although they are graduating them before time, and there are thousands of men trained and who have had experience, and why should they be slighted and not given an opportunity?

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that the committee tried to make as little difference in the bill reported as possible from the bill handed down by the War Department; and the War Department bill called for no provision as to Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state whether or not he would be in favor of it?

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. I would be in favor of it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I am in favor of that myself, but on the advice of the majority of the committee it was thought best to leave it out.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. The gentleman is a member of the committee. What does the gentleman call this bill introduced, a volunteer bill?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. EMERSON. Does the gentleman believe under a volunteer bill we can raise the men?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I believe you can raise at least half a million men, and I know you can raise them better, quicker, and that it will do a great deal to popularize this war if you call for them. [Applause.]

Mr. EMERSON. Why does the gentleman put at the end of his bill a conscription feature? Was that part of a volunteer system, or a kind of a club?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; that is not a club.

Mr. EMERSON. What is that?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is to give the President authority to take them if——

Mr. EMERSON. But if you can get them by the volunteer system you do not need a club.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There might be a time coming when you can not get them.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Of course, the gentleman can move to strike out the draft provision. [Applause.]

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. KEARNS. I think the volunteer plan was put in there to give such gentlemen as the gentleman from Cleveland an opportunity to enlist.

Mr. EMERSON. I will enlist just as quickly as any Member of this House will enlist—just as quickly.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Now, gentlemen, this——

Mr. EMERSON. I want some of these noisy fellows to enlist; I want to have some of these fellows enlist who voted for Mr. Wilson because he kept us out of war first. Now, when they will enlist——

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. There is no question but that the gentleman wants us to enlist first. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does not the gentleman think that some of those who wanted us to go to war ought to enlist?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The fact remains that a state of war exists between the United States and Germany now?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. And the gentleman pictured a few moments ago in a graphic description of the poor young men being taken from their homes and their mothers.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I tried to.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Now, under your volunteer system, where are you going to take them from? [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They volunteer themselves.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And they volunteer three years younger than they do under our plan.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If you want to go out of this House with me and walk out of your own accord, it is all right; but if I take hold of you and drag you out, it is another proposition.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. How about the man who is holding back and does not want to go?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that your selective-conscription plan is a haven for sulkers.

Mr. JAMES. Then why did you put it in the bill?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that if I had my way it would not be in there as it is written, but you understand that in a committee you have to compromise some differences.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There were eight men who did not compromise certain differences.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. You have compromised.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. You have compromised the very fundamental feature. You have come over to the majority side on that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, yes; you have.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That was done before the dissension leading to the minority report in the committee, if the gentleman wants me to reveal committee proceedings.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Then you are not standing behind the President. And that is all the argument that you have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I would like to say just a few words in regard to one feature running through all these debates, and that is this, that the volunteer system is a failure, and that we ought to avoid it, and yet it is the only system by which this country has defended itself for over 130 years. My friends, in yon Rotunda is a picture of the Surrender of Cornwallis. I ask some of you if that picture and the story that it tells is a failure? On the other side of the Rotunda is another picture, the Surrender of Burgoyne to Gen. Gates. Is that picture and the story that it tells a failure? This Congress is trying to write across those great pictures the words, "This is a lie." Is that great picture of Lincoln and his Cabinet at the signing of the Emancipation Proclamation, made possible by the Volunteers of '61—is that picture a lie? You have in this great city of Washington many statues to the heroes of the Civil War—Gen. Logan, and many others. Are those lies. Was the story and the history that those men wrote a failure? My friends, sitting in this House is one of our colleagues who volunteered in the Civil War, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD]. Is his life story a failure? I think not.

I hope that when this House votes on this measure it will repudiate this campaign of misrepresentation by such an overwhelming vote that the country will understand that these stories that we love so well were not a failure. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If I have any time.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman has spoken about the volunteers, and I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact and ask him whether he knows it to be a fact or not—I do—that of the 300,000 or more who enlisted for the Spanish War, the volunteers who served in the Spanish War, 98 per cent of those are to-day in favor of universal military service as provided for in this amendment?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I know nothing about that. I presume it is like a great many other things the propaganda is telling us. It needs investigation. [Applause.]

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. KING. I was very much interested in the reference made to an advertisement in a certain newspaper published in the city of Washington this morning, because it undertook to set out editorials from every newspaper in the district of every man who voted against this war on the morning of the crucifixion—the morning of the 6th of April.

I want to ask you—and you can answer it later and insert it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is going to insert the names of the battles in which our great generals fought—does the gentleman think that the man who publishes papers of that kind, wealthy men who sit in beautiful Venetian palaces and their purple opera houses, their gilded chairs, with red plush beneath them, while champagne glasses are clinking in the basement as one goes by there in the evening, can go on with that work forever and force the boys of this country between the ages of 19 and 25 years into the trenches of Europe and yet think a day of retribution will not come? [Applause.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The question may be pertinent, but I do not care to discuss it.

The volunteer soldier has always proven more efficient than the drafted soldier. The wars of the past have sufficiently proven this, and although one or two of our defense leagues have attempted to prove that the Revolutionary and Civil Wars were failures because our forefathers did not see fit to adopt selective draft, in the minds of the people they will ever remain as splendid achievements that could not have been accomplished had they been fought with men who were fighting because they were made to and not because their heart and soul were wrapped up in the welfare of their country. And just why is the volunteer army better? There are many reasons, and the principal one is that which I have touched upon before, that the volunteer is not merely a machine but puts his heart and soul into the conflict. Another reason is that volunteer units are much more proficient than other units. The community spirit is brought out in them. The volunteer companies are formed in the small towns and surrounding country. Comrades as boys, they volunteer as men, and side by side they fight as they had worked, with a common interest in each other and that comradeship that builds the proficient fighting machine. The rivalry that exists between units as to who shall be the honor unit brings out that spirit that goes to develop the true Americanism and make the men win against all odds. This is entirely lacking where men are thrown together with no incentive to fight and no comradeship with the men with whom they come in contact.

We are in the mightiest war of the ages. The world is engaged in a death struggle. Now that we have entered the arena we must bend every energy to win, and win an honorable victory as quickly and with as little loss of life and little suffering as possible. To win we must have an army, and I believe this method provides for an efficient army quicker and more practical than any other way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, it is very fortunate that throughout the debate thus far, however sharp our differences of opinion may be upon this very important measure, it has been fully recognized that whether we be for the one bill or the other bill we are all actuated by patriotic motives, and desire to do that which is best for our country in winning this war.

I have often been asked whether my constituents in my district indorsed the position that I have taken upon the various questions that have come before us during this session. I have always been compelled to say that I do not know. I do not know the opinion of my constituents upon this question, but at the very outset I wish to make an observation upon what I believe to be the duty and responsibility of a Member of Congress upon this bill and upon all measures relating to the war. Ours is a representative government. Upon that we all agree, but we do not always agree upon what the term implies.

Are Members of Congress mere instruments to register the will of their constituents from day to day, or is it their duty to exercise their independent judgment upon matters vitally affecting our national life? I believe that true representative government requires me to exercise my own judgment to a very large degree. Upon this measure the question to be asked is not what do my constituents to-day think about it, but what would they think about it could I present to each one of them the information I have and my reasons for the course of action that I believe I should take. My constituents and your constituents desire that we adopt such policies as will win this war in the shortest possible time, with the least sacrifice of life.

Upon that we will all agree; and believing that the selective draft or conscription plan will do more to secure this result than the volunteer system, I shall unhesitatingly give it my support. I believe that in the end my constituents will indorse my action, for they are patriotic and they are intelligent; but even though I believed my action would not be indorsed by my constituents, my course would be the same.

In time of war, when the very existence of our Republic is in danger, my first duty is to my country and not to my constituents. My political future is of small moment at such a time as this. When I vote to raise an army under any plan, knowing that many of those in that army may give up their lives for their country, I have no right to consider my political fortunes in that vote. Political defeat will be a small sacrifice for me to make compared to sacrifices others will make.

If this was a war to extend our trade, I would either vote against raising an army at all or vote for the volunteer system. If an army was proposed merely to show to our allies that we were willing to cheer them by having our flag upon European battle fields, I would vote for the volunteer system. If this was a war to destroy autocracy for the purpose of bringing liberty to other peoples, I would vote for the volunteer system. But none of these is the kind of a war in which we are engaged to-day. We must fight the autocracy of Germany, not primarily in the interest of the German people, but primarily in our own interest. We must fight autocracy in Germany in order to preserve democracy in America. If the Imperial German Government is victorious now, then we may look forward to the possible destruction of our liberties here.

I had hoped that our war with Germany, so far as fighting is concerned, might be confined to the sea. I still hope so, but we must be prepared to go further and do whatever may be necessary to win the war. I confidently hope and believe that before we will be ready to send any of the troops provided for in this bill across the sea the war will be over, but we should recognize now that if the war is not over within a year we will have to fight, not only with money and supplies, but with men. I am not going to give my reasons for this conclusion, but I am sure that time will demonstrate the correctness of this statement.

Men on this floor have said that if this country was invaded by the enemy they would not hesitate to do anything necessary to meet such invasion, but when it comes to sending an army overseas, different considerations should prevail. I can not understand the reasoning of those gentlemen. If a year from now this war is not over, and it can be won by our sending a million men to join 12,000,000 men fighting our enemy, what kind of patriotism is it, what kind of statesmanship is it that would wait for these 12,000,000 men to be defeated and then say, "Now we will get ready to fight." America will be forced to become an armed camp for a generation in that event, and we will have fastened upon us exactly that militarism that the volunteer advocates so much deplore, and which we all wish to avoid. I might possibly favor the volunteer system if we did not need to conserve every resource we have to win this war, but if we would win within the next 12 months without the loss of American lives, it will be because in that time we will have utilized all possible means of necessary production here. We must feed our own people, we must feed and supply our Army, and in addition we must, in large part, feed and supply the armies of our allies. Food and munitions to our allies now is far more important than sending them additional men to feed and supply. The next 12 months we must devote to production and training an army. Production is the first essential, men the second. Our Army should then be selected so as to interfere as little as possible with production and not at all with production absolutely essential to carry on the war. This can be done and done only through the selective draft. The President is given authority to exempt all citizens necessary to that production, and through this system only can the proper policy be applied of utilizing the men of the Nation where they can be most useful in winning the war. Those should be put in training who can best be spared, those having no one dependent upon them and those who are consumers rather than producers. Under the volunteer system a large majority of those who will enlist ought not to be spared now for that purpose. Under the draft those will be taken who can best be spared.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; for just a question.

Mr. LEVER. I understand that the bill of the majority of the committee exempts those engaged in the industries.

Mr. LENROOT. It authorizes the President to exempt them.

Mr. LEVER. Is it the gentleman's understanding that an amendment offered by the minority will include in that exemption also those engaged in agriculture?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know what the intention of the minority is, but I am very frank to say to the gentleman that if no one else offers an amendment, I myself will offer one to make it clear that the President is authorized to exempt any class of industry that in his judgment is necessary for the national welfare.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. LENROOT. Just for one question.

Mr. TOWNER. I just wanted to say that that amendment was adopted in the Senate, and I understand that the gentleman in charge of the bill on both sides have no objection to its being adopted here in the House.

Mr. LENROOT. I am thoroughly in favor of that amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. I think there will be very little, if any, opposition to it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. LENROOT. I regret I can not yield now.

But it is said that the bill provides for the same selection in volunteers as is provided in the case of draft. Granted; but if the volunteer system is to be so restricted, every man on this floor knows that the volunteer system will fail, for it has always been true that a large majority of volunteers have come from those engaged in productive employment, upon the farm, in the mine and factory. The bill reported by the majority of the committee provides that the draft can be resorted to only upon a finding by the President that the volunteer system is a failure. What would be the moral effect of such a finding upon Germany—our enemy? Would she not naturally conclude that America is unwilling to fight? And may not the very system that the majority advocates in this bill so prolong the war as to make it necessary to send our men across the sea? When if at the very outset we make it plain that the mighty power of this Nation is to be used to the utmost to win this war, and that if need be every man in it will be called upon to wage it to victory, it is more than probable that such a policy inaugurated now will result in an early ending of the war without the sacrifice of a single American life. [Applause.] The moral effect of that policy now will be worth more in ending the war than if we were prepared to send a half million volunteers to the battle fields of France to-morrow. [Applause.]

Much has been said as to whether this selective draft is not an infringement upon the democracy of America. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the selective draft is the only democratic principle that ought to be adopted in time of war.

What is a democracy? What is our democracy? Is it an aggregation of 100,000,000 of people who shall receive privileges from the Government but be under no obligations to it? Is it a democracy to say that 100,000,000 of people shall enjoy the blessings of that flag, but only those who are willing to volunteer and die shall protect it? Is that your idea of democracy? It is not mine. Universal obligation to serve ought to be just as important as the privileges that the American people enjoy. [Applause.]

Men say that this selective draft will be dragging a man from his home whether he be willing or not. Let me give you my idea of the selective draft as proposed by the minority and of the conscript system proposed by the majority when the volunteer system fails. With the minority proposition, when a man is selected under a draft there will be no stigma upon him. He will walk out from his community, and his neighbors will point to him and say, "There is a man who has been chosen by our country for distinguished service. He is going to fight for us." That is the selective draft. But upon the failure of the volunteer system, when conscription is resorted to, what is the situation? The finger of scorn and of shame is pointed at the conscript then and he has the mark of a coward and a slacker upon him. Which shall we choose?

I am very much surprised at the attitude of so many of the Members from Southern States upon this matter of conscription. I wonder if you all realize that the Southern Confederacy in the Civil War, in the beginning of the second year of that war, resorted to conscription, resorted to a selective draft, based exactly upon the principle that is embodied in this bill? In the conscription laws of the Southern Confederacy there were certain exemptions of men working in mines, in furnaces, in foundries. The secretary of war of the Southern Confederacy was authorized to exempt from that selective draft operatives in woolen mills and in cotton mills and various other industries. Of that draft Col. Upton, whom you all know as one of the recognized military authorities of the United States, says in his work, The Military Policy of the United States:

> The Confederate armies, blindly created for 12 months and as blindly disorganized, in the hope of filling their depleted ranks by voluntary enlistment, were rapidly hastening to their dissolution. The proud Confederacy, whose flag had floated within the distinct view of the National Capital, through blunders of legislation was tottering to its fall. A month more, or two months at the farthest, and the gigantic rebellion, organized to establish the sovereignty and independence of the States, would be a thing of the past, its leaders fleeing from the wrath of a loyal and outraged people. The situation was desperate; the crisis had arrived; the triumph of the Union was at hand.
> At this juncture it was reserved for a Confederate Congress to explain for all time the meaning and extent of the power to raise and support armies. Appalled, but not unmanned, it rose to the occasion and setting an example that was followed a year later by the National Congress, resolved to meet the emergency by declaring every man between the ages of 18 and 35 a soldier. Had it been the object of the law to force reluctant citizens into the ranks the experiment might not have seemed hazardous, but going far beyond, to conscript armies numbering more than 100,000 soldiers, who had faithfully fulfilled their engagements and were already turning their affections homeward, the temerity of this legislation finds no parallel in the history of the world. But the end justified the means; the reorganization which was languishing was immediately completed; the ranks were filled up and given the strength of increasing numbers; the Confederate armies again took the field to baffle and resist the onset of the Union hosts until, dwindling to the former shadows of themselves, they were finally compelled to lay down their arms at Appomattox Court House.

So through the selective draft in the Civil War the Southern Confederacy was enabled to continue that war two years longer than would otherwise have been possible.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee and Mr. SHALLENBERGER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like 10 minutes more.

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I am sorry I can not yield, because I want to refer to some other things, and I have only 10 minutes. If I can get further time, I will be glad to yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was going to say that the ultimate history of the Civil War is that under that conscription system the South got pretty badly licked.

Mr. LENROOT. It certainly was, and personally I am very sorry that it resorted to the conscription, because otherwise the North would have won the war two years sooner than it did.

Mr. BURNETT. May I ask my friend——

Mr. LENROOT. I am sorry I can not yield further. I am always glad to yield when I have the time.

Mr. Chairman, much has been said about tearing the boys from their mothers' breasts under this conscriptive system. Of course there is no such issue before the House of Representatives to-day, because both majority and minority have agreed upon the age limit of 21 to 40 years for conscription. But while that is true, I want to call attention to this fact, that while these gentlemen of the majority have such tender concern for the boys of 19 and 20 years of age, and while they call attention to the fact, as they view it, that it would be a crime to take such tender youths and put them in the Army, their own bill, under the volunteer system that they advocate, provides for taking boys not 19 years of age but 18 years of age, or one year younger than the Secretary of War has ever proposed should be subject to selective draft. And I want to call attention to the fact that if you gentlemen succeed in your volunteer system, as against this selective draft, more boys under 21 years of age will fight and die for their country, if any fighting is necessary, than will fight and die under the selective draft system, even that proposed by the Secretary of War. [Applause.]

In the Civil War upon the northern side there was a total of 2,606,341 volunteers, and out of that number—I quote from records put into the printed proceedings of the Senate last Saturday by Senator NELSON—out of that number 1,158,438 were boys 18 years of age; 844,981 were boys 17 years of age; 231,051 were boys 16 years of age. Do you think the boys of 1917 are less patriotic than the boys of 1861? If you want to protect the boys and not take an undue number of them, you will support the selective draft and you will defeat the voluntary system.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield now. And in your solicitude for the mother with a breaking heart, why, of course, there are mothers whose hearts are going to break whether their boys be taken under the selective draft or whether they go under the volunteer system. But, as was said by the gentlemen from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], is it not apparent that instead of having mothers make the decision or the young boy make the decision, it is better to let the Government decide for them? [Applause.]

You know, as well as I do, that under your volunteer system in any community if under the selective draft five would be a fair proportion; under the volunteer system one boy would volunteer, and that would induce another and another and another, and under that volunteer system you would get them in crowds where you are breaking the hearts of twice as many mothers as you would under the selective-draft system.

I want to refer to another matter before I close. The gentleman from Nebraska, Gov. SHALLENBERGER, yesterday, in referring to his Swiss ancestors, paid a very eloquent and just tribute to that great and independent people, and he closed that eloquent tribute with the statement that the people in that little republic in the Alps had never bowed the head or crooked the knee to any prince or potentate upon earth. That was a just and well-deserved tribute to the people of the Swiss Republic, but it was a most unfortunate reference for the gentleman to make in attempting to use it as an argument for the volunteer system. I hold in my hand the military constitution of the Swiss Republic, and the first sentence is: "Every Swiss is bound to do military service." [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does the gentleman mean to say that the selective-draft proposition whereby 1 man in 40 is taken in the same as the Swiss system where it says that every man is bound to do military service? [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. You may applaud the gentleman now, but you will come to regret your applause in just a minute, because in the same constitution—and the gentleman complains of this selective draft from 21 to 40—let me tell him what the Swiss system is. The Swiss system has three kinds of armies. The first line is the line that is called first in every war, exactly as will be called in this war, known as the Ausrug. They take the men from 20 to 32 years of age. The second line is called the Landwehr, composed of men between 33 and 40, and the third line is called the Landsturm, taking men between 41 and 48.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. They take every man; and the proposition in this bill is to take one man out of eight between the ages of 19 and 25.

Mr. LENROOT. They do not take every man, as I have shown, unless every man is needed. Now, let me ask the gentleman a question. If we have 6,000,000 men between the ages of 20 and 32 years of age, which is the Swiss system, and we need only 500,000, would the gentleman take every man or select 500,000 by lot? [Applause.] I wait for an answer. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I did not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. LENROOT. The Swiss take every man between 20 and 32, with some exemptions. If we have 6,000,000 men between the ages of 20 and 32 all subject to military duty and if we only needed 500,000, would the gentleman take and put under arms 6,000,000 of them or would he select 500,000 by lot, as in this bill?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The administration plan proposes to have tribunals all over the country——

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, the gentleman gets away from the question. How would the gentleman select the 500,000?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I would call for volunteers and get what I wanted.

Mr. LENROOT. The Swiss Republic, from which the gentleman's ancestors came, do not do it in that way, and the gentleman referred to the Swiss Republic as the highest example of democracy in the world to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Suppose under the call for volunteers we get several million, how would the gentleman select the 500,000 out of them?

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, what would happen—and I want to be entirely fair—if we had a call for volunteers they would stop accepting them when they got the 500,000. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

THE NEW ARMY—HOW SHALL WE RAISE IT?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, fortunately there are no differences of opinion in the House relative to the objects sought to be accomplished or the ends we seek to attain in the enactment of this legislation. There were differences of opinion as to the wisdom, propriety, or necessity of making a declaration of war, but the die having been cast, the declaration having been made, the representatives of the American people are united in purpose and determination to marshal, prepare, and utilize the Nation's resources of men and material in the best and most effective manner for the accomplishment of the purposes for which we have unsheathed the sword.

United as we are in our purpose to assemble and prepare the Nation's resources of men and material for any and every service that may be necessary to the accomplishment of the Nation's will, we have not been and we shall not be captious, contentious, or overinsistent as to the form and fashion of the legislation or the details of the plans or policies intended or necessary to meet the present emergency.

Sums of staggering magnitude have been and will be provided and appropriated to be expended within certain general limitations, largely at the discretion of the President and his immediate advisers. Legislation has been enacted and has been proposed and will be enacted conferring extraordinary and unusual authority on the Executive and the executive departments. Every doubt has been and undoubtedly will be resolved in favor of granting during the emergency the extraordinary powers asked by the executive departments, instead of, as in time of peace, resolving those doubts in favor of withholding or limiting those powers.

CONGRESS SHOULD PERFORM ITS DUTY.

While this has been and undoubtedly will continue to be the attitude of the Congress toward the executive branch of the Government, as it should be in the case of war and emergency, it does not, at least it should not, follow that Congress or its Members should cease to have opinions or express them, should cease to present what they conceive to be the view and attitude of a majority of the people they represent or abdicate their function as a coordinate branch of the Government, elected by and directly responsible to the people. That the entire Congress as the people's representatives is enlisted for the successful and energetic prosecution of the war, upon which many reluctantly entered, has been abundantly proven by votes in this Chamber since the state of war was declared.

It will, however, be a sad day for the Republic should the Representatives in both or either branch of Congress, or a majority of them, become the mere tools and instruments for the recording, validation, and confirmation of every proposal, purpose, or whim of the executive departments of the Government. If there were any who purposed to assume such an attitude on the theory that it was the easiest way, the one least liable to subject them to criticism, they ought in good conscience resign and make way for some one having reasonably the courage of their convictions. I hope there are none such. It is better for the country that a Member of Congress should occasionally be honestly wrong or mistaken than that he should be everlastingly trimming his sails to every fitful breeze that blows, though by so doing he may better weather the squall and by mere accident be occasionally right. [Applause.]

SCOPE OF THE BILL.

Mr. Chairman, these observations have, in my opinion, a very pertinent application to some features of the measures before us. This bill is intended, as declared by its title, "To authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States" and not, as many people seem to have erroneously supposed, to provide a permanent system of military training or service. Many of the questions, therefore, relative to military training and service which have been widely discussed and which the passing and the outcome of the present emergency may suggest or demonstrate as the proper and necessary plan and policy of national defense are not before us for settlement.

Fortunately in this, as in other matters of legislation which have been presented to us since the declaration of war, and as I hope and believe will be the case in the future during this national emergency, we are largely and in the main in agreement. That all who enjoy the blessings of citizenship and residence in the Republic owe obedience to its laws at all times and especial circumspection of conduct in times of stress or emergency is axiomatic. That all males of suitable age and physically fit owe the Nation military service, and should cheerfully and enthusiastically render the same when needed or when called upon by competent authority is a fundamental and essential principle of our national life. That Congress has the power and authority to declare how, when, under what conditions and circumstances, to what extent, and with what exceptions this service shall be called for or demanded, either in preparation for or in actual participation in the national defense and the maintenance of the national honor, few will attempt to and none can reasonably, logically, or successfully deny.

AGREEMENT ON MOST PROVISIONS.

Being thus agreed on fundamentals underlying the proposition of this legislation we are also in agreement on most of its essential features. There are no serious differences of opinion, no differences that can not be adjusted without serious difficulty relative to the Regular Military Establishment or the National Guard heretofore authorized, particularly since the War Department has recently reversed its former decision as to the authority for the organization of new National Guard units.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman has once or twice referred in terms of criticism to the opinion of the War Department toward the National Guard. Is it not a fact that the authorization of the new unit of the National Guard rests with the State, and after the States have accepted a unit in the National Guard it then becomes incumbent on the Federal Government to accept the unit and furnish it with supplies called for by the military act?

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad the gentleman has referred to the attitude of the War Department toward volunteer organizations.

Mr. BORLAND. We have been through it repeatedly.

Mr. MONDELL. My understanding of the matter is this, that with exceeding reluctance and only under pressure the War Department has admitted that the national defense act authorizes new units of the National Guard, but up to this very hour the War Department has not called for new units and has not received those which have been offered. I understand that 20 States now stand ready to offer new units of the National Guard, which the War Department has made no effort or motion to equip or receive. [Applause.]

I will say further that it is my conviction, based on careful inquiry, that every influence of the Regular Military Establishment of this Government for the last two years and up to this time has been to discredit and discourage voluntary enlistment; that from the time we first began to send the National Guard to the border to this hour the Regular Establishment has opposed voluntary enlistments and done much to discredit and discourage the National Guard and all who have to do with voluntary service in the armies of the Nation. [Applause.] I want to absolve the President of the United States from any participation in or any sympathy with that attitude of the War Department. It is the attitude of the military mind, seeking to form a military instrument which they believe is best suited to their purpose, without regard to the views or opinions or feelings of the people who furnish the soldiers, the people whom you and I represent. [Applause.]

I am glad this question of the attitude of the military authorities toward volunteering has been raised, for it affords an opportunity to refer to a feature of the situation which is exceedingly interesting. Gentlemen who are supporting the War Department bill, in the very same breath in which they say volunteering is out of date, is a failure, ought not to be tried because it is haphazard, unscientific, takes the brave and leaves the slacker, will tell you that, anyway, the authorized increases of the Regular Establishment and the authorized National Guard will afford places for over 700,000 men, and that this will furnish all the opportunity necessary for volunteering.

If volunteering has all the faults they ascribe to it, if its effects are so unfortunate as they paint them, if it is such a failure as they would have us believe, why do not they have the courage of their convictions and apply their misnamed "selective" conscription to these services? Why continue, to the tune of three-quarters of a million of men, a system they insist is unfair, inequitable, and a failure at that. The fact is, as they know, your real volunteer does not take kindly to the Regular Army. It savors too much of professional soldiering to suit the citizen soldier. He likes to serve with men from his own locality, the boys he has been raised with. The Regular Army places him among strangers and in a strange organization.

As to the opportunities for volunteering in the National Guard are concerned, a persistent effort to discredit the guard and blunders in its management, for which the supply departments are largely responsible, have tended to make that service less attractive than it would otherwise be. Nevertheless, the guard regiments are being filled. As to the new units of the guard, which the War Department has at last reluctantly admitted are authorized by law, no encouragement has been given to raise them, or assurance that they will be equipped if raised, so that this alleged opportunity for volunteer enlistment is, to a large extent, a myth, and will continue to be unless the War Department radically changes its attitude. The fact is, however, that, in spite of these conditions of discouragement rather than encouragement, 30 thousand men have joined the Regular Army in about half that many days, besides the naval recruits and the filling of the National Guard units in the States.

POINTS OF DIFFERENCE.

The differences so far as they exist among us relate, in the main, to the new and additional forces which the President is specifically authorized by this bill to organize and equip. Even as to these forces and the procedure proposed in the provisions of the bill providing for them we are largely in agreement. We are agreed as to the size of this force. It is to consist of a half a million men in the first unit, and an additional half million, in the discretion of the President, and in addition such recruit-training units as the President may deem necessary for the maintenance of such forces at maximum strength. We are agreed that there shall be registration of all persons liable to military service within the ages that may be agreed upon and as to the manner of that registration.

Now, as to our differences. The bill before us reported by the Military Committee of the House provides for the registration of all male citizens, or males who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 40, inclusive. The proposal of the minority based on the recommendation of the War Department, approved as I understand it, reluctantly I hope, by the President, is to enroll only those between the ages of 19 and 25, inclusive. I understand that the Secretary of War has estimated the duration of this period of enrollment and registration at three months, which is probably the minimum time that would be required, after which, as proposed by the department bill, there is to be a draft or conscription by selection of a sufficient number of those registered to make up the authorized forces.

The bill before us, however, provides that these forces may be raised at once by volunteers between the ages of 18 and 40, or "upon the completion of the enrollment provided in this act, and in the event the President decides that such additional force or forces shall not have been effectively raised under the call for volunteers" the President may raise the additional and necessary forces by draft under the enrollment of men between the ages of 21 and 40, which the bill authorizes.

It will be seen that the important and essential differences between the bill before us and the recommendation of the War Department, approved by the President, are two in number: First, the scope of enrollment; second, whether there shall be a trial of volunteering. There has been much said of late as to the duty and liability of military service. That such duty and liability is at one and the same time one of the highest privileges and greatest responsibilities of a citizen of a free country there can be little difference of opinion; and in the case of the country's dire need the duty and responsibility begins with the dawning of manhood and only ceases with the coming of the infirmities of old age. Such duty should, however, never be imposed as an unnecessary burden in peace, and only as the welfare of the Nation may require, or in war, except to the extent that the maintenance of the independence or the liberties of the people may demand and the honor of the Nation and the protection of its citizens may require.

LIABILITY NOT CONFINED TO ONE CLASS.

When the need comes and the call is made, whether for volunteers or, if need be, conscripts, it should afford the opportunity and lay the duty upon all of sound and mature manhood, and never under any circumstances upon one class or those who happen to be of a certain limited range of age,

Why should volunteers, or even conscripts, exclude all above 25 years of age? By what perversion of the theory of universal liability and duty does the War Department propose to conscript boys of 19 and drag them from their homes and absolve men of 26 and upward from all obligations of service?

Assuming, for the sake of argument, that there should be a draft and that the first draft should include only those between 19 and 25, what possible excuse can there be, when we are going forth to enroll the Nation for military service, for not enrolling all of the mature, active, and efficient ages between 21 and 40? Is it the purpose of those supporting the bill approved by the military authorities to serve notice on the country that the burden of this war, of the fighting and the dying, is all to be borne, so far as the new forces are concerned, by the boys and young men of 19 to 25, and thus secure support for their plan of all men above 25? If that is not their purpose, why do they insist on enrolling at the beginning of a war that may require millions of men only the boys under age and a few years beyond? If I believed conscription necessary at this moment, I would resign my place on this floor and go home to my people before I would vote to conscript and take from their mothers and their families boys of 19 years of age, and yet this is what we are asked to do.

It is true gentlemen will say that is not in the bill now and that they are not standing for it. At the same time they are standing before the country pretending that they are upholding the War Department and the President. Upon nothing did the War Department insist more strenuously than upon the plan that was to lay the whole burden of this mighty conflict in its inception on boys and men 19 to 25 years of age. Under their plan all above 25, good citizens and slackers alike, would be able to lay the soothing unction to their souls that the Congress of the United States had absolved them from all obligation to serve their country in this great conflict, and that is what the gentlemen call providing for universal service. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman is an experienced legislator, and I would like to have his construction of one portion of this bill. In the bill before the House, which is the same for the majority and the minority side, providing for conscription between the ages of 21 and 40, there is provision that the draft shall be made under regulations made by the department. I would like to know whether the gentleman's construction is that the department can group the persons between 21 and 40 into classes and draw exclusively from any one of those classes?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, before I answer the gentleman's question, if he will allow me, I would suggest that if the minority, the gentlemen who want to leave it all to the War Department, and say they are following the President, have come to accept the enrollment ages of 21 to 40, which the committee has placed in the bill instead of the ages of 19 to 25, for which the department contended, it is proof that they have learned something since this debate began, and that even they are no longer following the department's view.

Now, answering the gentleman's question, I would say that under the terms of the bill the department might group the enrolled men according to ages and draw their conscripts from a certain group. In fact, that is what the General Staff seem to have had in mind for in the New York American of the 17th of this month John Temple Graves, a well-known writer, who stands well with the departments of this Government, on the front page of that paper, in a signed article, says that he was informed by General Staff officers that it was their purpose to conscript the entire first unit of 500,000 from boys under 20 years of age. That would take about all the able-bodied boys of that age in the country. What a beautiful demonstration of democracy and universal service that would be. Whether John Temple Graves had authority for that statement so set forth in a great newspaper under his name I do not know, but my opinion is that he echoed exactly the sentiments of the War Department; that they proposed and intended to conscript 500,000 boys from the high schools and colleges and homes of the country, leaving the balance of the population, with regard to military obligations that these gentlemen prate so loudly about, entirely free to continue their present safe and gainful occupations.

VOLUNTEERING VERSUS CONSCRIPTION.

The bill before us proposes to begin volunteering at once, meanwhile enrolling for service and for conscription if it should become necessary all men between the ages of 21 and 40. In the three or four months before enrollment is complete and the first men could be secured under conscription, we would undoubtedly obtain a goodly number of volunteers. We certainly would unless those of us who believed it our duty in accordance with the recommendation of the President to take up the gage of battle Germany has thrown down were mistaken in the attitude of the American people toward the incidents and acts which we believed made war inevitable. At any rate, whatever number of volunteers were secured would be that much gained in time and opportunity for training and preparation, and if volunteering continued as rapidly as we could provide for training, furnish arms and uniforms, there would be no necessity for conscription.

If at any time under the terms of this bill the President decides that the forces provided for can not be effectively raised and maintained under the call for volunteers he may resort to the draft, and he will then have enrolled for the purposes of that draft not three and one-half or four million available boys under age and men under 25, 1 at least out of every 3 or 4 of whom he would be compelled to conscript, but twenty to twenty-five million of mature men between the ages of 21 and 40 only 1 in 20 of whom need be called to the colors. If a draft should become necessary and conscription is wise and proper, as some contend, how much fairer, how much more reasonable, how much better from every viewpoint would be a conscription selecting 1 out of 20 in the first instance from the entire body of our efficient manhood than 1 out of every 3 or 4 of the boys and the very young men.

HOW WE HAVE VIEWED IT IN THE PAST.

But I can not refrain from a very few observations relative to conscription. I may be old fashioned; no doubt I am; at any rate I can not forget nor can I bring myself to wholly discredit the teachings and exhortations of the scholars, statesmen, and orators of all our history even amid the necessary and inevitable excitement and hysteria of a world war. I can not forget that it has been our boast and glory in the past that volunteers gained the independence of the Republic, maintained its rights against the encroachments of the mistress of the seas, won for us the great southwest, and in the most awful struggle of history prior to the present war saved and cemented the Union. [Applause.]

A long line of statesmen, scholars, and orators have testified to the value, enlarged upon the glory, and extolled the triumphs and virtues of volunteer service, and on printed page in legislative hall, from stump and platform have dwelt with pride and spoken with enthusiasm upon our blessed freedom from the exactions, the burdens, the interferences, the restraints and the annoyances which are the inevitable accompaniment of the most reasonably and considerately administered system of conscription.

I have not time to even refer to the mass of sophistries, to the perfect flood of crooked and inverted logic which has been deluged on the country in an effort to convince people that the thing which we have always abhored and which at any time or under any conditions is at best an unfortunate necessity to be borne with fortitude because of its necessity is in a fact a great and glorious blessing. Conscription may be an unfortunate necessity before this war is over. Let us therefore prepare a broad rather than a narrow foundation for that contingency, but let us not endeavor to delude ourselves into the belief that compulsory military service is in itself a blessing.

IS PRUSSIA DEMOCRATIC?

Conscription has been widely heralded as being democratic. If it is, Germany and Austria are the most democratic countries on the earth, and Prussia is the one perfect and unrivaled fruit and flower of democracy, for Prussia was not only the mother of modern conscription, but she has developed and practiced it more completely and continuously than any nation on earth. Her universal service under conscription and the all-powerful military system and overbearing military caste which the system created was the natural, inevitable, and direct cause of the war, which, having devastated all Europe and a considerable part of Asia, has brought the new world within the circle of its devouring flame.

I am not surprised that men high in military rank, professional soldiers, have indorsed conscription, nor do I blame them for doing so from the purely military view. To one who desires a destructive instrument of gigantic power, instantly available when fully organized for any purpose for which its master wills to use it, there is nothing that compares to a nation enrolled, trained, and accustomed to universal conscript service. Every tyrant and usurper, every professional conqueror, every despoiler of the liberties of the people since time began, from the days of Belshazzar along the bloody trail traveled by the hordes of Gengis Khan to William Hohenzollern, has been a conscriptor and a firm believer in the virtues and efficiency of universal and selective conscription.

And yet I would not speak too harshly of conscription, for even democracies have sometimes, when their resources were drained to the limit, been compelled to resort to it, as we did in the latter part of the Civil War, with much rioting and meager results.

VOLUNTEERING NOT A FAILURE.

It is loudly proclaimed, with little regard for the facts of history, that volunteering has been a failure. That is no nearer the truth than it would be to say that democracy has been a failure because autocracy and absolutism in Germany have proven wonderfully efficient. Under volunteering we raised all but 61,000 of the millions of men who fought in the Civil War. Under volunteer enlistment England raised, equipped, and trained, after the war began, more than 5,000,000 men—all of her troops who fought the victorious battle of the Marne and the great majority of those who are now fighting so valiantly and successfully in France and Flanders. To-day these English-speaking volunteers—Scotch, Welsh, Irish, English—are beating back the conscript soldiers of the Kaiser. [Applause.] Under a volunteer system Canada, with one-tenth our population, has raised and sent overseas nearly half as many men as we propose under this bill to give the President authority to enroll.

If you ask me, "What is the surest and most effective weapon or instrument for a tyrant, an autocrat, a usurper," I shall say unhesitatingly, "A force conscripted under universal service." If the question be as to the best kind of an army to fight the battles of a free people, I adhere to the opinion that it is a universally trained citizenship serving freely and voluntarily.

WHAT IS SELECTIVE CONSCRIPTION?

Conscription did not lose the ugly significance that has always attached to it until some master craftsman of sophistry coined the magic term "selective conscription," when, presto, change, the miracle was wrought and conscription passed from things abhorred to the category of things approved and embraced. [Applause.]

For selective conscription until actually applied is anything and everything you desire it to be. You may picture it the instrument of omnipotence, omniscience, and infinite disinterestedness and fairness, selecting those best suited, best qualified, and best equipped to serve. Your fancy may conjure a picture in which unanimous approval of those who go and those who remain shall wait upon the outcome. Your interest, your partiality, or your affection may present to you a selection which leaves safely at home those whose services at home are valuable to you, those whose shrinking from hard service you sympathize with or those you love. But unfortunately we shall not have the service of infinite wisdom or virtue, for our instruments of selection will be human, and at the best we could not hope to be free from faults of judgment, from prejudice, from favoritism, or even more serious faults or frailties. In any event, if the selection is to be from the comparatively limited number proposed to be enrolled under the War Department's plan, one in three of all those enrolled must go, however the selection be made.

We have not yet been enlightened as to the details of the proposed selections. The War Department tells us they have not worked them out, but a wide discretion in exemptions is allowed.

The bill authorizes the exemption from conscription or draft of customhouse clerks, persons employed in the transmission of the mails, workmen in armories, arsenals, and navy yards, all in the service of the United States, whom the President may designate, American seamen, and finally and all-embracing "persons engaged in industries found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces during the emergency." If all these are exempted from this selective draft, who is to go?

High-school and college youths, clerks, youths who have not yet demonstrated that they are invaluable in some particular enterprise or occupation. Under such a plan in some communities and some occupations, pursuits, and enterprises all must be selected, or practically so, and in other communities, other occupations, other pursuits, few or none will be called or chosen. All this is proposed, as I understand it, on the theory of democracy and universal liability to service.

It is insisted that volunteering is unfair, inequitable, unjust, in that under it the brave, the impulsive, the ardent, the enterprising, the venturesome, the conscientious, the patriotic serve and suffer while the cowardly, the indifferent, the selfish, the unpatriotic, the whole brood of slackers remain safely and securely at home. This is all true and regrettable; but how much will it be cured by selective conscription, under which the slacker in every form and guise will fairly smother the enrolling board with oaths and affidavits as to their unfitness or their disabilities on the one hand, or the indispensable character of their services to some essential industry of production, manufacture, or transportation on the other. On the other hand, those who are of the material of which volunteers are made, if their spirits are not crushed and their enthusiasm dampened or extinguished by the thought of conscription, will employ every argument and use every artifice to secure their acceptance. Which of these, think you, will, in the main, find their names on the muster roll? How many of a class of enthusiastic, patriotic college boys would seek to or would escape the draft? How many among the enrolled trapper boys or young miners or young farmer or village boys from my State would fail of enrollment among the conscripts? You say they would go, anyway, if they had a chance, and gladly; and so they would, many of them, and I want to give them a chance as volunteers and not as conscripts. [Applause.]

TO SUM IT UP.

In conclusion, let us sum up and see wherein our differences lie. You want an enrollment as the basis of conscription. We are with you for such an enrollment in order that we may know our resources of men and in order that we may draw on them as may be necessary. You desire to have that enrollment narrow, limited, confined to youths and men in their earliest manhood. We would begin our enrollment with men of legal age and full maturity and embrace within it all vigorous manhood up to 40. You would draft and draft only from your restricted class and absolve the bulk of the male population from all obligation of service. We would call on all of military age who desired to serve and receive them as honored volunteers into their country's service. Your plan may have the approval of the military mind. It may even have the recent and grudging approval of the President, burdened as he is with innumerable problems and surrounded as he must be at a time like this with men taking the purely professional military view of matters, but our plan has, or will have when fully understood, the approval of the hearts and consciences of the great body of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HEINTZ].

Mr. HEINTZ. Mr. Chairman, I have attentively listened, and have endeavored to follow, with no little difficulty, the reasoning of the majority. They start with saying that conscription is wrong, undemocratic, and wholly unjustifiable. They say they will not surrender to the request of the Secretary of War and of the General Staff their constitutional duty as representatives of the people to combat to the last this "autocratic" war measure. They refuse to grant to the Army the right to advise in any degree in this emergency. They say that the volunteer system of raising an army must be maintained, because it is of the very foundation on which our Nation is built.

And yet, in section 1, paragraph 3, you expressly give the President the right to exercise the draft—later on. You deny him the right under the circumstances as they exist to-day. You say it is your constitutional and patriotic duty to stand firmly against his request. And in the same breath you express a willingness to completely surrender the duty to the President, to be exercised by him a month or two months or three months atfer this bill is signed, and that under circumstances that may be exactly the same as those existing to-day, under the rules and conditions to be prescribed by the President, and he need not then even so much as consult you.

How do you explain the readiness to abandon this constitutional duty? Can what is autocratic and subversive of democracy to-day become democratic and American through the lapse of a few days? What is asked of you now you deny, but you are willing to grant to another the right to exercise the power hereafter, under circumstances which you can not foresee and over which you can have no control. Do you contend that what is fundamentally autocratic now will be fundamentally democratic then, or is it a plain case of what, in the language of the street, is called "passing the buck" and placing the responsibility of the final decision on the President?

Long before the opening of this special session of Congress I advocated a plan of raising an army, somewhat similar to the plan contained in the majority report. Even then I had not much faith in our ability to get an army by a call for volunteers, and I was always sensible to the fact that such plan was undemocratic, inefficient, wasteful, and wholly unjust.

But two considerations caused me to advocate a call for volunteers for a sufficiently long period before putting conscription into effect, and they were, first, to give due consideration to the convictions of the large number of sincere citizens who are eager for a volunteer army, and to prove to them conclusively, once and for all, the utter impracticability of such plan; and second, to give to the large number of able-bodied citizens between 25 and 40 years of age, who have shouted loudest for preparedness and for "universal" training, and indeed for war itself, an opportunity to prove their patriotism by action as well as by high-sounding words, and to demonstrate their readiness to make personal physical sacrifice for the cause which they have so vociferously espoused.

But I have seen sufficient of the failure of the volunteer plan not to be willing to sacrifice time, nor to deviate from a firm conviction, in order only to further demonstrate its absolute futility. I saw its failure at the time of the call for Mexico last June. At that time those who were recruiting and those who were urged to enlist universally thought that the mission was to be real warfare in Mexico and not border duty only. Not only did the average citizen of military age refuse to enlist last June, but many who were above 25 and under 40, who had boasted of their military efficiency and who had received a certain amount of training at a considerable expense to the Government in money and in effort, gave deaf ear to the call.

In commenting upon those men from the Plattsburg training camps, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], on the floor of the Senate on April 11, 1917, said—I quote from page 432 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> I understand that this kind of military training is very effective. Now, why not make these men one of the military assets? The only way we can do it is by having some form, some measure, of enlistment. That has been proved by the fact that when we were asking for men to go into the Army in Mexico it is said that probably less than half a dozen out of the 30,000, or maybe more than 30,000, trained went from the Plattsburg camp. Now, my idea is that when we spend this money, especially as it is the law, we ought to uphold the law and ought to uphold the best interests of our country by having some measure of enlistment so that we can take advantage of it now that we need them

In my own vicinity there are about 140 graduates of these military training camps. Last June, when my home regiment was expecting to be sent to Mexico, I communicated with each of these cadets, most of whom are between the ages of 25 and 40, calling his attention to his duty to join the colors at once. I told them then that the time for words had passed, that the President had called for their services, and that it had come to the show-down. Only four out of the entire number responded, and these offered excuses for not joining the colors.

In the last two weeks I again addressed these young men, asking each one if he would enlist in case the volunteer plan of raising an army was decided upon, and of those who deigned to answer all replied in the negative except four. Do not lose sight of the fact that these are men of standing in their community, enjoying more than average incomes, physically capable, and who, when not talking about their own military training, were talking about preparedness generally. In fact, between talking privately and publically they were talking about all the time. I have no desire to bring contumely upon the heads of these young men who must, at least, be free of any abnormal craving for personal action, but I do purpose to state in no unmistakable language the present condition and the present state of mind of no small part of our people. If anything more were needed to prove the utter folly of wasting more time seeking volunteers, I might add that the condition just indicated is equally as prevalent among the general citizenship between the ages of 25 and 40—I do not know about the boys under 25, as they appear not to have been consulted—as it is among the representative young men just referred to, only among the more silent citizens it does not stand out so conspiciously.

Before passing, I wish to place in the RECORD the names of the four patriotic young men that stand out with such exceptional luster. Arthur Meyer, of Sayler Park; Russell Rankin, of Cincinnati; Charles Howe, of Covington; and Herbert Weil, of Cincinnati. And it may not be amiss to observe that one-half of the names are of Germanic origin.

I ask of those who advocate calling for volunteers, Whom do you expect to volunteer? I have yet to hear one of them say that he himself will be the first to offer his services. This conflict is not a war for the vindication of national rights and honor solely. We have been attacked and, at its foundation, it is a struggle for the home and family of every one of us. Are you who are asking for volunteers going to volunteer yourself, or are you simply asking some one else to volunteer to fight the battle for you and those who have the right to your protection?

Every hour that we devote to the endeavor of raising a volunteer army just that much longer is our country to remain standing still and uncommitted to any fixed plan, exposed and helpless. We are at war, and war to me means, and always has meant, not merely the passing of resolutions and making of speeches, but actual physical fighting, and we can not fight without men and equipment and hard training. The month that might mean victory or downfall when the time comes for the supreme effort may be in process of being lost at this very moment.

The service which I favor is a truly universal service. Not one that is "universal" for the other fellow and "exclusive" of one's self. If it is to be a burden and a hardship, why should it be saddled entirely upon the boys of tender years, especially when they have not been taken into our counsel and in no manner consulted as to their wishes? If, on the contrary, military service is to be a great benefit to its recipients, as is often stated by those between 25 and 40, why not make a more democratic distribution of it, as most men over 25 will no doubt be found to be more lacking and more needful of disciplinary training than those under that age?

I entirely agree that industrial preparation and industrial service are just as important as military endeavor, but it should be made universal in all departments of preparation and service and required of all men of military or industrial availability, whether their ages be 20, 25, 35, 40, or, indeed, 45. They all should be included within the provision of the conscription act, and the properly designated authorities should decide of their availability and in what branch of the service they can be of the greatest help. The wealthy flaneur and idler between 25 and 45 should be placed as firmly within the hold of the law as the shiftless loafer of the same age, and as well as the industrious student or artisan of youthful years. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to vote against the volunteer provision of this bill, much as I dislike to oppose the recommendations of the majority of the Military Committee. I have the utmost confidence in the high purpose of these gentlemen and appreciate greatly the courage and patriotism they have shown in defending this provision in their bill, even in the face of the opposition of the metropolitan press that has fallen into the habit lately of impugning the motive of Members of Congress who follow their own convictions.

I will support the President in this matter because I am convinced beyond a shadow of doubt that the volunteer system is not only absolutely unjust, unbusinesslike and immoral, but in addition thereto would prove a dismal failure in the end. I would support the President in his plans as Commander in Chief of the Army, even though I had some doubt of the wisdom of some features of the bill for the reason that good business practice has proven that the chief in command should not have his plans weakened by being forced to accept compromises that in his judgment would make success doubtful. The President has been chosen by the people as their Commander in Chief. The people through their representatives have declared war. The President is in command and is responsible for his own acts to the people. My view is that so far as his military operations are concerned he should have full swing. To give the President what he thinks he needs, to do what we have by law directed him to do, is in my judgment sound business sense.

I am not of those who shout "stand up for the President" in times of peace and thereby abrogate the power of the people to speak through their representatives, but in time of war the man the people choose to command should be supported in matters he deems necessary to the success of the enterprise we have engaged upon. Aside from these sound reasons for supporting the President's war measures, I offer other arguments that seem to me unanswerable against the volunteer system, which is the bone of contention in the committee bill before this House, among which are the following:

First, the obligation of citizenship bears upon all alike. The universal liability of citizens to taxes for the support of the Government has been used by gentlemen in this debate to prove the equal liability of the citizen to military service. The analogy is perfectly proper and unanswerable, and I have heard no supporter of the volunteer system attempt to answer this argument. No matter what our practices in applying this principle in raising armies have been in the past, no one disputes that this obligation is universal. We recognize it generally in levying burdens on our citizens for the support of the Government. In times of peace the material burden of government consists largely of a tax in some form or another for raising revenues. This tax rate is always uniform upon a class of citizens or a kind of business and is never left to chance or the whims of patriotism of the citizen. It is an obligation the citizen owes, and the tax is a levy against him. He is not asked to volunteer his taxes. If he were asked to adopt such a volunteer system for tax purposes, and the life of the Government had to depend to-day on such an asinine system for raising the seven billions of dollars we have appropriated for war expenditures, I fear we would be utterly lost under such a plan. One only needs to apply the volunteer system to the revenue proposition to fully appreciate its weakness and danger to the Government if actually put into practice. Therefore, if it is unfair to the people and a weakness to the Government to be dependent upon volunteers for a mere material support, how are we to justify a demand that the real patriots of the country volunteer a blood offering for its defense. To me the proposition of volunteers can not possibly be sustained on the ground of fairness and common decency.

The second reason for rejecting the volunteer system is it is not patriotic and has proven a national disgrace in actual practice in the case of the Civil War. In that great struggle for national unity we enlisted a total of slightly over two and three-quarters millions of men. Of this number 51 per cent, or about one and one-third millions, were boys from 10 to 19 years of age and only—mark the number—about 300,000 who had reached mature years of 22 and over. That is what the volunteer system brought us in a time of great stress. It was a national disgrace to rob the schools to get the boys to save the life of the country. Only about 300,000 men above the age of 22 could be found—and many of them had to be drafted—who loved their country well enough to fight for it; that is, before they sacrificed their sons first.

My distinguished colleague, Mr. SHALLENBERGER, in a splendid oratorical effort yesterday soared around the mountain slopes of the Alps paying high tribute to that splendid people who have maintained the standard of liberty there for a thousand years, leaving the inference that these people were free because of the volunteer system. As a matter of fact they are free for the opposite reason. These people no doubt owe their national existence to-day to the fact that under a system of universal service a Swiss Army of nearly a half million was mobilized on the borders of that little republic within 48 hours after the great war broke out. The Swiss did not rob the schools of the boys to make this army either. It was an army of brave and mature men that did not skulk behind a volunteer system. Picture this volunteer system at work in all its alleged glory during the dark days of the Civil War. You can see the recruiting stands in every city and village in the land. At first they had only a fife and drum to call attention of the needs of the country for men. The flag was floating and the martial music attracted the boys. A colored picture of valiant men in battle was pasted on the wall back of the recruiting officer. The farm boys left their teams at the hitching racks and joined the Army. The school boys in their first long pants left their classes, the boys in the shops and stores responded to the call until a mighty host of over 1,000,000 responded with the enthusiasm of youth, without counting the cost, to their country's need. The recruiting officer winked when they lied about their ages so as to be old enough to come under the requirements. There was an age limit during the Civil War, but under the volunteer system a small matter of age limit did not trouble the local captain who must have his company recruited to full strength. They had a natural right to be allowed to grow up to be equipped for life with an education before being sent into a long and bloody war.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman care to yield there?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. BORLAND. As I understand it so frequent was the habit of young men overstating their age in order to enlist during the Civil War that the Pension Department will not even accept the enlistment age as prima facie evidence of a man's age when he enlisted.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I think that is true.

I repeat, it was a national disgrace and ought to bring the blush of shame to every true American to know that his country actually robbed the schools to get an army to fight for able-bodied men who stayed at home. That is the volunteer system in all of its alleged glory as it worked out in practice.

By and by the fife and drum were not sufficient to get men for recruiting the wasted ranks of the boys sent to the front. The boys were all gone except those that were growing up to the volunteering age, so a band had to be hired and public meetings had to be held to urge men to enlist. The slackers had to be snubbed by their friends, questioned in church, and insulted in public places to remind them of the universal obligation of citizenship. A leading citizen had to get on a dry-goods box in front of the recruiting office and make a plea for men to join the colors. The slackers avoided these places as they would a pestilence, but the honest, patriotic boys were caught like flies in a trap as fast as they got into long pants.

But the tug of war came on when the last call resulted in the draft. The men who had resisted snubs and insults because they would not volunteer now came face to face with a draft to go. They and their unpatriotic friends in certain localities resisted the draft, and riots occurred, but finally enough were drafted of mature men to raise the total of men over 22 in that great army of nearly 3,000,000 up to about 300,000. It is one of the most disgraceful spectacles that is afforded in American history, and I sincerely hope that we will not again make such a sacrifice of our schoolboys and our own self-respect by adopting the system of volunteering that has so signally humiliated us.

THE DRAFT RIOTS AN ARGUMENT FOR DRAFT.

The draft riots brought about by the slackers and their friends is offered as an argument against selective draft. Who was it that objected to draft? Was it the patriotic army at the front or their families at home? Not at all. It was the contemptuous citizens and their followers at home who were so devoid of manhood and common decency or for other reasons that they were callous to the opinions of the community as to their duty to enlist, who caused the draft riots. They should have been thrown into prison and tried for their lives for treason against their country in resisting the draft.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. LOBECK. The reason why we had the draft at that time was because there were a number of people in the North who did not agree with Abraham Lincoln's policy.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I think that is true.

Mr. LOBECK. It was the Knights of the Golden Circle and the copperheads in the North who caused those riots.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. That is true.

Mr. LOBECK. The young men who were patriotic went, and so did the older men. Now, the statement the gentleman put in there does not agree with history at that time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. To offer the draft riots as an argument against the draft is to accept the standard of citizenship set by the most unpatriotic class of citizens and reject the standard of honor and citizenship set by the patriots who offered their services at their country's call, believing all able-bodied men needed would follow them. In the light of the facts of history no one can successfully contend that the draft should be rejected because a lot of disloyal slackers did not like the system. The men who did the fighting rejoiced that the Government finally had resorted to a method that would force the slacker into the ranks.

It is true the drafted man was in disgrace in the Army, and naturally so, because he had been driven in at the last hour. But that is no argument against the draft. Had the draft been ordered at the beginning of the war the boys would have been allowed to grow up and finish their school work. The men of the country would have accepted their share of the responsibility of citizenship as a matter of fact. The draft levy would have been accepted as just by the people, just as they accepted their tax levy. But to have to apply the draft the last year of the war was conclusive proof that it ought to have been applied at the very beginning. Then all the travail of the struggle for volunteers and the draft riots would have been avoided.

The third reason for rejecting the volunteer system is that it is impractical at this time because it is too slow. A great army is needed at once. It can not be even enlisted, in my judgment, under the volunteer system in a year, if at all, and then another year would be required in training it. One only needs to examine the experience of England, even in the face of imminent danger to the life of the nation, to see how burdensome is the work of clubbing men into volunteering. Clubbing is what it amounts to in effect, and besides that it requires an immense force of men and tremendous publicity to get together a volunteer army. There can be no advantage in the spirit of men who volunteer under such circumstances over those who are drafted, for the man himself, if he is forced by public sentiment to join the Army, feels no better about it than he would if drafted, just as the Government drafts his tax money. We are at war with Germany. The Congress has pledged all of its resources and all of its efforts to bring it to a successful conclusion. Now, do we propose to piddle along here a year to raise this army under the volunteer system and at the end of the year find we have again enlisted an army of immature boys? Or are we going to accept the selective draft system and secure an army ready to be trained within three or four months? The success of this war may depend upon the rapidity with which we create an effective army. Why go to war at all if we are not going to efficiently prosecute it?

The fourth reason for rejecting the volunteer system is that it is uneconomical. An army can be raised by selective draft in three or four months at a nominal cost, if war cost can ever be said to be nominal, while under the volunteer system millions on top of millions will be spent in one form or another in giving publicity to the need of the country for volunteers. This expense will string out over a long period of time, as is shown by the rate of enlistments at the present time, even in the heat of the war excitement, when the response is greater than it will be later, unless something happens at sea to stir the country to action. It will take so much money to drum up this volunteer army and consume so much time that we will furnish an example to the world of the inefficiency of democracy, and in the end might find our allies in this war crushed. Then, indeed, would we have to adopt a businesslike system that would get results. It might be too late to save us from great humiliation at the hands of an efficient enemy that might put us to the greatest possible effort to defend ourselves.

THE SELECTIVE DRAFT WILL CONSERVE PRODUCTION.

There is no doubt in my own mind that the selective draft will work the greatest possible advantage to the country. It recognizes the necessity of mobilizing our full strength in this war by conserving all the sources of production. The war is not fought alone by men on the firing line, but it is fought equally by all the industries that are furnishing the men on the firing line with arms, ammunition, and all the materials needed for waging war. The selective draft system will take into account the need of greater production of food and will not rob the farms and factories of men needed to feed and supply the men in arms. It will also recognize the need of dependent families and not rob them of the men to support them. In fact, the selective draft system contemplates leaving men undisturbed who are engaged in occupations that are directly serving the needs of the country. They are filling honorable places in the scheme of war. The men unattached who are not activily engaged in production and who have no dependents will naturally be called first to do their bit where they can best serve. It is a sensible and economic arrangement and is certain to be approved by the people as just and fair and calculated to put the Nation in the best possible state of defense.

NEED OF A FOOD SUPPLY.

The need of foodstuffs will be the greatest need of the country in this war and it will be the most difficult to supply. Therefore the selective draft will greatly encourage food productions by excluding men engaged in food production from the firing line. The farmers in the great grain belt of the country are so highly skilled that their place can not be taken by men who have not been trained in agriculture.

The selective draft properly applied will save the trained men on our farms for food production, while the volunteer system will produce the great bulk of enlistments from the farm. The urban and country population in my own district is about equal, but up to the present time the indications are that twice as many farm boys are enlisting as city boys. This ratio can reasonably be counted upon to prevail under the volunteer system, because it has been the experience of the Nation in the past. The great Army of the Civil War was made up very largely of farmers. There were no speculators, traders, and war traffickers among the farmers then and there are none now. They did not hang around the moving armies to make money or stay at home and enjoy the business prosperity caused by war. They shouldered muskets and fought for the country, generally, while tradesmen, generally, did not. Therefore I repeat that if the volunteer system prevails we will again witness an army of farm boys with enough city-bred men among them to leaven the loaf, and as a result the country will go hungry.

A great metropolitan newspaper made an inquiry among Members of Congress as to their attitude toward admitting Chinamen to this country to work our farms during this war, so as to insure a bountiful supply of foodstuffs. This inquiry is an indication of the sort of ignorance that prevails among city-bred men as to the sort of skill required by the farm hands on an average American farm in the grain belt. The average number of horses that is handled by one man on the farm in a team is from four to six, and to handle such a team successfully requires years of training. To place such a team in the hands of a Chinaman who probably never handled a horse in his life would be the height of stupidity. It is not only impossible for such a man to handle such a team, but it would be equally impossible for him to control the machine the team draws. The metropolitan editor who thinks he has struck upon a solution of our food trouble by employing Chinese is no more stupid than the man who thinks the boys from the city can be used successfully on the farms. There has been a suggestion that these city boys, too young to enlist, can be drafted and sent to the farms to take the place of the farmers who go to the war. The suggestion is another delusion. But even if it could be put into effect it would prove a failure. These boys might be used to open gates, slop the pigs, bring up the cows from the pasture, carry water to the men in the fields, but to contend that boys under military age who never handled a horse, or a machine, or a modern farm power tractor, could go onto the farm and handle such an outfit and take the place of skilled men is quite absurd. One only needs to venture onto a farm in the great food belt of the West and witness the magnitude of these operations to see how long it would take to train such boys to be farmers. If it takes trained Army officers a year to teach a body of recruits the goose step and make them fit to meet an enemy, it will take five years to teach a city-bred man, who has never had any farm training, to be a successful food producer.

Another example of the ignorance displayed by the metropolitan press is shown by the following excerpt from an editorial:

SEND LOAFERS TO THE FARMS.

The bread line and soup house in every large city can be reduced, if not entirely eliminated by rigorous legislation forcing able-bodied vagrants and slackers into the country to work on farms.

The strong arm of the State should be used to sweep these beggars out of the cities and into the ranks of farm hands. The rule for sturdy men should be the rule enforced by John Smith at the founding of Jamestown: "He that will not work shall not eat."

Could any suggestion be more stupid or more insulting to the farmers of America than this? Why send this scum of the earth to the farmers? Why not put them in banks, stores, and factories? The skill required to be a bank clerk, storekeeper, or a factory worker is not one whit greater than that required to be a farmer. It is a scurvy return to make the farmers of this country, whose boys are the first to enlist, to suggest sending to them to occupy the vacant chairs of their absent sons the floating derelicts of human society produced in the cities. To send such debased creatures to isolated farms, among the women and children left behind, to be besmirched by their presence in their homes, is as inhuman and brutal as the outrage of the Belgians by the German Army. That is the ethical side, and is sufficient; but the practical side is none the less asinine. These derelicts have never learned to work at all. They are droppings of the society of the great cities. They are as utterly unfit for the farm as would be a horde of savages from the African jungle.

The clamor of the press for greater food production is long and loud, but it is incapable of results. There will be no trouble about food production at present prices if the men are not taken from the farms. We can cry for greater production till we are blue in the face, and not an acre more crop will be planted. That is not the way to get the acreage planted. Robbing the farms of trained farmers will not do it. The way is perfectly clear to me. If the farmer boys are chosen by selective draft, give them an honorable discharge and leave them on their farms. They will do their full part if they will feed the men we have on the firing line. It is just as patriotic to produce the things that make it possible for an army to exist as it is to fight in the ranks. One is absolutely dependent on the other. This argument is true also of every industry in the country that requires skilled men. Labor in shops and factories is infinitely more difficult to obtain than are men for the firing line. To take such men who are needed to produce supplies for the army in the form of ammunition and clothing and leave untrained men idle would show how incompetent we are and how unfit to manage the people's business with economy and dispatch.

Oh, but it is claimed that it is not fair to let the skilled, high-salaried man in the shop escape the dangers of the firing line and make the unskilled do the fighting. The answer to that argument is that there is more theory than fact in it. Some industries have almost as great a casualty list as did most of the wars we have fought in the past. A railroad locomotive brotherhood insurance company, for example, shows a casualty list much greater than any war we have ever waged in the past, and probably greater than that of any war we will ever have, even in these days of destructiveness. Men lose their lives in great numbers in every industry and tens of thousands are injured annually. The difference in the danger to life and limb between the two services—war and industries—whatever it may be, is compensated for by the honor, experience, and opportunity for advancement that comes to the soldier who takes the greater risk to life and limb.

It was currently reported around the Capitol that a survey was made by the police department of the available men suitable for the Army service on a single street in this city, and that it disclosed 1,400 young men without employment and who can generally be found in moving-picture shows each afternoon. I have no doubt that such a state of affairs exists, judging from my own observations. It not only exists here but probably in every city in this land. Is there anyone who believes that the welfare of this Nation will be best served by leaving this large mass of idlers, mere barnacles on society, to occupy space and consume food they do not earn, while we rob the farms, shops, and channels of commerce of skilled labor to fill up the Army with which to wage this war and thereby make futile our efforts to sustain ourselves? I have received many letters from the great States of New York and Massachusetts urging that these idlers and slackers be saved from draft. I receive these appeals with the same respect that I would receive an appeal from a man who wanted to go into the business of robbery and therefore did not want any laws passed to hamper that business.

Robbing is no more dishonorable than dodging one's duty to his country in time of war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield me two minutes more?

Mr. KAHN. I yield two minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. War while it lasts is the biggest and most complex business in which man ever engages. A country goes to war for the purpose of maintaining its honor, its rights, and its very existence as a free people. Therefore the stake is so great all civil laws may be suspended when necessary during the war. The military becomes supreme for the sake of concerted action. To successfully conduct a war every industry that man is engaged in must be drawn upon to produce for the great enterprise. To talk about volunteers in such an enterprise is to talk about failure, bankruptcy, and despair. There should be no principle of volunteering recognized anywhere in time of war. It is no time to talk about individual liberty of action. War is tyranny temporarily submitted to for the sake of ultimate liberty after the struggle ends and the common enemy is subdued. To insist upon individual liberty of action in war is to lose liberty after the war by being subdued by the enemy. Every resource in men and materials should be subject to draft for the common good and to talk of depending upon volunteers when the life of the Nation is at stake is to advocate surrender to the enemy if volunteers do not respond. I would not raise a single soldier through volunteers in any arm of the service. I would raise men to serve in the Army exactly as we raise the tax money to support the Army. It is the only businesslike way to sustain the dignity and independence of the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. DENT] a question?

Mr. DENT. Certainly.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I have understood here this afternoon that the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, the great Speaker of this House, is to speak on this measure. I have some friends who are in the city who are very desirous of hearing this great citizen of the Republic speak. Can I ask the gentleman from Alabama if this is correct, and if it is correct, at about what time will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] speak?

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman from Iowa that the Speaker of this House does intend to address the committee on this subject, and that I have reached an agreement with him that, as well as I could, I would yield to him at about 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, after two days of able debate it seems useless to attempt further enlightenment upon the question of a volunteer system versus conscription. There is no terror in the word conscription. It means compulsory registration and universal liability to serve one's country.

I would like to see the man who denies this liability. Who is he that would claim the benefits of citizenship, who asks his Government to protect his rights and otherwise serve him and yet denies his own liability to serve his country in return? [Applause.]

I hold that the State exists for the man and that the man must live for the State, else his rights, his liberty can not live.

Mr. Chairman, so much of this ground has been covered that in my short time I can only go over it and pick up scattering ideas; but there is one phase of this question that I think still has not been fully touched upon, and slightly referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. It seems that we can not play international politics in this country. There are too many men of many minds to permit the leaders, that we must rely upon to carry this war to a successful conclusion, to make their diplomatic moves in international politics count for the good of the country. That is the unfortunate situation at this moment.

What is Germany doing to-day in international politics? She is holding her men in leash on the Russian line, and has been doing so for a month and a half, hoping that Russia, in her unsettled condition, might make overtures for peace. That is international politics. The French and the English at Saloniki have three-quarters of a million men on that front, and yet there has been little fighting there for months. They have been waiting there, hoping that Bulgaria might see the light and sue for a separate peace. That is international politics.

Germany at this moment is playing international politics with us. Why, it has been nearly three weeks since this body met and decided to declare the existence of a war with Germany, and yet not a ship has been sunk or a man killed in all that time. It means that Germany knows by its bitter experience with Great Britain the results of aggressive action. That experience was that before she attacked England volunteering was slight, and there was doubt whether England could raise enough troops by the volunteer system; but by the bombardment of the English coast and English cities by Zeppelins and warships Germany sent hundreds of thousands of men to the recruiting offices. Germany had that experience with England, and now she is playing politics with us by not bombarding our coasts. Heaven knows we have enough unprotected places, and Germany has submarines with big guns. If late reports be true, she has not been sinking our ships. She has refrained because she has thought that opposition to the President's policy might yet prevail here, and she would wait awhile before she opened hostilities. She hopes that this opposition may create internal disunion and render us helpless.

If the President of the United States, having mapped out a plan for the benefit of the country, having decided upon a policy that might be of the utmost importance to this country, decides that he will do this or will do that, why, dissenters in the House and dissenters in the Senate rise and obtrude their opinions upon his plans, and they have been broken.

That has been the situation thus far in this war, and I have been wondering how far it will go. As far as I am concerned, I feel very much as some other gentlemen do, that I do not want entirely to abrogate my functions as a legislator. But a good deal of that is merely a matter of pride, more perhaps of pride than patriotism, if I should insist that my plan must supplant that made by our leader, by the man upon whom we must rely to carry on this war to success. And so, fearing that I might be an obstruction to his policy, to the best policy of the country, I am going to stand by the President of the United States.

We have sworn to support the Constitution, and it says the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Whom shall we follow if not him? Shall we be safer to trust leadership to the dissenters? I would rather trust the President, with his superior information; I would rather trust the 55 soldiers of the General Staff than the lawyers and other laymen of this dissenting committee.

While I might if I chose add something to the many tearful statements that have been made here in favor of the volunteer system, yet I feel pretty much as some of these other gentlemen do that it is the nicest thing in the world to tell a man to be patriotic, but they have not thereby helped the matter any. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] pointed that out.

The committee brought in here a bill that provides neither for a voluntary system nor a conscription system, but for a system which is a mongrel, a weak compromise between the two; and while they are talking about saving the feelings of the people, about the pride of the patriotic men and boys of this country, they have done nothing to save their pride. If the draft system says, "Young man, you must come," their system says, "If you do not come, we will come after you and make you come." Their system is as much a threat as a straight draft system. And what kind of patriotism are we appealing to? Should any man feel hurt when his country calls? Is it not plain that it is democratic if we are all in the same class, where every man, as emergency may ensue, may be called upon to go out and fight for his country? If every man must do that, it is thoroughly democratic. I can not see how anybody can oppose that proposition. It is thoroughly democratic and based upon the ideals of equality. The people of this country will not be insulted if everybody is put in the same class; and when they say here that because we select the men from 21 to 40 years old, or the men from 19 to 40, or the men from 19 to 25, we have not made it democratic, they are not accurate. We desire to raise an efficient army. We must raise an army, but the greatest desideratum is that it must be efficient.

Who can deny that young men between the ages of 21 and 25 are more efficient to fight on the front and take up the battle of this country than men over that age? In all the physical strain that a man is subject to in any avocation he is a better man at 25 or 26 than he ever becomes afterwards. We all know that. We know that the average age of the soldiers of our Northern Army during the Civil War was under 19 years.

I do not believe that there is anything sinister, as has been intimated, back of this administration bill. It has been intimated that the Army officers of this country have arranged to better themselves, and that their object in proposing this conscription bill is that they shall be advanced toward high salaries and more prominent positions. I do not believe that, gentlemen. I do not think that the Members of this House ought to believe it. To say that the men we have taken from the farms and put into the Military Academy, the men that we have taken from the shops, the men that Members of this House have themselves selected to serve their country and learn how to serve it best are unpatriotic is unfair. The inference is an insult to men who may die leading our soldiers to victory. Such men of every nation now at war have died for their flag and their country, and we have in our land men as brave and as true as any.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATHRICK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, my colleague.

Mr. SWITZER. Does the gentleman believe there is any disposition on the part of anyone advocating the selective draft to keep ex-President Roosevelt from raising 100,000 men to go to France voluntarily?

Mr. BATHRICK. I have no knowledge on that matter.

Mr. SWITZER. I have heard it rumored around——

Mr. BATHRICK. Some Republican in the Senate has introduced a resolution, and I understand a Republican has introduced a resolution in this House, asking that the President send him. I am afraid it is a political matter.

Mr. EMERSON. Is it not just as much politics to reject him?

Mr. SWITZER. I do not believe the gentleman knows what I intend to ask, but I would like to have his opinion.

Mr. BATHRICK. I understand now. The gentleman is patriotic. He intends nothing political. So far as I am concerned, if Theodore Roosevelt were to raise one, five, or a dozen divisions of American boys who desire to volunteer to carry the Stars and Stripes to the trenches of France, I say let him go. [Applause.] That is my opinion of it, if you want it.

Mr. MASON. Does your bill provide that?

Mr. BATHRICK. It is not my bill that I am talking about. I am supporting the minority of the committee, which is the President's viewpoint.

Mr. MASON. You are talking about a bill. Does the bill you are supporting provide that?

Mr. BATHRICK. I do not think anyone knows whether it does or not. I think it is a question of technique which I can not answer offhand. Nevertheless, it should not be a political question, and you will all agree to that. I will say this as to my side and the politics about it. We Democrats went out on the stump last fall and besought the people of this country to stand by President Wilson, and they stood by him in the election. Now the people of this country want us to stand by President Wilson. [Applause.] There is no question about that, and I am one Democrat who will do it. There is no vital question of permanent policy involved in this contention; it is a question of following our leaders and winning this war. I will follow on, and there are thousands of the great people of my district who will follow him, too. Their brand of patriotism does not quibble upon how they are called by their country, but they are saying: "We are ready. Tell us when and where."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, the elaborate discussion this bill has already received from members of the committee which had it in charge and from the press makes further debate unnecessary, but I wish to state unmistakably my position.

Every nation has the fundamental right to command the services of all its fighting men in case of war. We are now at war with the greatest military power in the world, and although its armies are now so engaged by the other nations which are also at war with it that we seem to be in no immediate danger, yet both self-respect and self-protection for the future require us to prepare for the contest.

Our present military strength is insignificant compared with our adversary. To make ourselves formidable and even safe we must immediately train and equip an army. The question at issue is, Shall we form that army by accepting everyone who volunteers, or shall we select those who are most eligible for the service and whose withdrawal from their ordinary occupations would least cripple our industrial life?

The latter course seems to me the fairest and the wisest. If we assume that everyone is equally willing to give his services to the country, then it is wise to select those who will make the best soldiers and who can best be spared. If everyone is not equally willing, then it is not fair to allow the whole burden to fall on the patriotic and let the slackers escape. Nor do we want all the enthusiasts to go into the camps, thus leaving an abnormal average of indifference at home. The experience of England, which for nearly three years has been working out this same problem under the pressure of dire emergency, ought to teach us much. The overwhelming opinion there is that it is better that the Government should make the choice and not leave it to the individual. Success in war to-day depends so much on equipment and resources that it is necessary to organize and guard the whole industrial life of the Nation as never before. To determine when a man's service will be most useful for his country is not a problem he can solve so well as the Government. We are fighting the battle of democracy for the whole world, and it is the democratic way to make every man liable to serve the country and then let the country determine where that service can best be rendered. The rich and the poor, the active and the indolent, the willing and the unwilling, all should be treated with exact equality, with only one invariable rule, What is best for the Nation? The sacrifice can not be made equal for all, but the good of the country must govern.

It is not enthusiasm alone which can win such a war as this; it can be won only by a careful organization and development and coordination of all the industries and all the men of the country.

We have recently had an illustration in my own community of the unfairness of the voluntary system. Last summer our National Guard regiment was sent to the Mexican border. In it were many men with families dependent on them who suffered severely from their absence. There were plenty of men without families or dependents who would have made equally good soldiers. When they returned from Mexico they were allowed slowly to take up once more their business life and once more provide for the support and comfort of their families. But when this war broke out there was immediate necessity for guarding exposed localities. Was the inconvenience and business disturbance shifted and divided over the whole community? No; these same soldiers who had been sent to Mexico because they had volunteered and because the Nation had left the selection to the individuals themselves instead of making the selection for them—these same men again were called out because they were the only ones who had been adequately trained, and they and their families again had to bear all the inconvenience. The fair, the democratic, way is to assume that the country is entitled to the service of every man and that every man is willing, and then let him be selected whose age and relationship and occupation points to the Army as the field where he can be most useful. Such a system would save innumerable heartaches. In thousands of homes throughout the land the father and the mother will be wrestling anxiously and prayerfully with the question whether it is the duty of their boy to enlist, but their minds will be besieged by conflicting arguments, and the strain of the decision and then the uncertainty whether it was wise will bring anguish and bitterness into countless lives. Let the Government take that responsibility from them and decide where each man can best render service, and it will lighten the anxiety of our homes as well as secure the best contribution to every phase of our material activity. To enlist is not a privilege which should be granted to those who crave it; it is not a burden to be imposed upon those only who are patriotic enough to assume it; but it is a duty which should be apportioned by the Government upon those citizens whose condition makes it for the advantage of the whole community that they should do this work. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I have no quarrel with the men in this House who do not believe in compulsory military service, even at this hour of our Nation's peril. I did not formerly believe in it myself. In fact, I was one of those who had to be persuaded, but I have been watching the course of the enlistment plans of the War and Navy Departments with close attention, and I am sorry to say that, in my judgment, they have not been and will not be the success that we all had hoped for.

For instance, Mr. Chairman, I have just spent a few days in my home city—and I think no man will challenge the statement that Boston is as patriotic as any other city in all this land. I found a fine, healthy, whole-hearted approval of the action of Congress in declaring a state of war existing between this country and Germany, and I found that there were many young fellows applying for the right to enlist in the service of their country, with a fair percentage of them being accepted. I learned that some of our State militia regiments have been ordered to the colors, and that, as usual, the famous Fighting Ninth was being given the major portion of whatever responsibility now devolves upon our State troops which are guarding public works and highways. I also found that the enlistments were coming chiefly from one element of the population in my city; and while I am sorry in some degree to be compelled to say this, yet with some pride I want to announce to the House that in Boston it appears to be the Kellys, the Burkes, and the Sheas who are now volunteering their services in defense of the flag. For one, I do not believe that the glory which comes to those who shoulder the musket or man the decks ought to be bestowed alone upon the descendants of the fighting race, and so that there may be glory enough for all I have made up my mind that I am going to vote for universal service, in order that all might have a share.

Now, it is a well-recognized fact that a call for volunteers brings instant response from pretty nearly all that is best in the manhood of the Nation. It finds its coldest response from those who are least fitted to survive and whose survival is of least value to the Nation. While I dislike the use of the word "conscription," I must say that conscription takes in everyone. We all must have recognized before this hour that a volunteer army divides our Nation into two groups, one a group of patriots and the other a group of slackers. There is a good deal in the newspapers these days about "slackers." It is not a pleasant word, and it has not a pleasant meaning. My idea of a "slacker" is one who dodges war service—one who, able to serve his country, refuses. During the first year of the war England reechoed with the word. The epithet was bestowed without discrimination upon every young man not in uniform, and then England adopted compulsory universal service, and slackers and rumors of slackers were no more. Thousands of brave young fellows were brought back from the trenches to serve in industry, where they rightly belonged. No man who was needed at home was sent into camp, and no man who was needed in camp was left at home. The new system was just and it was efficient. There are no slackers in England now, but our own America is having its turn. Why, I have noticed that the War Department has been obliged to issue notice that marriages contracted since the declaration of war will not be considered as excusing men from liability to military service; it has been discovered that many men of military age have suddenly married, and the Government rightly intends to put a stop to that sort of romance. It believes that the slackers—the horror of the Government and the bane of the Nation—must be balked, and if Congress at this time will stand firmly behind the President there will be no slackers. There will be a selective draft; those needed at home will stay at home; those not needed will go into the Army. All will automatically become patriots, and the Nation can settle down to its task with the knowledge that all is well; the whole citizenry will have contributed to the Army and patriotism will have have done its utmost. [Applause.]

Oh, yes; America has been prompt in offering its money. Shall it be less prompt in offering its men? Mr. Chairman, we want a citizen army drawn from the whole citizenry, drawn in orderly fashion, with selection of those best fitted to serve. Once more let me repeat that we do not desire to put a gun on the shoulder of any man who is needed at home; and, if you please, we do not want to support in home luxury any man who can well be spared at the front. Our country is preparing to take its part—and perhaps the greatest part—in the greatest of all wars. I ask you, Shall we make a fife-and-drum holiday of this grim occasion or shall we make it a great national effort, calling upon all alike for loyalty and service? Shall we follow the unfortunate example of the English and sacrifice our best and bravest in the early period of learning? There is no tragedy in all that grim story, splendid as are many of its pages, greater than the tragedy of the untold thousands of the best, the bravest, and the most promising of the English young men who were sacrificed to national inexperience in all the battles that lie between Ypres and the early stages of the Somme. [Applause.]

I do not desire at this time to go over the story of all the wars that this country has been engaged in to show the failure of the volunteer system, but I might remind you that when the Civil War broke out we pursued the same old policy of bounties and short-term enlistments which had obtained in our previous military struggles. You all remember the story of the first battle of Bull Run, when the raw and untrained troops of the North, who had enlisted for three months, were routed by the Confederate Army, and although this first defeat should have taught the North a lesson, we repeated it throughout the war and even aggravated the errors of the past. When regiments had been decimated at the front, instead of filling up these regiments, which had by that time trained officers, new regiments were organized under officers of little or no experience and were sent to the front to take the place of those men who had been hardened by campaigning. When the war was over the sacrifice of life due to ineffective and incompetent handling of the troops staggered the world.

I need not recall to you the lessons of the Spanish-American War or the methods pursued, and the results of those methods are undoubtedly familiar to all of you. We had no adequate standing army, no field artillery of any consequence, and an insufficiency of supplies. And, worst of all, there was a general lack of organization which would have spelled disaster had we been opposed by any forces of the first-class European nations. Let us not fool ourselves about the situation which now confronts our common country. We have been deluded by the peace advocates, and unfortunately their propaganda has taken a much stronger hold of the country than some of us believe. Until now we have been lulled into the belief that our present position on this hemisphere was the most natural defense and that the possibility of invasion or attack by a foreign foe was the dream of the military enthusiast and the professional soldier; and yet in my time in this House I have heard it repeatedly stated on the floor here, without adequate refutation or denial, that Japan, which is over 20 days' sail from our western shores, could land an army of 200,000 men upon our shores before we could transport any adequate forces to oppose their landing. Yes; and within the month I have heard one of the greatest military authorities in this country publicly announce that in a conflict with Germany, if the British fleet were caught napping, it would be the merriest kind of a military frolic for the German Navy to take the great city of New York.

Mr. Chairman, with such a situation confronting us, it ought to be apparent to all that our country is pressed by the necessity for immediate and drastic action. It will be a costly experience to prepare. Hundreds of thousands of men must be taken from the walks of life and must spend some time in learning the pursuits and practices of military life which are necessary for our proper participation in this war. I believe that the people of my State are substantially unanimous in the demand for this military preparation. I realize that perhaps the same enthusiasm does not present itself to the citizens of the Middle Western States, for many of them know what a warship looks like only from pictures. And at this point I venture to say that there is many a man in the Congress of the United States who up to this very moment has never yet beheld one of the fighting ships of our country's Navy.

When you talk about our citizen soldiery, may I be permitted to say that we in Massachusetts have done much, if not more, than any other of the States in the Union? We have five Infantry regiments, one of which, the gallant Ninth, is recorded at the War Department as having established for itself the finest record of any of the State troops which gathered along the Texas border a few months ago. Its history is one of a record of glorious achievement, and it has brought credit and distinction in all its service to the great Commonwealth which it has represented. We have a regiment of Coast Artillery which is better than that of any other military organization of its kind in the United States. With four fine troops of Cavalry, two batteries of Field Artillery long established and a third in process of organization, a signal corps, two ambulance companies, a field hospital company, and a corps of cadets, Massachusetts' contribution to the military preparedness of the United States now rises to the splendid figure of 8,000 men; but the people of my State believe that these young men ought not be the only ones called upon to help fight the battles of the country, and they stand almost united for universal liability to service.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is it not a fact that there are more volunteers in the Central Middle West than in any other part of the country? [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. I did not know that that was a fact, but I am glad to be enlightened.

Mr. GALLAGHER. We have had more volunteers from Chicago than from New York and Philadelphia put together.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I wish those volunteers would impress the Members of Congress to vote for this legislation. If they did, they would show more patriotism than their Representatives do. [Applause.]

Let us not continue to ignore the lessons taught us by our previous wars and place our ultimate reliance upon a few citizen soldiers, who, willing and ready, can not do it all. I can not believe that it will be necessary for us to taste the bitterness of national defeat before the Representatives in the Congress of the United States awake to the stern realization of the absolute necessity of putting into the law of the land the program of our great President. By this means, and this means only, in my judgment, will the Stars and Stripes continue to wave triumphant over a free democracy. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, after I voted "no" on the war resolution I received many letters and telegrams regarding that vote, one of them read:

We have burned you in effigy and across your breast we placed an inscription reading, "The twentieth century Benedict Arnold."

Another was a copy of one sent to President Wilson, in which I was severely condemned for my vote against the not necessarily infallible advice of the President. The most of these communications I ignored, but at last the worm turned, and in one case I wired:

I presume the people of Blanktown are enlisting freely for the trenches of Europe, not awaiting conscription—the first resort of the tyrant having the power of life and death over his subjects, the last resort of a noble people believing in freedom of thought, speech, and action.

Mr Chairman, that message, sent in a spirit of irony, expressed a feeling and sentiment in my heart and soul that I still find there after having listened for all of two days to the specious arguments and elegant pleas of those here who stand for the General Staff and administration plan for selective conscription.

Mr. Chairman, for many months Members of the House of Representatives have been flooded with letters and telegrams, with newspaper clippings and newspapers with marked columns, all advocating and pleading for a system of universal military training. I had them until 48 hours ago in that form and language. Since then I got them from various county and State political and municipal body officials, giving out the idea that the people of their vicinities were "fierce" for universal military service and selective conscription combined, one term the exact antipode of the other. Universal and selective—one, everybody; the other, those I choose. The psychological moment had come to tear the veneering from the real purpose of the campaign for universal military training and show selective conscription, virtually the right to prescribe death for some of our boys and life for others.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN], the former Socialist mayor of his town, now an elegant exponent of the democracy of selection, near the conclusion of his fiery peroration used the words "universal military service under this selective conscription bill." There is not one iota or scintilla of universal service in selective conscription. Are we always to gull the people? Are they not worthy of a square deal? If we want to conscript in accordance with the President's advice, why not say so and leave off the false and misleading but just-sounding title of "universal military training"?

Mr. Chairman, we commenced this war with the people suffering under a misapprehension of the facts. We are now trying to put this selective draft over in the same way. The President, in his masterly diction and beautiful English, first took the "military" out of service and showed by suggestion how patriotic men could be raising "spuds" for the Army or engaging in manufacturing epaulettes for officers' garments and buttons for service uniforms, or in any of the walks of life on which the Nation's welfare depends, and he, in his infinite wisdom, is to be the sole judge of the need of such service. Both bills introduced into Congress make exempt certain classes of activities, and to that extent have already selected. They could have drafted an ordinary conscription bill giving all men between certain ages exactly the same opportunity for service. Oh, no; that would not be democratic! So they leave in the word "selective" and give to some administrative officer the right to say whose son shall fight in the trenches and whose shall raise Missouri mules for Army needs. "Consistency, thou art a jewel!"

Under selective conscription Mr. Johnson's son goes in the Army, has a leg or both arms shot off; his eyes are burned out; he may come home a poor wreck of humanity to drag out at best a miserable existence. The son of Mr. Morgan, if he has one, can be of more use to his country helping his noble father finance the nations of the earth. He lives out his life in opulence and plenty, loved and respected, sound of limb and full of life, and what time he does not put in making more money he may nobly devote to thinking out some method whereby his millions may be invested so as to avoid paying taxes to help pay Mr. Johnson's son and other war derelicts pensions on which to eke out the remainder of their miserable lives. I was moved almost to tears when I read in Sunday's paper John D. Rockefeller, jr.'s, quoted remarks on the beneficent leveling effect of universal military training as applied through selective conscription. Noble sentiments, but the administrative officer under the hallowed term of "universal service," with the "military" extracted, could easily see that John D.'s 19-year-old son, if he has one, is almost indispensable to his country figuring out just how much gasoline they could furnish the Government for war purposes and the populace for peace purposes without reducing the price too much to make it possible for them to buy a few more untaxed bonds to show their patriotism.

Mr. Chairman, I am a proscribed man, a traitor to my country, because under my oath of office and my right to freedom of speech and action guaranteed me by the Constitution of my country I had the effrontery to vote against the advice of him "who kept us out of war" against our going into war. To that extent I was guilty of lèse majesté. Oh, my countrymen and gentlemen, as I am already a goat, I'll go a little further and express my traitorous feelings somewhat in regard to the use of the word "slacker" as applied to our people. The President is reported as having given as one of his reasons for advocating the selective conscription of boys between 19 and 25 his desire to "catch the slackers." Oh, my God! Now, we go ahead and conscript an army and as they pass along—going, many of them, to a certain death—the public mind questions "How many of those are slackers?" Nineteen to twenty-five, just begun to live, and called slackers by those who have lived and sinned from twice to thrice their span of life. [Applause.] "Slackers," to use that opprobrious epithet in regard to boys 19 to 25, even though they do shrink from death, life looking joyful and bright to them, is an outrage. They were not shipping any arms and other contraband of war to Europe; some of them may even question whether it is right to ask them to die to guarantee what has been designated as a "doubtful legal right." I think to use a term like that in regard to boys and men of that age is altogether contemptible and totally inexcusable, especially in advance of any call for their services. I suppose along with the Stars and Stripes, in simple justice these conscripts you are going to shanghai, will be allowed to carry a simple banner stating, "Really and truly, our countrymen, we are not slackers."

Mr. Chairman, had this administration conscription bill been framed to catch the slackers between the ages of 25 to 60, I think there might be some need for it. [Applause.] Many men whose lives have not been what they should have been, desecraters of homes, betrayers of innocence, those who have ground down the poor and by other iniquitous practices have made themselves unfit to live, yet are afraid to die, might well be named slackers, but not our youth to be led like lambs to the slaughter.

The administration, which is credited with giving out this plan of selective conscription, has been quoted by the press as saying, "Young men who have married since this plan of service was given out to the public and in advance of the passage of the law—which the administration at least thought was sure to be passed as had been decreed—should not on account of such marriage be exempt." They are "slackers." Hundreds of such marriages have been consummated, hundreds, no doubt, arranged for in the natural processes of our people before the horrors of war were realized, and now by a war-mad press and, if quoted correctly, an offended administration, the young men who contracted them are to be forced to enlist for daring to realize their ambitions and satisfying nature's most ennobling and natural function by creating a home. They have failed to realize responsibility as exemplified in the "master's voice"; they are "slackers"; we will tear them asunder in the name of democracy for the good of the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I would not feel justified in alluding to these newspaper utterances in respect to this matter had the administration not been so correctly reported by them for some months. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, President Wilson has said:

We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of the Nation can make them.

The sentiment is grand, the diction perfect. How it electrified the hearts of the people who read it! "The sacrifices we shall freely make." Who are "we"? I suppose these 500,000 men who are to be conscripted now—5,000,000, maybe, later on—are a part of "we offering our services freely." Oh, no! It evidently did not mean "we the people." "We" had an entirely different meaning there. "We" must have meant "me and mine, Congress." It could have meant nothing else followed immediately by this selective-draft measure. By implication it says, "You may have been willing to have offered yourself freely, I don't know; I will not take any chances on you; obey your master's voice and come whether or no. I say you shall be one of the 'champions of mankind' in the name of democracy, and I'll make you fight for the 'faith and freedom of the Nation' as exemplified by Congress passing a selective-conscription bill as a fundamental principle of democracy." Oh, yes; we shall freely give our sons—such as I select—to down "Prussian militarism," which forces men to fight willy-nilly, thus making a great machine that is dangerous to the welfare of the world. We will "fight the devil with fire," and to scotch him we will adopt his own plan, which has been so effective, and we will "democratize" the German Empire even though we will have to Prussianize and autocratize free America to do so. "We'll make 'em do it freely so as to secure the 'freedom of the Nation.'"

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take up the time of the committee arguing as to the merits and demerits of the volunteer system; I will extend these deductions in the RECORD, if there is no objection. The volunteer system is the one under which all our victories have been won; our small experience with conscription did not exemplify its wisdom or efficiency. Mr. Chairman, I am not as much concerned just now as to the most efficient way—and no man values true efficiency more highly than do I—but I value more highly the fundamental principle of freedom and the perpetuity of the freedom of the masses of the people. God pity them, if to democratize Germany we are to be compelled to Prussianize America! [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED].

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, three years ago next August the European war broke out. It was known from the start as a world war, and it did not require, it seems to me, a very far-sighted statesmanship to realize that it was going to be a difficult matter for this country to escape involvement. Many patriotic men did realize it, and through the newspapers and on the public platform called the attention of the people to our condition of unreadiness for war, and tried to create among the people a desire and demand for the adoption of a policy of thoroughgoing preparedness. One of the first and most zealous men in this work was our colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. Certain sections of the country appreciated the force of the arguments made in this educational campaign, and other sections turned an absolutely deaf ear. In December, 1914, after the war had been in progress for four months, the President of the United States in his address on the convening of the Congress decried the attempts which were being made to induce Congress to strengthen the military and naval forces. He asserted that we were in no danger of becoming involved in the war, that our isolated situation rendered us secure, and that the sentiment for preparedness was hysterical. Such a statement coming from the President of the United States greatly strengthened the position of the pacifists and measurably weakened the position of the advocates of preparedness, with the result that nothing was done for preparedness during the year 1914, and nothing was done for preparedness during the year 1915, although in the month of May of that year the German Government committed one of the worst and most indefensible crimes in history in the sinking of the steamship Lusitania with the loss of more than twelve hundred innocent lives, including 113 citizens of the United States.

In December, 1915, the President again appeared before Congress and delivered a message, in which he completely reversed himself from the position on the question of preparedness which he had taken a year before; but still the message was mild and pacific. It was not until the summer of 1916 that the President seemed to fully wake up to a true appreciation of our real situation, when he made his tour of the Middle West advocating a policy of preparedness for war. During the summer of 1916 we appropriated large sums of money to be expended by the War and Navy Departments in strengthening our military position, but to-day I regret to say that in many vital respects we are not much better off than we were three years ago. The hearings on this bill reveal a state of inactivity on the part of the War Department, which is exceedingly hard for me, at least, to understand. It appears that we have not made a rifle in a Government arsenal since the passage of the appropriation for that purpose last year, and that only a few thousand old rifles have been repaired; that we have very few machine and antiaircraft guns and not a single piece of heavy mobile ordnance and have not placed an order for a single piece, although the Secretary of War admits in the record that it is absolutely indispensable if our Army is to actively take the field. Under the most favorable conditions it is stated we should hope to be able to begin to get some of this necessary matériel at the end of 6 or 7 months, and that it would be the expectation of the War Department to have enough at the end of 14 to 16 months to equip an army of 500,000 men, but the General Staff estimates that it will take 30 months to get sufficient matériel to equip an army of 1,000,000 men. If we had started the work of preparedness 30 months ago, as we should have done in the light of the events which were taking place in the world, we could easily have to-day an army of 1,000,000 men fully trained and equipped with everything necessary for their protection and efficiency, ready to take the field at a moment's notice. If we had such an army now it would not have been necessary for us to provide for the issuance of $7,000,000,000 of bonds. If we had such an army now we would not be at war with Germany to-day and would not be in the humiliating position of having nothing to fight with but our Navy and our money, dependent for our protection upon the armies and fleets of our allies.

The President of the United States is at last fully awake to the needs of the hour. His war message was one of the finest public utterances of a century, breathing the true spirit of Americanism in every line. I believe that the War Department is also at last awake to the needs of the hour and from now on can be relied upon to push things with vigor. It is incomprehensible to me, in view of the existing situation and the valuable time which has been lost, that any attempt should now be made by the Congress of the United States to further impede the work of preparation by foisting upon the country the volunteer system of raising an army in the face of the lessons of history, of the experience of every nation which has tried it, including our own, and against the unanimous advice of the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and, what is really more to the point, the military experts of our Government. Under the feudal system, where the baron and his retainers were supported by the tenantry, the baron was under an obligation to perform military service for his tenants' protection; but in a democracy, where the privileges of citizenship are the same to all, the obligation to serve the country in the Army is the same to all, and no volunteer system should be permitted to furnish a cover under which the shirker and the skulker can hide and evade the performance of the military obligation which he owes to his country. The volunteer system is unfair, unjust, and undemocratic, and from a military point of view it is unscientific and wasteful. The chairman of the committee, in the course of his remarks, stated, as I understood him, that it did not make much difference how an army was raised. I beg to take issue with the chairman on that point. I believe it is of vital fundamental importance how an army is raised. Under the volunteer system the high-minded, patriotic, generous youth and a large proportion of all the men of military experience offer their services. Acting upon the assumption that no other than this initial force would be raised for the war, and without consideration of the selfishness of permitting the sacrifice, it would certainly be bad economy to permit the flower of the Nation's youth to be cut down to save the weeds; and if you intend to provide for raising additional increments to this initial force—and it would certainly be the supremacy of folly not to do so under existing conditions—then it would be most unwise to permit your best officer material to be killed off in the early days of the war and thus find yourself short of the right kind of men to train and lead the succeeding increments. Under such a system the tendency would be for each succeeding increment to be poorer in quality than the one which preceded it, and it is of the highest importance that the entire Army throughout the war should continue of even quality.

Under the administration bill the age limit of men to be taken by conscription was 19 to 25, inclusive, and under the committee bill it is 21 to 40. I understand the reason why the War Department limited the age to 25 years was because men under 26 were for the most part unsettled in life and not needed to maintain the industrial processes of the Nation, and also because it would be a somewhat difficult matter and take considerable time to eliminate from a wider conscription the men who were needed in industrial life, but I do not believe either reason valid. We all know there are hundreds of thousands of men over 25 years of age who are not engaged in an industry and just as available for military service as the men under 25 years of age. Under the administration plan the first increment of 500,000 was to be taken from men 19 to 25 years of age, inclusive, and then the second, the third, the fourth increment, and so on, until the entire number of available men of the country between these ages had been exhausted. It is to me an unthinkable proposition that the young men between these ages should be asked to make the sole blood sacrifice when all military experts agree that men in good physical condition up to at least 40 years of age are available for service. I think the committee was in error in fixing the minimum age at 21, and fail to see the force of the argument that no man should be sent to the front who is not old enough to vote. If a man is mature and fit for service from a physical standpoint, it seems to me it does not make much difference whether he is 20 or 21; but, on the other hand, if we fix the age at 21, we are depriving the country of the services of about half a million men annually, who are at least as old as the men who bore the burden of the Civil War in the Union and Confederate Armies.

I realize it is highly desirable that this measure shall be so framed as not to make conscription appear a penalty for the failure to volunteer, and for that reason the provisions of the British conscription acts appeal to me. I think we should pass a bill conscripting all of the men of the country between 19 and 40 years of age, inclusive, who would then pass automatically into the reserve, permitting from this body volunteer enlistments until the Regular Army and National Guard units were at war strength, and then taking from the balance the additional increments required. The men in exempt classes or who were needed in industrial life would be excused from service and assigned to work in the industries necessary to the maintenance of the Army on proper proof. The administration bill, as I am informed, was prepared by the Judge Advocate General, under instructions from the Secretary of War, from notes prepared by the Secretary of War after consultation with members of the General Staff and other military experts. I believe the administration bill does not bear the full indorsement of the General Staff, and that in the bill the General Staff recommended there was provision for the establishment of a system of universal military training. The President, I believe, was opposed to that provision on the ground that when we are engaged in war is not the proper time to establish a permanent military policy applicable to peace conditions; that the present war will undoubtedly create many changes, and that we should not adopt a permanent military policy until we know what those changes are, so that we can shape our policy with reference to them. With all due respect for the President's judgment, I take the liberty to believe that he is just exactly as wrong on this proposition as he was in 1914 when he opposed the preparedness program. It seems to me that universal military training is so universal and so applicable to all conditions that I can not conceive of any circumstances which might arise in our national life that would not make its establishment a splendid thing for the country if only for the moral and physical betterment of our young men, and from a military point of view it certainly is and always will be the fundamental basis of national preparedness. The history of the world from the earliest times conclusively proves that any nation which neglects the military arts becomes soft, passes into a state of decay, breaks up, or comes under the dominion of a stronger and more virile State. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, if a man favors voluntary service he ought to have the courage to say that he is for that kind of service and for no other; if he is against selective draft or conscription, he ought to have the courage to say that he is opposed to that kind of system and refuse to sanction it in any way.

We all respect a fighter and we all condemn a slacker—whether by that we mean a man who will not fight for his country or a member of a committee who shirks his responsibilities. If anyone wants to know what a "slacker" means, all he has to do is to examine the bill reported out by the majority of the Military Committee.

They did not have the courage to advocate an out-and-out voluntary system, and they did not have the courage to refuse to mention selective draft or conscription. So, like the slacker, they tried a compromise.

As the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] stated the other day, the four members of the Military Committee who saw service in 1898—the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. TILSON; the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. CRAGO; the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. GREENE; and the gentleman from New York, Mr. LUNN—have signed the minority report favoring selective draft.

Upon looking over the names advocating the volunteer-service bill, I find some gentlemen of about the same age as those of the committee who saw service in 1898. I take it for granted that they did not believe in volunteer service at that time; at least they did not believe in it strongly enough to volunteer their services to their country. Apparently the only way their country could have secured their services at that time was to conscript them. As the volunteer system did not result in their volunteering their services at that time, so the volunteer system will not help us to get the boys of to-day who hold the same ideas now as some of the gentlemen held in 1898. To get the boys of like ideas in the Army to-day we will have to conscript them, and it might just as well be done now as later.

All of these distinguished gentlemen voted to declare war, all of these distinguished gentlemen voted for the $7,000,000,000 bill to carry on the war, and now they refuse to raise the soldiers to do the fighting.

Perhaps that is not exactly correct—they do not refuse to do it—they do not do it. It would look to an innocent bystander as if they thought it would not be good politics at this time to come out for selective draft, so they "pass the buck" to the President—not a very statesmanlike thing to do. They seem to desire to place themselves in a secure position, no matter what happens. If the President resorts to the selective draft system and it is not popular, they blame the President, and if it makes out all right, then they can say, "We did it; we gave him the authority."

The people back home are not much concerned these days about what is or what is not good politics. They only know that we are at war—even if some Members of Congress do not—and that they want it to come to a successful conclusion as soon as possible. The man who hesitates these days between duty to his country and good politics is absolutely lost forever, and he might as well order a reserve seat for a ride up "Salt River" now.

I am no new convert to universal training, universal service, or selective draft. I became a convert to all three when we went to Cuba in 1898.

Very few of the boys knew how to take care of themselves, and in most cases the officers did not know how to even take care of themselves, to say nothing about taking care of the boys intrusted to their care. I have seen men die like dogs because they had not the slightest idea of what ought to be done to protect their lives and they could get no help from their officers.

My own company was particularly fortunate in having a man as captain who did know what ought to be done, and, more than that, he made us do it. Most of us owe our lives to his ability.

It rained in Cuba every day and many of the officers did not know enough to insist upon tents being raised from the ground several feet; many of them did not even have their men build outhouses. If some of the gentlemen who advocate the volunteer system so strongly had seen as much of it as the ones who saw a little service, they would not be so anxious to continue the system.

As a comrade wrote me the other day, "Many a volunteer company would elect a bartender as captain one day and shoot him the next."

Capt. Millar has always advocated universal training and service, and is in favor of the bill for the "selective draft."

In a letter to me the other day he writes me in part as follows:

UNIVERSAL SERVICE.

HUBBELL, MICH., April 12, 1917.

Hon. W. FRANK JAMES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR COMRADE: I am thoroughly convinced in my own mind that universal service is the only method by which we, the American people, can be prepared at all times to meet such a crisis as we have at the present time. Furthermore, I feel it is the duty of every young man to devote some of his time in the service of his country.

The benefits to be derived by the young men are almost too numerous to mention. He would profit by being associated with young men from all parts of the United States, which would broaden his ideas of his fellow man. It would be a great benefit in building him up physically and mentally, but I think the greatest benefit would be discipline. This is something most of our young men seem to know little about. Without discipline you can not have efficiency. I believe this to be the aim of universal service—to have efficient men at all times to carry the burdens of the country.

Very truly, yours, GEORGE MILLAR.

Among those who saw service with us in Cuba in 1898 was Mr. Homer A. Guck, of Houghton, Mich., editor of the Mining Gazette, who saw service as private in Company D, Thirty-fourth Michigan. Here is an editorial that he writes, entitled "Conscription," which expresses the views of practically every man who saw service in 1898:

CONSCRIPTION.

The vital thing in the Army bill which Secretary Baker has submitted to Congress is its rejection of the volunteer system. Selective compulsory service must be resorted to if we are to have a representative, efficient, democratic Army. Every pacifist, every slacker, every enemy of military preparedness knows this. For that reason all the elements in Congress and out of it which want to retard military development and thereby keep our participation in the war down to a minimum are now making a drive against conscription. They want to retain the volunteer system, which has broken down every time the United States has relied upon it, and can be depended upon to break down again.

Representative ANTHONY, of Kansas, a Republican, but one of the chief supporters in the last Congress of the futile and fraudulent Hay bill, has given notice that he will try to amend the administration's measure in committee by substituting voluntary enlistment for the General Staff's selective compulsory service plan. The main fight in the committee and in the House will thus come on this proposition to denature the new Army bill—to stringhalt it after the treacherous Hay fashion.

The administration's draft makes some slight concessions to those who still cling to the ancient delusion that some subtle tribute is paid to individual and moral liberty in the haphazard, inequitable, let-somebody-else-do-it theory of military service. The staff plan provides that the Regular Establishment may be recruited to war strength by voluntary enlistment. But if volunteers do not come fast enough conscription will be resorted to. The ranks of the National Guard may also be filled by volunteering, so long as that method produces results worth while. But the President is to have, as he now has, the power to draft men for National Guard service. Conscription will be applied exclusively in raising the new armies, 500,000 men at a time.

In our opinion, the sooner the country gets on an exclusive conscription basis the better. Volunteering may be of some service for a few weeks, while the machinery of conscription is being set up. It may help a little to make up deficiencies in the Regular Army and in the National Guard regiments. Conscription is already authorized in the case of the guard. So the Regular Establishment is the only field in which volunteering can be of real value to the Government. We doubt whether it will be of real value there, for the class of volunteers to which the Regular service appeals is now, as it has always been, exceedingly limited.

Many Congressmen are finding fault with the conscription theory. Some think it will be unpopular. Southern Democrats do not like its universality. They object to a draft which would apply equally to all citizens, white and black. But these objections to a method which the Government is obliged to apply if it wants to make war successfully should have been urged before war was declared. They have no pertinency now. All other considerations must yield now to the demands of a sound military policy. Pacifists, slackers, objectors to military service, and other obstructionists must recognize that their individual prejudices are no longer of consequence when weighed against the safety of the State and the efficiency of its armies.

Conscription must come, because there is no way to avoid conscription and still raise the sort of armies which we must raise. The administration has at last gotten right on the question of military preparation. It is accepting the views of the General Staff. Members of Congress who voted for the Hay law last year ought to be diffident about challenging the General Staff's authority. They did their worst in the way of picayunish amateurism. They ought to be very humble and silent now.

He also states:

We are pleased that JULIUS KAHN, a Republican, is the leader for the President to put through the most sensible, practicable bill that can be put into effect to bring about a real army in a real way. KAHN is one of the men of brains in the House.

Many of the boys throughout the country in 1898 who were patriotic enough to enlist found, much to their disappointment, upon their return that the coward, the "slacker," the boy with the "yellow streak," was holding down their jobs. If the bill as proposed by the committee goes through there will be thousands more of "slackers" holding down jobs that belong to better men.

The committee is afraid to come out now for an out-and-out "volunteer service" bill and against the "draft," but I understand that everyone of them voted to "draft" the members of the National Guard, whether or not they were willing. What they thought was all right to do to the National Guard they dare not do to the rest of their constituents.

Another thing, all politics ought to be eliminated from the Army that we are now raising for "fighting" purposes, not for "dress parade." A man ought to secure his job because he is qualified, not because he is a "good mixer" or is popular "with the boys." You generally find that the men themselves will regret their choice of a good mixer when they are put up against real service. And yet this bill evidently intends that that kind of thing shall continue. If these gentlemen ever had any experience with some of these volunteer officers they would not be so desirous of having this section in the bill. They would want to have the best man they could get on the job. I know a thing or two about incompetent officers who got their jobs on account of politics, "good mixers," and "one of the boys."

I have seen men having to wear the blue uniform instead of khaki when it was 90° in the shade and "no shade." There were thousands of khaki suits at Siboney; but the man who ought to secure them did not know how to do it. Many times there was sufficient grub to be had if the man who ought to know did know how to get it—seeing he did not, we lived on short rations many a time. There were ambulances that could be had if the man who ought to know did know how to get them—instead of that, sick as a man might be, he walked or rode in anything that could be had.

The little trouble we had in 1898 is only a mere skirmish to what is going on in Europe now, and for that reason we need the best men we can get in every position, and we should so frame every bill that ability counts instead of politics or good-fellowship.

Many of the letters that I have had in favor of universal service have been from people who at one time were "pacifists," or who believed we needed practically no army. The war in Europe has made them change their minds. Among those who are now convinced of the necessity of universal service is Judge P. H. O'Brien, our circuit judge, and one of the most influential Democrats in Michigan, and his letter, which I give in part, explains itself:

HOUGHTON, MICH., April 7, 1917.

Hon. W. FRANK JAMES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I meant to write you some time ago, but as my speech on "The Flag" contained a statement of my sentiments on the question of universal military training, I thought perhaps you would have secured a clipping thereof. I am sending you under separate cover a copy of the speech as it appeared in the Hancock Evening Journal.

Permit me to state that until recently I have been opposed to militarism in every form. The events of the last 30 months, however, have caused me to investigate the whole subject of national defense de novo. I am convinced not only from the development of the present great war, but also from a study of history, that any nation occupying any desirable and extensive portion of the earth's surface must be prepared to defend it. The choice, therefore, is between a large standing army and the adoption of a scheme of compulsory universal military training.

A standing army may very readily be used for the purpose of overthrowing the government and establishing tyranny. On the other hand, a citizenry trained to arms will always uphold democratic institutions.

Universal training itself will have a tendency to bring together in fraternal fellowship young men from every class of our population. This will serve to unify our democracy. Besides, I favor this method of training, because it places the burden of defense equally on all of our citizens instead of relying upon the voluntary efforts of the most unselfish.

I hope, therefore, that Congress will pass a bill adopting a permanent and comprehensive scheme of compulsory universal military training.

With kind personal regards, I remain,

Yours, sincerely,

P. H. O'BRIEN.

I have had some letters from people opposed to the idea of each man doing his "bit" in this national crisis, but I am glad to state that none of these un-American and unpatriotic letters came from the twelfth district of Michigan.

I received one the other day from one Rochelle—do not know what his nationality is, but, judging from the contents, should imagine he had some Chinese blood in his veins, as he was an avowed peace-at-any-price man. He wanted this bill so worded that he and his sons would not have to defend their country no matter what happened. These "yellow" boys who object to do any fighting themselves would be the first to cry for help if an enemy came in sight.

In the same mail I had two letters from fathers in my district. One, Alfred Gregor, a miner, had two sons in the service of their country. Like a good father, he did not regret their having volunteered. He says, in part:

I do not think we ought to stick to the volunteer system. All families should provide their share of the men for the Army and the Navy.

Another good patriotic citizen said, in part:

While I am too old for military service, being 65, I have four boys who are able and willing to serve their country, but I would want to see them go into the service with a fair chance, and not in an unprepared manner, and not under officers who do not know how to take care of their men, especially in camp. I hope Congress will pass the universal service law and distribute the duties of military service where they belong, upon all the citizens, and not upon a few who are patriotic enough to assume the burden.

To those Members who are afraid that if they vote for this bill they will "get in bad" with the members of the National Guard back home let me read the following from Col. Willard C. Fisk, Seventh Regiment, New York:

For all the officers and men of my command (the Seventh Regiment) and for the greater part of its 8,000 or 9,000 former members I want to say that we are unanimously, unalterably, in favor of universal training and service, and that as a fundamental democratic principle of government it should be exclusively under Federal control. I don't see how any thinking man with even small military experience can have any other opinion.

I have no criticism for the National Guard, but I recognize that, as constituted under the unfortunate and mistaken Hay bill, it is a weak reed for the country to rely on for its first-line force. For this country to contemplate entering a world conflict with no settled military policy, no reserve, a small army, a guard divided into 48 States, with no obligation on the youth and brawn of the country to serve, is certainly suicidal.

I love the guard. I love my own organization. I have heard it said that universal service means obliteration of the guard. I do not believe that is necessary, but if it is necessary why should it stand in the way of a broad, comprehensive policy for this country?

If it is any satisfaction to those who oppose universal service or the selective draft, I wish to state that they are not the only ones who hope that no bill of that kind will pass. They have good company in part of the Berlin press. The Die Post said editorially the other day:

So long as universal military service is not established in America by law, no German can be forced to take up arms against the fatherland.

The gentlemen who are against universal service and selective draft will have to decide in a day or so and show by their votes whether the Die Post will be pleased or whether the best interests of this country will be served.

A treasonable organization called the Antienlistment League, of which one Mrs. J. Sergeant Crime is secretary, is also opposed to universal service. Benedict Arnold or Judas Iscariot would be a better sounding name for an officer of such an organization as the Antienlistment League.

Another Spanish War veteran who writes—Mr. Frank C. Burmeister, of Kalamazoo—says, in part:

We glory in the stand you have taken in this crisis and hope you may always continue to fight for the right, as you have done.

Col. W. H. Thielman, of the Thirty-fourth Michigan, writes, in part:

When I use the word "universal" I mean that all young men should have this training, whether they are physically fit or not. It at least gives them discipline, and in case of war the physically unfit would be in fine shape to fill clerical positions, also positions in the commissary and Quartermaster's departments.

If time would permit, I would like to read you many more letters from men who have seen service. They all saw service either in Cuba or the Philippines or Porto Rico, and they all favor universal training, universal service, and the selective draft. They all know from experience how absolutely fatal it would be for the United States to go into this war with another experiment of the volunteer system.

Some of the opponents of universal service claim that it will make our boys more "bloodthirsty." Playing football, running races, and so forth, does not make a boy bloodthirsty; it makes him more self-reliant and more fitted for the battles of life.

Some of the strongest indorsements I have received have been from ministers of the gospel.

Rev. W. B. Coombe, First Methodist Episcopal Church, Crystal Falls, Mich., writes me:

The State press report that you are in favor of the selective draft. Glad to know it. On the right track, as usual. I have not heard a single person say aught against it. The people seem to think it is the only fair thing and proper way.

The following letter from Rev. Charles J. Johnson, of Marquette, Mich., speaks for itself:

APRIL 2, 1917.

Hon. W. FRANK JAMES,
Representative in Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inform you that at a patriotic service held in the First Methodist Episcopal Church last Sunday evening, April 1, that the inclosed memorial was signed by the citizens whose names appear thereon (excepting several whose signatures were secured this morning), and it is transmitted to you with the request that the same be presented to the House of Representatives.

Very truly, yours,

CHARLES J. JOHNSON.

"We express our conviction that the safety and security of our Republic requires that we definitely recognize the principle that the duty of defending the Nation rests equally upon all citizens capable of service. We would earnestly urge, therefore, that measures be taken for the immediate establishment of a permanent, adequate, and democratic system of national defense based upon universal military, industrial, and scientific service according to the capacity of each citizen.

"We also express our conviction that if the United States of America speaks as a Nation fully prepared for defense it can best serve the cause of international righteousness and universal peace."

Rev. Ernest M. Stires, D. D., St. Thomas's Church, in a sermon on Sunday last, well said:

Let the law take it for granted that all are ready to defend their country, their principles, and humanity. No other method is honest. We must not ask the unselfish to die that the selfish may live and flourish. We must not allow a man to serve on the firing line if some special skill makes him a hundredfold more useful in some other place. Honor may make him enlist, but experts should determine where each may serve best. Universal enlistment is the only fair, honest, economic method. With all my heart I approve the reply a friend of mine made some time ago to a pacifist. He said, "I will gladly join you in praying for peace if you will join me in preparing for war; then, whatever happens, we will be ready."

The beloved Bishop Fallows, one of the best-known Civil War veterans, said recently:

Universal military training will never develop a spirit of militarism in this country. It is a democratic movement and the very antithesis of militarism. I can remember over 50 years ago, when the same cry of militarism was raised after the close of the Civil War. Many well-meaning people said that with 2,000,000 soldiers back of him Gen. Grant would become a military dictator and that democracy in the United States would disappear. But those 2,000,000 soldiers returned to civil life after having saved the Union, and democracy in the United States became more of a living reality than it had been before. Military training has not developed militarism in Switzerland, Australia, or in our own State of Wyoming. I would like to ask the women of our country who oppose military training which they would prefer for their sons, the military camp or the pool room in our large cities?

"War is hell." Of course it is. It always was and always will be. "Bleeding Belgium" knows that "war is hell"; brave France knows that "war is hell."

We may have to decide in the future whether we wish to send a sufficient army to keep the "hell"—the burning of towns, the famine, raping, etc., in Europe or keep our Army here and have another "hell" over here later on. And I am in favor of confining the "hell" to Europe. Some people think we ought not to commence fighting until New York Harbor is attacked; others seem to think we ought to wait until they attack Michigan Avenue, Chicago; others seem to think we ought to wait until Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nebraska, and Kansas are to be attacked.

The time to fight is as soon as we can get ready; the place to fight is where the enemy is now.

If the central powers can not be defeated by the nations now allied against her, they would find "easy picking" fighting us alone.

If we had—as we should have done—adopted a system of universal military training service years ago, we would not now be in the position of going in with other powers to defeat the common enemy. We would have had an efficient fighting force of fifteen to sixteen million men—an Army large enough to command the respect of every nation, central powers and the allied nations alike.

When the allies were going to blockade the Swedish coast some time ago, Sweden wrote one note of protest to the allies, but it was effective. Why? The allies knew that while Sweden only had a population of 6,000,000 it had 1,000,000 men who knew how to shoot, and to shoot straight. They believed that 1,000,000 Swedes could keep 3,000,000 Russians busy, and they changed their plans.

We have been writing notes to everybody for over two years. We have written to France, Spain, Mexico, Great Britain, Germany, and Austria, and have received not a satisfactory reply from any of them. If we had the army of free men fighting for a free Nation that universal military service would have given us, we would have received an immediate satisfactory reply from all of these nations, and we would not now be at war.

I have always claimed that at the outbreak of the war in Europe we should have served notice on every nation—allies and central powers alike—that we expected every right that we had according to international law respected, peacefully we hoped, but that we intended to maintain these rights by force, if necessary; and further, that we should have immediately commenced a system of universal training and service. If we had, I believe that we would have kept out of war. But these things are past and gone; it is "a condition, not a theory" that confronts us now; and it is up to us to do the best thing and the right thing now, not next month or next year.

Practically every man in the twelfth Michigan works in or around mines—copper and iron. There never was any doubt about the patriotism of these men, and if anyone believes that the miners are against universal service, selective draft, or a system so that "each man will do his 'bit,'" whichever you wish to call it, he ought to come up to the Upper Peninsula of Michigan.

They had a patriotic meeting at Ishpeming on the 18th, preceded by the largest parade ever held in the city. Among those on the program were gentlemen representing business men, doctors, women, mechanics, bankers, clergy, lawyers, immigrants, clerical forces, and the men working in the mines.

The papers state that the hit of the evening was made by those representing the miners.

Let me read to you part of the speech made by a miner, Mr. William Pryor:

I stand before you to-night to represent the miners, a band of noble and true men, whose hearts are throbbing and pulsating with love and patriotism for their country. Never in the history of our country has she been called to face a problem such as this. For three years we have stood on the banks and watched nation after nation drawn into the whirlpool until now we ourselves are caught in its clutches; and now the question is, Are we prepared to emerge with flying colors and to bring this warfare to a successful issue? The question is raised, Is the miner capable of producing enough mineral so that we can make ammunition enough and guns enough to protect our land? And I can hear the answer rising from a million throats that we are prepared.

All down through the ages the miner has played an important part in the progress of the world. We have stood the test of time; we have been the main spoke in the wheel of industry, and now we are called upon to produce the ore that is necessary for the advancement of our country. We have gone down into the depths and have brought forth the unseen wealth of our country. We have produced the gold and silver for the coins; we have produced iron ore for the building of our ships; we are going to protect this great Nation of ours. We have risen to the surface the coal that is necessary to use to warm our homes; we have gone down into the mines and have raised copper, lead, and zinc, and many other things to make ammunition to defend our country, and I feel sure, I am confident that in this great crisis the miner will rise to the occasion and will again bring forth the necessities, so that we can go forth and carry the flag and win this war successfully.

But, brother miners, that is not all that is required of us. We may be called upon to shoulder the gun and defend our flag, and I am confident that when that call comes the miners of this country will not be weighed in the balance and found wanting. We realize that it is better to serve our Nation for a period of war than to serve a foreign nation for the remainder of our lives. This struggle that we have entered into has not been our seeking. Our President and his Cabinet have done all in their power to evade this great crisis, but now it has come. Uncle Sam has gone in, and we will not let go until this German bully pays the debt he owes us and our flag.

We are Americans true; we will fight just like our fathers did, so for good old America we stand, a band of brothers, each by each and all by all, until she wins a glorious victory over her German foe.

Another miner, Mr. John Gray, said, in part, as follows:

I have been called upon to tell you what the sentiment is among the Cleveland miners in regard to the President's recent appeal. I can tell you that in a very few words: They are all willing to give the best there is in them, and will back the President to the last man. I have been working in and around the mines for more than 35 years and have met, and been intimate with, all the different nationalities of which the mining force is composed, and I find that they are the same to-day as they were 35 years ago—always among the first to answer our country's call, no matter what they are called to do.

Just at present, according to President Wilson's appeal, the iron miners can do more for the Government by staying at home and digging iron ore than we can by entering either the Army or Navy.

This is true, because the iron is necessary to carry on the war, and because of their experience the miners can work to the best advantage where they are now. Let me assure you that the men are ready and willing to dig iron ore; but, on the other hand, if conditions become such that they can render better service by fighting than by digging, they will be just as willing then to shoulder the gun as they are now to shoulder the pick.

Those whom President Wilson wants to enlist just now are the young men, the nonproducers.

I am not opposed to the "volunteer service" bill because I am afraid that my people will object to being conscripted. My people are willing to do their share, whether it is in the mine getting out copper and iron for munitions, whether it is to raise crops for the fighters, or whether it is to do the real fighting. In fact, many of the men who have already enlisted to fight could be of more service in the mines.

I have talked universal training and service for over two years. The people of the twelfth Michigan, while willing to do their share, want to know that the other man is also going to do his share. They know there is only one system by which each man can be made to do his "bit," and that is by the "selective draft."

Every man in my district is either an immigrant or the son of an immigrant, but they all are Americans.

They did not want war and hoped the same as myself, that war would not be forced on us. But we are at war, not on account of our own actions, but because another nation has forced war upon us.

I voted to table the McLemore resolution; I was against any embargo on munitions; I voted to declare that a state of war exists; I voted for the so-called billion-dollar bond bill; and I am going to vote for this bill as recommended by the President and by the General Staff.

There are thousands of former inhabitants of Germany and Austria in my district, but I have yet to receive a single criticism from any of those former Germans and Austrians because I voted to stand by the President instead of by the Kaiser. Gentlemen who believe that it is popular to sympathize with the central powers against this country mistake the good sense and patriotism of their people "back home."

At the time of tabling the McLemore resolution some Members who voted right were afraid they had offended their former German or Austrian constituents.

To show how my people felt, at the same time I received a letter from Mr. J. J. Wershay, of Calumet, Mich., secretary of the Austrian Rod and Gun Club, asking how they could affiliate with the American National Rifle Association. Why? To fight for the central powers? No; to fight as good Americans for this country.

A little later, when some people tried to foment strife among the Croatians, they held a mass meeting and asked the would-be trouble makers to leave the district. A mass meeting of the Croatians of Calumet was held on April 8, and strong resolutions, a copy of which I placed in the RECORD, were passed, in which they said, in part:

We are in absolute accord and sympathy with the declaration of the President and Congress of the United States, and we tender the President and Congress an enthusiastic and whole-hearted support and assistance in any demand that they may make upon us in this war that is now being waged for freedom of mankind and the triumph of liberty and justice.

Signed by Rev. Joseph Medin, Ph. D., chairman of the meeting.

The different German societies have appointed committees to draw up resolutions of their loyal attitude.

At a meeting held at the Germania Hall some time ago of the Eagles, the chairman of the meeting, Mr. T. J. Otto, was a German, and the principal speaker, Mr. Henry J. Lemcke, was a German. The following letter from Mr. Lemcke explains the attitude of 99 per cent of those of foreign birth and parentage:

SAGINAW, MICH., March 29, 1917.

Hon. W. FRANK JAMES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. JAMES: Permit me to express myself anent your speech delivered in Hancock, Mich., on the day of the public meeting held under the auspices of Aerie No. 382 of Eagles. Your speech on Americanism appealed to me and made a decided impression on all present, as was evidenced by the hearty and spontaneous applause which greeted your remarks.

As I informed the audience on that occasion, I again reiterate that I am of German parentage, that my dear old father, although a resident of this country nearly 50 years, was so German that he had not acquired the use of our language and spoke very broken English, yet withal he was a patriotic American citizen, believed in these United States against all foreign powers. I am proud of this fact, and also that the son is a firm believer in our institutions, always has been, and always will be.

Although my political affiliations have always been with the Republican Party, I say, and want to be emphatic in this declaration, that Woodrow Wilson is our President. We must stand by him. It is our duty always to uphold the dignity of our flag and our country. In doing these things we are simply carrying out the principles of the greatest patriotic fraternal society in all the world, the Fraternal Order of Eagles.

With personal good wishes to you, I remain,

Very sincerely,

HENRY J. LEMCKE,
Grand Worthy Chaplain, F. O. E.

As I said, I am not opposed to the volunteer service bill because I am afraid that my friends will object to being conscripted. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] stated one reason why he was for "selective draft" was that he did not want his Irish friends to do all the fighting—he wanted to pass part of the glory around.

I doubt whether even the Irish in Boston have as good a record as that of Ironwood, in my district. In 1910 it had a population of about 14,000. About 10 days ago they sent 65 volunteers, according to a letter from one of the business men there. In a telegram from one of its prominent business men, Mr. William Nancarrow, he informs me that 100 more left last Friday. The balance of the county has sent enough to make it 200. I understand they expect to send 100 more shortly. I know most of these men, and I wish that many of them had kept at work in the mines, as I believe they would have been of more service to their country working in the mines at this time. The remarkable part of this is the fact that there had been no recruiting officer at Ironwood. All of these boys went to the post office and enlisted, and all joined the Regular Army.

The people of Ironwood are for the selective draft, according to all the information that I receive from that county, and want to know that while they are "doing their bit" the rest of the country will also do their "bit."

If there ever was any question as to whether or not the people and their sons, who come here from Europe, would be loyal the names of the first 65 speak for themselves. They include Polish, British, French, Scandinavian, Finnish, Austrian, German, Irish, and Italian.

I give the names as published in the Ironwood Times and the Ironwood News-Record:

William Thompson, John Zvonsowski, Wanty Dudwi, William Leary, Howard Shelley, Andrew J. Sopko, Pito Falsi, Leslie Kacsir, Arvid C. Forsberg, Albert Kruchy, Herbert Smitham, Verne Anderson, Peter Grenfell, Angelo Zanella, John L. Nichols, Ernest J. Thomas, Fred W. Pickard, Jake Yonkoski, John Leonard Olson, Benhard Orhn, David Hedlund, John Kinsmanich, Isaac Turner, Henry Hayes, Thomas Nattson, Adam Blazikowski, Lenkey Wick, John P. Shea, Roy Johnson, Frank Ramettu, Fred Kazvinsky, Nick Tregear, E. R. Staples, Isaac Chouinard, Ernest Nicholls, Edwin Carlson, Edward Psutka, Robert Johnson, William Johnson, Russell Mitchell, Clarence Halquist, William Pollari, Harvey Carlson, Edward J. Ossoweki, Joseph D. Sobolewski, Harold Erickson, Sam Usitola, Louis Duroy, Joe M. Sniezeck, Eugene A. Halsy, John Guouf, Paul Kolson, John Holecheck, Leonard Welch, Edward Duffey, John Figuli, Charles Bentzen, John Kachanski, Victor Kohkonen, Joseph Calligaro.

Many more enlistments, many the sons of immigrants, also enlisted from Iron Mountain, Iron River, Negaunee, Marquette, Calumet, Hancock, Houghton, and other towns in the twelfth Michigan district, but I have not yet been able to get a complete list.

A patriotic meeting was held at Iron River, Mich., a few days ago, and in resolutions adopted by over 3,000 voters they advocated universal service as the only fair and democratic system for the defense of the country. Similar meetings have been held all over the district, and more have been called. All are for universal service—selective draft.

One of the best arguments in favor of universal military service, conscription or selective draft—whichever you wish to call it; neither name frightens me—was made the other day by President Wilson in a letter to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HELVERING]:

The principle of selective draft, in short, has at its heart this idea: That there is a universal obligation to serve and that a public authority should choose those on whom the obligation of military service shall rest, and also in a sense choose those who shall do the rest of the Nation's work.

The bill if adopted will do more, I believe, than any other single instrumentality to create the impression of universal service in the Army and out of it, and if properly administered will be a great source of stimulation.

I took occasion the other day in an address to the people of the country to point out the many forms of patriotic service that were open to them, and to emphasize the fact that the military part of the war was by no means the only part and, perhaps, all things considered, not the most vital part.

Our object is a mobilization of all productive and active forces of the Nation and their development to the point of cooperation and efficiency.

The idea of the selective draft is that those should be chosen for service in the Army who can be most readily spared from the prosecution of the other activities which the country must engage in, and to which it must devote a great deal of its best energy and capacity.

The volunteer system does not do this.

When men choose themselves they sometimes choose without due regard to their other responsibilities.

Men may come from the farms or from the mines or from the factories or centers of business, who ought not to come, but ought to stand back of the armies in the field and see that they get everything that they need and that the people of the country are sustained in the meantime.

Those who feel that we are turning away altogether from the volunteer principle seem to forget that some 600,000 men will be needed to fill the ranks of the Regular Army and the National Guard and that a very great field of individual enthusiasm lies there, wide open, for all who wish to volunteer.

Another thing that we ought to do before we go home, if the law is not already strong enough, is to provide for death to every man who cheats this country by delivering inferior goods of any kind in either Army contracts or Navy contracts. [Applause.]

There are many people living to-day who are suffering from the "embalmed-beef" outrages of 1898. As has been well said, "the embalmed-beef outrages of the Spanish-American War were so unspeakably vile that the mere mention of them to-day nearly 20 years later, brings the blush of shame to every honest man. Shoddy uniforms, paper shoes, inferior powder, and rotten food have been our invariable experience in time of war." The "embalmed beef" was bad enough, but when you were fed on so-called "fresh beef" which you had to scrape the "gangrene" off of before you tried to cook it was worse. A man who will do things of this kind is a traitor to his country, and ought to meet the fate of a traitor. [Applause.]

I would not ask anyone to do what I have not done and would not do, and what I am not willing to have my own sons do. I have two sons that are as dear to me as any sons are to their father. I know that in case of war, they are going to enlist. I want them to have a chance for their lives. The ones who enlisted in 1861 and 1898 did not have that chance, and if you pass the Dent bill, there are thousands of boys that will not have a chance for their lives to-day. I want to see a good system of universal training, universal service, and selective draft, so that every man will have to do his share, and every man who goes to fight will know what to do and have officers who know how to take care of him. I don't want my sons to have to do any fighting for the sons of men who are too "yellow" to enlist themselves, and whose sons are too "yellow" to enlist.

Every man should teach his son that it is not only his privilege but it is his duty to serve his country in any capacity that his country can best use him in time of war.

Let no one tell you as you grow
That nothing to the flag you owe;
Let no one whisper that it means
But pleasant days and peaceful scenes,
And merely calls to mind a land
Where wealth abounds on every hand,
Because no more that flag will fly
When men for it refuse to die.

And it may be, said I, "That you
Must some day serve that banner, too,
And then if such a day should come
That sounds again the stirring drum,
And blows once more the martial fife,
Be not a slave to peaceful life.
As they were men, be you a man,
And give that flag the best you can."

—Eddie Guest.

My district is strongly Republican, but some of the strongest letters that I have received to stand by the administration in this crisis are from rock-ribbed Republicans who voted the straight Republican ticket last fall. They realize that this is no time to talk partisan politics.

We are now a participant in the most bloody of all wars; our very existence as a Nation depends upon the outcome of the war. There is only one Nation that is financially able to pay an indemnity in case of defeat—we represent that Nation. This war can not be won by talk—it can only be won by the best army that can be raised. This is no time to try another experiment with a system that has always failed us.

We need men to mine the ore; we need men to raise the crops; we need men to make the munitions; we need men to do the fighting—the selective draft places each man where he can be of the most service to his country—it makes each man do his "bit."

The question of What is "good politics"? is not the question. Suppose our efforts should be temporarily misconstrued; it is more important to this country that this war shall be won quickly with the least number of men dying from disease and wounds than it is that we shall be returned to Congress. The selective draft is the only fair and equitable way—let us pass it unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3545 and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. CANNON was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Michael Rappel, H. R. 14921, Sixty-third Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, and that general debate shall be continued on the bill H. R. 3545 under the same agreement heretofore obtaining, to run not later than 10 o'clock to-morrow night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow, and that general debate shall be continued under the previous agreement to a time not later than 10 o'clock to-morrow night. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suppose that means that the House will remain in continuous session?

Mr. DENT. That is the idea.

Mr. MANN. And that the bill will not be read for amendment to-morrow in any case?

Mr. DENT. The bill will not be read for amendment to-morrow.

Mr. MAPES. And that means that general debate shall close to-morrow night?

Mr. DENT. That means that if we should conclude general debate prior to 10 o'clock to-morrow night, I shall move to rise and then move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a memorial signed by all of the teachers of economic and political science in Grinnell College, Grinnell, Iowa, relating to raising war finances by taxation.

Mr. MANN. Does this have the approval of the gentleman's colleague?

Mr. RAMSEYER. It has.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 71.

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House be granted permission to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

VOTE ON THE BOND BILL.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for half a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for half a minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, on the 13th of April, when the bond-issue question was up, and at the close of the general debate, I understood that there would be no roll call the next day, and I responded to a request to make an address at Springfield, Ohio, on the following evening, and therefore I am recorded as absent, as I was. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing the address I delivered on the war in Springfield, Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a speech he made in Springfield, Ohio. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow, Wednesday, April 25, 1917.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of Commerce submitting estimates of appropriations required by the Department of Commerce for the fiscal years 1917 and 1918 (H. Doc. No. 65); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $22,000, required by the Panama Canal (H. Doc. No. 66); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. ADAMSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3650) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 20), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ESCH, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 1006) authorizing the county of Morrison, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said county, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 21), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1679) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Morrison, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said county, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 22), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. PADGETT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1845) to authorize Peter Goelet Gerry to enter into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States, for use of the steam yacht Owera, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 19), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.
